(4.45.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): Mr. Speaker, I regret that this measure should have come on so unexpectedly and at so late an hour. The subject was discussed at a recent Sitting on a Motion by the hon. Member for Dumfries, which received a very large measure of support. I can speak with some confidence on the subject to which I have given some attention, and having, as a landowner, had to deal with questions raised by the expansions of towns, when land becomes valuable, and when no redress frequently can be obtained from the landowners, whose property surrounds the growing community. In nearly every case of a large town you find it rapidly expanding, and that the inhabitants are obliged to pay whatever price for the land they require that it may suit the landowner to ask. That constitutes in Scotland a very considerable public grievance, and I doubt whether many questions excite more interest than that of the ability of the inhabitants of large towns to acquire the land necessary for their requirements at reasonable prices. The Bill has three purposes. The first is the power of compulsory purchase. Under the machinery of the Bill it is provided that a valuation should be made of the land required for the town. This Bill does not deal with the wider question of taking land compulsorily for agricultural purposes; it simply deals with the question of obtaining land for the building purposes of towns. The second purpose is to deal with the question of unearned increment. We recognise in this Bill that you cannot deal with unearned increment which has accrued in the past, but provision is made for dealing with it as it may arise in the future. All existing interests are entirely safeguarded in the Bill; there is nothing which will convey any suspicion of confiscation in regard to anything that is proposed. The third purpose is that the land should be rated according to the actual value. That was one of the recommendations of the Housing of the Working Classes Commission, but no practical steps are now being taken to put that into force. This Bill has been reviewed in no hostile spirit by the Society of Solicitors, and there have been Petitions in its favour from a large number of persons, and I believe myself that it has the support of public opinion in Scotland. Speaking as a landowner, I feel satisfied that landowners will have nothing to complain of if this Bill be carried into law.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(4.50.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of supporting the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill, and, in doing so, I desire to explain two points of novelty which occur in it, and which I think are entirely new to the House. Machinery is for the first time provided for intercepting the unearned increment—a difficult problem, which is awaiting settlement throughout the country. Cases are constantly occurring in which, owing to the growth of a community, the owner of land finds the value of his land increased from 10 to a hundredfold without any effort of his own, and he puts this increased value into his pocket. The machinery of the Bill provides that the Local Authority shall be empowered to have lands valued with a view to subsequent purchase, and to purchase at any time within 20 years on the basis of their actual market value minus so much as is ascertained on the basis of the first valuation to represent the special increment due to the growth of the adjacent town. The increased value of such lands, due to the growth of the community, will thus be secured to the Municipality. The second point of novelty in the Bill has reference to the rating of unoccupied building land. It is unfair—and this point has been endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—that building land should be rated at its actual value—the owner meanwhile biding his time till its value is so increased by the growth of the community as to make it worth his while to sell. The Bill proposes that the land shall be estimated at its capital value for building purposes and assessed at 4 per cent. of that value. The owner, however, is given the alternative of having the capital value assessed on the actual yield, and being assessed on 4 per cent. of that capital value, with the condition that the Local Authority shall, if it think fit, be entitled to purchase the land at such capital value so ascertained. These provisions seem to me equitable, and are calculated to meet the various cases of hardship which occur in Scotland. There is the case of the town of Cumnock, and other cases with which Members of this House are familiar. We have confined the provisions of the Bill to Scotland, because the drafting of the measure was a matter of considerable difficulty, but still the machinery of the Bill, with alterations in detail, would be made applicable to England. The Bill is, I venture to submit, absolutely devoid of anything like confiscation, and, in view of the growing pressure of this enormous land question with which we are being brought face to face more and more every day, the Government would do well to assent to what, in principle, is a reasonable proposition, rather than wait till the pressure of outside opinion and a sense of injustice shall make it impossible to deal with the landowners.

(4.55.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. M. T. S. DARLING, Edinburgh and Aberdeen Universities): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of this Bill might have led the House to suppose that it is a very simple and innocent measure, but the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has pretty well disclosed the principles to which this House is invited to give its adhesion by affirming the Motion for the Second Reading. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Bill represented that it had three main purposes in view. The first is to allow of the compulsory purchase of land at the discretion of either the Town or the County Council. Whatever may be the views of the House as to the policy of giving such power, under limitation, I shall only point out that this Bill provides no limitations at all upon the amount of land that may be acquired by the Local Authority. They may buy a whole county if they are so minded, and have the means to do it. And the purpose for which they buy the land is in no way limited. They may lease it or sell it; in short, there is nothing in the Bill to prevent them embarking upon a course of land speculation. The Bill provides, no doubt, for control by a local tribunal, consisting of a Judge and a Surveyor, who are to be satisfied that the purchase is in the public interest; still, I think, the House will see that there is practically no limit to the discretion which the Town Council or the County Council may exercise, so long as they are able to satisfy the local Judge and the local Surveyor that what they are proposing to do is in the public interest. They may become large landowners, and lease out farms. That may be in the public interest, but it may be done without any sort of communication with Parliament, and it is to be left to the arbitrament of the local Judge what is in the public interest. I think it is a most unfair duty to cast on the local Judge, because you bring him into conflict with the Local Authority, which is most undesirable. So much for the first purpose of the Bill. The purpose of the second part of the Bill is still more surprising. It is to enable Local Authorities to have a valuation made on any land within their area, with a view to ultimate acquisition, and the extraordinary part of the proposal is that, within 20 years of the valuation, the Local Authority is to be empowered to buy the land, not at its value at the time being, but at the reduced value if the land falls in value, and at the valuation if the land rises in value. Clause 12 of the Bill proposes that the price payable for land shall be the value of the land as between willing buyer and seller, less any increased value ascertained to be due to the increase or movement of population, or to industrial or other developments. Let it be supposed that a movement of population takes place within an area of a Local Authority, the effect of which is to raise the value of land in one part and to diminish it in another, and that a man owns property in both parts. Within the 20 years the Local Authority may come down upon him and claim land in the part in which the value has fallen at the reduced rate, while for land in that part in which the value has risen he will get no share of the risen value. He is, in fact, made to suffer for a fall in values which is due to industrial or other movements, but yet he will be prevented from reaping the benefit of an increase in value. Can anything be more unfair than that? Surely, it is in itself sufficient to justify the rejection of the Bill. I will not enter into a discussion on the doctrine of the unearned increment. It has never yet received the sanction of Parliament, and I do not think it is likely to receive Parliamentary sanction when introduced in this insidious manner in a measure which purports to have a different prime object. With regard to the third purpose of the Bill, I will only say a word or two. The object is to take hold of any portion of land near a town which could, in the opinion of the Local Assessor, be said to have a certain value as building land. The Local Assessor is to be the sole arbiter under the Bill, and the moment he finds land of value for building purposes, he is to ascertain its capital value, whether prospective or otherwise, and the unfortunate landowner is again to take all the disadvantage. There is one very formidable objection to this part of the Bill, and that is, that it proposes to affirm a principle which is now under the consideration of the Select Committee on Town Holdings. It seems to me that it would be a very strange thing for the House to appoint a Committee to consider a principle, and, pending its determination, to affirm that principle. Now, the Town Holdings Committee, of which I have the honour to be a member, has been appointed to inquire into the question of imposing a direct system of taxation on ground rents, and on the increased value imparted to land by building operations. The reference to the Committee is, perhaps, not quite so wide as it would have been had the questions raised in this Bill been specially referred to it, but hon. Members of the Committee will bear me out in saying that we have given a very wide interpretation to the reference, and we are taking evidence on the point whether ground suitable for building ought not to be rated at more than its actual value. I think it would be most inconvenient to read this Bill a second time before the Committee has reported, and, for the reasons I have stated, it is impossible for the Government to assent to the Second Reading Motion.

(5.10.) MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan): There are many questions of great importance involved in this Bill, and it is, therefore, unfortunate that the Debate on it should have come on at so late an hour as not to afford sufficient time for the full consideration of the question. But I have a suggestion to make which those who have brought the Bill forward are, I believe, prepared to accept. It is that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. One can quite see from the present condition of public business that hardly any opportunity is likely to be obtained in this House for the consideration of the many proposals contained in the Bill. A great many of the objections raised by my hon. Friend the Solicitor General for Scotland to the purposes of the Bill were rather in the nature of criticisms, which might be considered in Committee with a view to rectification. For instance, the question as to the limit of the powers to be conferred on Local Authorities is eminently one for consideration in Committee. No doubt some of the general questions involved in the Bill are fresh in the minds of hon. Gentlemen, inasmuch as there was lately a discussion on the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries, in which they were fully considered. The fact of this Bill having been introduced prevented, I believe, the case of Scotland being specially entered on in that Debate, but still several general principles were affirmed, and the Motion was only defeated by the small majority of 15. I think that where there is such a division of opinion in the House this Bill might very well be sent to a Select Committee for consideration. I hold that the third point raised by my hon. and learned Friend is one which could not very well be argued out on a Second Reading Debate, that a Select Committee would be much more qualified to deal with all these points, because, even if it did not take evidence, it might be allowed access to the evidence given before the Town Holdings Committee. On the understanding that the Bill goes to a Select Committee I shall support the Motion for the Second Reading.

*(5.15.) MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): The Bill has come on very unexpectedly, and, consequently, the Scotch Members are taken somewhat by surprise. And it is not the first surprise this House has had to-day. The Bill deals with very important questions, and it is impossible to discuss it adequately at this hour. Still, if it passes the Second Reading I shall hail with pleasure its being referred to a Select Committee. There are many points likely to be raised which would not appear from a mere perusal of the measure. There is, for instance, the question whether one of the effects of the Bill would not be to prevent owners from improving their land, seeing that if they did so the Local Authority alone would reap the benefit. I venture to think the Bill would stop all improvements. Again, gross injustice might be done by means of the powers it is proposed to give the Authorities over waste lands in the neighbourhood of towns—lands which are increasing in value every year. The compulsory taking of land might engender bitterness, and possibly strife, which would not pass away for generations. Again, there is the proposal as to unearned increment, which requires very careful consideration. On all these grounds I hope the Government will not assent to the Motion for Second Reading—at any rate if they do, that the Bill will be sent to a Select Committee.

*(5.20.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I agree with what my hon. Friend has said as to the impossibility of properly discussing this Bill in the short time at our disposal, and I, therefore, beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 210; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 84.)

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

MARRIAGES IN BRITISH EMBASSIES, &c. BILL.—(No. 183.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*(5.40.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The hon. Member in charge of this Bill has been exceedingly courteous in postponing it from time to time because it required our consideration. Her Majesty's Government have for some time had under contemplation the amending of the law relating to marriages in British Embassies and Consulates and on board Her Majesty's ships. The difficulty of dealing with this question has been increased by the various changes that have taken place of late years in the Marriage Laws of foreign countries; but, considering that it may be some time before we can deal fully with this question, and that this Bill deals with a recognised grievance, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to assent to its Second Reading on the understanding that it will be necessary to introduce in Committee provisions to guard against undue extension or abuse of the system, and providing that full notice shall be given of the intention to celebrate a marriage at an Embassy or Consulate, that the lex loci shall be satisfied, and that registration shall be duly made.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (BOROUGH OF BELFAST) BILL.—(No. 153.)

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time and passed.

MOTIONS.

IRISH SOCIETY AND LONDON COMPANIES (IRISH ESTATES.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire as to the terms of the charters or other instruments by which their estates in Ireland were granted to the Irish Society and to the London Companies, and as to the trusts and obligations (if any) attaching to the ownership of such estates, and as to the mode in which the sale of their estates has been effected, or can be effected, consistently with such trusts and obligations as may be shown to have existed, or now exist."

That the following Members be nominated Members of the said Committee:—Mr. Clancy, Lord Elcho, Sir John Ellis, Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Elton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Colonel Laurie, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Lea, Sir William Marriott, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Sexton, and Sir Richard Temple.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

*(5.45.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I do not intend to oppose the Motion, but I wish to make one or two observations upon it. If hon. Members will read the list of names they will see that seven of the 13 Members of the proposed Committee are hon. Gentlemen whose views on this subject are very pronounced, and it is therefore pretty clear what will be the nature of the Report. The hon. Member for North Longford is one of the Members. I do not complain of that, for I have a very high opinion of his talent and legal knowledge; but I venture to think that his colleagues will follow his lead on this matter. Certainly nothing can come of the Committee's deliberations without legislation by this House, and I do not believe the Chief Secretary for Ireland is likely to bring in a Bill on lines suggested by the hon. Member for North Longford. Again, I do not think any legislation will be proposed during the life of the present Parliament, but I beg to give notice that whenever it is brought forward I, or my successor, if I am not here, will resist any proposition to take away property which we maintain is held by legal tenure—a tenure which has been declared legal by the permanent Law Advisers of the Crown, who held office when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle was Chief Secretary, as well as under the present Government.

(5.47.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I will not say anything as to the extraordinary attempt of the hon. Baronet to prejudge the decision of the Committee even before it meets. I desire only to ask if the Committee will sit to-morrow?

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's): I have made arrangements for that as far as I could. The decision does not rest with me.

Question put, and agreed to.

RESERVE FORCES ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Bill to remove certain doubts which have arisen under "The Reserve Forces Act, 1882," and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Stanhope and Mr. Brodrick.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 272.]

FIRE BRIGADES (EXEMPTION FROM JURY SERVICE) BILL.

On Motion of Viscount Curzon, Bill to exempt members of Fire Brigades from Service on Juries, ordered to be brought in by Viscount Curzon, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Francis Maclean, Mr. Gully, Mr. Baird, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 273.]

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Finlay, Bill to declare the constitution of the Church of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Finlay, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Parker Smith, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Mr. Thorburn, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. Hozier, Mr. Mark Stewart, and Mr. Baird.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 274.]

Sir R. Fowler

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (BANFFSHIRE)

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Asher, Bill to make better provision for the administration of certain Educational Endowments in the County of Banff, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Asher, Mr. Duff, and Mr. James Campbell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 275.]

ECCLIASTICAL CONTUMACY BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Sandys, Bill to substitute deprivation for imprisonment for contumacy in proceeding under the Church Discipline Act of 1840 and "The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874," ordered to be brought in by Colonel Sandys, Mr. Whitley, Mr. Wardle, Mr. Joicey, Colonel Sanderson, Mr. Abel Smith, Sir Robert Fowler, Mr. Alexander H. Brown, Sir John Kennaway, Sir George Baden-Powell, Mr. Charles Wilson, and Mr. Grotian.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 276.]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Third Report, with Minutes of Evidence, brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 177.]

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN reported from the Chairmen's Panel that they had appointed Mr. Osborne Morgan to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

INLAND REVENUE (DEATH DUTIES).

Copy ordered—

"Of Memorandum setting forth, for Death Duty Purposes, the practice of the Inland Revenue Department in dealing with the various interests connected with the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 176.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Thursday, 15th May, 1890.*SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY BILL.—(No. 87.)Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

DEATHS FROM STARVATION (METROPOLIS).

Address for—

"Return of the number of Deaths in the Metropolitan District in the year 1889, upon which a coroner's jury have returned a verdict of Death from Starvation, or Death accelerated by Privation (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 136, of Session 1889).—(Mr. Talbot.)"

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON NAVAL AND MILITARY ADMINISTRATION.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state what action he proposes to take with reference to the suggestions and recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Administration of Naval and Military Departments so far as they relate to the Admiralty?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The recommendations of the Royal Commission, so far as the Admiralty was concerned, were four in number. They involved no change in the present system of administration, but suggested a more distinct recognition of the principles upon which the system is based, especially in reference to the position which the First Naval Lord occupies as chief adviser on all great questions of naval policy to the First Lord of the Admiralty. In order to enable him to give more time to this primary duty, they recommended that he should be relieved of some of the routine work hitherto attached to his office. Effect has been given to this recommendation, which was the only one that required any action to be taken.

VOL CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. CURRIE, MAGISTRATE OF HOWRAH.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that complaint has been made against Mr. Currie, Magistrate of Howrah, of assault and use of abusive language to native gentlemen within the precincts of the Court, on the 6th of August last; whether the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal thereupon ordered an inquiry to be made by Mr. Clay, officiating Commissioner of Burdwan; whether Mr. Clay made such inquiry; whether it was of a public or private character; and whether the gentleman who made the complaint was examined; whether Mr. Clay has submitted a Report; and whether the Bengal Government have communicated such Report to the Secretary of State; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State will call for a copy of Mr. Clay's Report, or, if already received, will he lay it upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no information as to the facts stated in the question. If the hon. Member can furnish any sufficient ground for the statements the Secretary of State will inquire from the Government of India as to their truth.

THE CRAWFORD CASE.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any application has been received on behalf of Mr. Arthur Crawford, to be refunded the legal expenses incurred by him in connection with the Poona Special Commission; and, if so, what decision, if any, has been come to in the matter?

SIR J. GORST: The payment of Mr. Crawford's legal expenses was, in the first instance, refused by the Secretary of State, although, in consideration of his services, other concessions to his family were made. A further application has been since made on the subject, which is still under consideration.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Has any further decision been come to in this case? I have had a notice upon the subject upon the Paper for some time, but I have not had an opportunity of obtaining an expression of opinion upon it.

2 M

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir. I believe that whenever the Secretary of State and the Government of India have made up their minds they will act without waiting for the discussion which is proposed to be initiated by the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I point out that there are strong expressions contained in the Papers now before the House with reference to this matter?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether we are to understand that he intends, in the surprising course which he is taking, to lay down that there is no necessity for producing Papers in justification of the action of the Indian Government?

*SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) somewhat exaggerate the importance of the matter. The only question now at issue is the cost which has been incurred by Mr. Crawford in the litigation which has taken place. Strong representations have been made to the Secretary of State upon that matter, and they are receiving proper consideration.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask whether what the hon. Gentleman terms "litigation" was not a series of charges against Mr. Crawford, a very high official, for accepting bribes from a number of Magistrates, and whether several of the Magistrates alleged to have been bribed have since been dismissed from the service of the State?

*MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): Is it not the fact that the Government of Bombay empowered a special tribunal to try Mr. Crawford on 33 different charges; is it not also the fact that he was acquitted upon 32 of those charges, and only partially convicted upon one—the 33rd—and did not the Secretary of State dismiss him from the Service, not on the ground of corruption, of which he had been acquitted, but on the ground, which he had himself confessed, that he was indebted to some of the native capitalists in his district for borrowed money?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; all the questions which have been addressed to me are perfectly correct, and the particulars will be found in the Papers which have been presented to the House.

THE GUARANTEED SOUTH INDIAN RAILWAY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if it is true that the Government, having just bought up the Guaranteed South Indian Railway at a heavy premium, is about to give another guarantee to the same or a re-organised company, for the purpose of working the line; if the terms of the fresh guarantee are three per cent., and half of any net profit, after paying the guarantee; and if the result will be that the Government, being able to borrow at three per cent., and having paid for the line at the rate of 131 per cent., now gives to the company three per cent., plus the salaries of the directors, the patronage of the administration, and the chance of additional payment in case of profit?

*SIR J. GORST: Negotiations are now going on between the Secretary of State and the South Indian Railway Company, with the view of the latter conducting the management and working of the line just purchased by the Secretary of State. The terms of the agreement are not yet settled.

SIRAJI RAO.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the numerous barbarities which have been committed by the present ruler of the Indore State, Siraji Rao, both before and since his installation; whether he is aware that, in consequence of the well-known brutal character of Siraji Rao, his late father, His Highness Tukoji Rao, had set him aside from the succession, and that, after his father died, his own mother begged that the Agent to the Governor General for Central India, Sir Lepel Griffin, would not recommend his installation to the Government of India, on the score that serious trouble would overtake the Indore State if he were made ruler; whether he is aware that Sir Lepel Griffin himself had, up to the date of the father's death, adopted the same attitude towards Siraji Rao as his own father and mother, although after that event he reported he was reformed; whether he is aware that one of the first acts of the new ruler was to dismiss and expel from the Indore State all the trusted advisers of his father, and to endeavour to outrage and plunder the ladies of his late father's family, and to put in chains, and subject to starvation and public ignominy, the Revenue Officer formerly in charge of the Crown Lands, and that he has recently expelled from the State his own uncle, Sir Cassu Rao Dadasahib, K.C.S.I., to whom the Court ladies have been looking as their natural protector; and whether he can inform the House what steps the Government of India are taking to provide a prompt remedy for this state of affairs?

SIR J. GORST: The subject of this question is best known to the House as the Maharajah Holkar. The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the negative. The attention of the Secretary of State has not been called to the "numerous barbarities" which are said to have been committed. The answer to the second paragraph is also in the negative. So far as the information in the Secretary of State's possession shows, no previous objection was made to the Maharajah's succession, which took place four years ago, either by his father or mother. The answer to the third paragraph of the question is that Sir Lepel Griffin recommended his immediate succession. In answer to paragraphs 4 and 5 I have to say that the Reports received from the Government of India do not bear out the allegations. The last Report, although not altogether favourable, shows a tendency to the improvement in the Government of the State; and no interference is at present contemplated.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Upon a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether it is regular to speak, as this question does, of "the well-known brutal character of Siraji Rao?"

*MR. SPEAKER: Those words ought to have been omitted from the question. They seem to have crept in through inadvertence.

RAILWAY COMPANIES AND TELEGRAMS.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the advisability of entering into arrangements with the railway companies by which they would undertake to receive telegrams from the public for transmission at all railway stations in the United Kingdom?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to a question which was put to me in this House on August 20 last, I stated that I was not in a position to enforce the performance of public telegraph duties at all stations. I also stated my belief that at many stations the railway companies did not possess the necessary facilities. I do not think I can now add anything except that I shall always be glad to receive and consider any application from the public for the establishment of additional telegraph offices at railway stations.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: In consequence of the answer I have received, I beg to give notice that I will, at the earliest opportunity, move that in the opinion of this House no further compulsory powers should be given to railway companies until such time as they have arranged to receive telegrams from the public for transmission.

THE CARDIFF POLICE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that, about half-past one o'clock on the morning of the 2nd instant, three policemen, without the authority of a warrant, made forcible entry into the house No. 37, Mary Ann Street, Cardiff, occupied by Mrs. Driscoll, a widow, and her two sons, Cornelius and Daniel Driscoll; that the policemen, without waiting for the inmates to open the door, broke open the doors back and front, and when Cornelius Driscoll asked their authority for entering in such a manner, they replied in abusive language and refused to give any satisfactory explanation of their conduct; that the police made a pretence of arresting two men who were lodging in the house, and almost immediately discharged them without trial; that one of the policemen, No. 34, seized Daniel Driscoll violently by the throat when he attempted to stop them on the stairs until they had shown their authority; that Cornelius and Daniel Driscoll went immediately to the police station to complain, and that Inspector James, who was in charge, refused to receive their complaint, saying the police had done perfectly right, and threatened to arrest the complainants if they did not leave the police station at once; that the matter was reported by letter to the Mayor and Town Clerk, and no notice taken of it; whether the policemen complained of and the Inspector who refused to receive the complaint are still on duty; if it is lawful for policemen to enter a house without being armed with a warrant, and if it be lawful, even with a warrant, to break open the door of a house without making known to the inmates the nature of the authority with which the police, who demanded admittance, are invested; and if he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Head Constable that on the morning of the day in question a seaman came up to a constable in the street named, and said that he had been robbed of £9, and that the thieves had gone into No. 36 or 37. The constable, with two others, thereupon, having satisfied themselves that the thieves were not in the former house, knocked at No. 37. After waiting about five minutes, a man, who was passing by, having learnt what was going on, of his own accord, and without being asked by the police, forced open the door. Two men pointed out by the seaman as the persons who robbed him were arrested and conveyed to the police station, where the officer in charge did not think the evidence sufficient to justify their detention, and he denies having used any threat to the men. The men complained to the Mayor, who replied that the matter would be submitted to the next meeting of the Watch Committee. The police officers concerned are still on duty. I am advised that police officers in pursuit of an offender are justified, in urgent cases, in breaking into a house if, after announcement of their official character, admission is refused.

SLAVERY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is true, as stated, that the Imperial East African Company have entirely abolished slavery in the territories under their influence?

Mr. Cuninghame Graham

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government are informed that the British East African Company have approved a Proclamation issued by their Administrator in Zanzibar, with the assent of the chiefs of the peoples concerned, decreeing immunity from slavery within a certain area in the company's territory and beyond the 10 mile limit. It is understood that the Proclamation does not affect the status of slavery as now existent.

PUBLIC HOUSE (LICENCES IN SCOTLAND.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that, at a recent Licensing Court for the Airdrie District of Lanarkshire, Sheriff-Substitute Mair acted as Chairman, and, in the case of an equal vote for and against granting a new public house licence at Swinton, gave his casting vote in favour of its grant; whether it is true that, when the new certificate came before the Licensing Committee on the 2nd instant for confirmation, Sheriff Mair was present, and spoke in support of the application; and whether it is customary for Sheriffs or Sheriffs-Substitute, to sit as Judges ex officio in Licensing Courts in Scotland, or to interfere at confirming Courts?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question. I have not yet been able to obtain the information that would enable me to answer it.

POSTAL SERVICE AT NETHY BRIDGE.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the insufficiency of the postal service at Nethy Bridge, Invernessshire, in the matter of communication with the South; whether he will consider the advisability of authorising a despatch from Nethy Bridge by the train which leaves Nethy Bridge for the South on the afternoons of week days; and whether a despatch and delivery of letters at Nethy Bridge can be inaugurated, via Grantown and Boat-of-Garten, during the summer season, similar to the despatch and delivery by that route possessed by Dulnain Bridge, the distance to be covered being smaller in the former than in the latter case?

*MR. RAIKES: I have not received any application on the subject to which the hon. Member refers. Nethy Bridge has already two deliveries of letters, and two despatches to the South, and, on the whole, appears to be well served; but I am having inquiry made into the question of establishing an additional mail.

BETTING TELEGRAMS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the large number of telegrams which are sent through the Post Office with reference to bets and wagers; whether, in view of the enactment contained in 37 Vic. c. 15, 1874, declaring that—“Where any telegram is sent with respect to (betting), every person sending, or causing the same to be sent, shall be subject to penalties;” he can take any steps for the more stringent enforcement of this Act; and whether he is also aware that the Post Office telegraph boys are run off their legs on racing days delivering these illegal messages?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am advised that 37 Vic., c. 15, 1874, does not render illegal every telegram respecting betting, but only telegrams inviting bets, and advertising the possession of special information or advice with a view to bets. With regard to telegrams that would come within the Act, I am informed by the Postmaster General that he has no reason to believe that they are numerous, and that there would be great difficulties, consistently with the transaction of telegraph business, in having such a complete examination made of all the different kinds of telegrams as would be necessary for a more stringent enforcement of the Betting Acts. The force of telegraph boys employed on racing days is always sufficient to prevent their being overworked.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman bring in a Bill to abolish the Act if it cannot be carried out?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not say that it cannot be carried out, but that a proper censorship would be necessary to carry it out.

IMPORTED MINERAL WATERS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state approximately the amount of mineral waters imported into the United Kingdom during the last financial year; and whether any duty is at present levied thereon?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Mineral waters imported into the United Kingdom are included in the Trade Accounts, with other goods unenumerated, and the Customs inform me that they are unable to estimate the amount. There is no duty on the importation of mineral waters.

H.M.S. MALABAR.

COLONEL ANSTRUTHER (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, on the occasion of the collision between H.M.S. Malabar with the 4th Battalion Rifle Brigade on board, and the French steamer Erymanthe, on the 19th January last, there was sufficient boat accommodation to have served the 1,450 military passengers on board, in addition to the ship's company?

LORD G. HAMILTON: It is estimated that the number of boats, including collapsible boats and rafts, carried by the Malabar at the time of her collision with the Erymanthe would have been sufficient to accommodate 1,443 persons. Doubts having been expressed as to the suitability of the Mends Artillery raft for prompt use in emergency, the Admiralty have recently arranged with the India Office to replace it, in the case of the Indian troopships, by four boats capable of carrying 500 persons, or 150 more than the capacity of the raft.

METROPOLITAN POSTMEN.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the number of resignations and dismissals of postmen in the Metropolitan District during the years 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, and 1889?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that during the year 1885, out of a body of 2,674 postmen in London the number of resignations was 24 and the number of dismissals 28; in 1886, out of a body of 2,872 the resignations were 46 and the dismissals 24; in 1887, out of a body of 3,062, resignations 22 and dismissals 23; in 1888, out of a body of 3,201, resignations 44 and dismissals 31; and in 1889, out of a body of 3,429, resignations 33 and dismissals 21.

THE ENFIELD SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that certain gross breaches of the Truck Act have taken place at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, and will he cause an inquiry to be made into the matter; if he is aware that Messrs. Metcalfe are reputed to have transacted business during the working hours of the factory; and if this is contrary to the Rules of the Ordnance Office?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Trading of any kind in the factory during working hours would be contrary to regulation. A charge under this head was recently preferred by a discharged workman against two brothers named Metcalfe; but on investigation it was not substantiated to the satisfaction of the Superintendent.

MR. R. F. CRAWFORD.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is possible to make an inquiry into the mental condition of Robert Fitzgerald Crawford, now in Stow Asylum, as it is alleged that he is confined there whilst of sound mind?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Lunacy Commissioners that the Medical Officer of the Asylum in question reported yesterday that Mr. Robert Crawford Fitzgerald, who is, they assume, the patient referred to, was insane. Any application in his behalf should be addressed to the Visiting Committee of the Asylum, who alone can discharge the patient.

CEYLON.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, or to place in the Library, Copies of all Administrative Reports of the Colony of Ceylon for the last five years, together with Mr. Moir's Special Report on the alleged starvation cases, with all the appendices?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Copies of the Ceylon Administration Reports for the last five years, for which they have been received, 1883-1887, have been placed in the Library of the House, together with three copies of Mr. Moir's Report, in the form in which it was printed by the Government of Ceylon and forwarded to the Colonial Office.

THE FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT AT NEW MILFORD.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the inquest held at New Milford, on Monday, 5th May, on the body of Daniel Thomas, porter and labourer, who was killed by a train while crossing the yard near the fish stage, where a similar fatal accident occurred in 1887, and was then fully inquired into and reported upon by Colonel Rich; whether he has observed that one of the witnesses stated that it was the habit of the men to cross at this point, as the shortest cut from the fish stage to their homes; whether the Railway Company has repeatedly promised to carry out the recommendation of Colonel Rich to construct a footbridge at this spot; whether the Company have as yet begun this work; and, if so, within what time it will be completed; and whether, having regard to the risk shown by this second fatal accident, the Board of Trade will make further representations to the Railway Company or, by an amending Bill to "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889," take power to order the construction of bridges or subways where the Inspectors of the Board report they are necessary?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My attention has been called to the Report of the inquest upon the fatal accident which occurred on the 3rd instant. The Coroner states that on that day the unfortunate man had been employed at some distance from the place where he met with his injuries, that he had left off work for the day more than one hour previously, and had no business where he was. The evidence attached to Colonel Rich's Report shows that the Company have warned their workpeople not to cross the metals but to go past the station by the waterside path. The Company are, I am informed, willing to make arrangements for the construction of a footbridge. With regard to legislation on the subject, the hon. Member is aware that I made a proposal last Session, with which it was not possible to proceed owing to the opposition of the Railway Companies, and I can see no probability of it being in my power to deal with the subject this year.

POOR RATE DEFAULTERS IN GOVAN.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate how many poor rate defaulters there were in the combination of Govan, Scotland, on 20th June, 1889; how many of them subsequently paid their rates; what was the amount due on the said date; and what was the amount ultimately lost to the funds of the combination through defaulters during the year?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I have not yet been able to ascertain the particulars, and must, therefore, ask the hon. Member to put down the question for Monday.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a reply has been sent to the Petition from the Inland Revenue Officers praying for a redress of their grievances, which was forwarded to the Treasury several weeks ago; if not, what is the cause of the delay; and whether he is aware that grave discontent exists in the Inland Revenue Department?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Treasury have been presented with this and other similar applications, which involve questions of the greatest importance, as well as a large increase of expenditure. It is obvious that proposals of so serious a character must need careful consideration, and the Treasury have not yet been able to arrive at a decision. The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments did not feel in a position to Report in favour of the prayer of the Memorial.

MR. HAYDEN: Can the hon. Gentleman say when a reply may be expected?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I am afraid I cannot.

UNIVERSAL PENNY POSTAGE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the estimated loss of Revenue to this country that would result from the establishment of a universal penny postage?

*MR. RAIKES: Over and above the present loss on the Foreign and Colonial Mail Services maintained by this country, which is estimated at about £293,000 a year, the further loss which would accrue to the Imperial Revenue from the establishment of a universal penny postage rate for letters would probably be upwards of £400,000 a year.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Does the right hon. Gentleman, in that estimate, calculate upon any increase in the number of letters?

*MR. RAIKES: I have answered that question several times already.

MR. MUNDELLA: Is the calculation based upon a loss so far as the present number of letters are concerned without taking into account the fact that more letters may be carried?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes.

FOREIGN POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what (if any) is the amount of profit derived by this country from the Foreign Postal Service?

*MR. RAIKES: There is an estimated loss on the Foreign Service of more than £30,000 a year.

THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can now state when he will be able to submit to Parliament a Report of the complaints made to the Board of Trade under Section 31 of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888?"

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have presented the Report to-day, and it will be circulated without delay.

CONGO IMPORT DUTIES.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a telegram from Brussels, dated 11th May, appearing in the Standard of the 12th instant, to the following effect:—

"The Indépendance Belge to-day states that at yesterday's sitting of the Anti-Slavery Conference Baron Lambert, the Belgian Plenipotentiary, submitted a proposal having for its object the revision of the provisions of the general Act of the Conference in 1885, which imposed absolute liberty of commerce in the Congo basin, in the sense of empowering the States which possess territories in the Congo basin to levy an ad valorem duty on all imported goods. The British Plenipotentiaries warmly supported the proposal, which was accepted in principle by the German Plenipotentiary, who, however, reserved the final decision to his Government. The Representatives of Italy, France, and Portugal expressed themselves in the same sense;"

and whether it is true that the British Plenipotentiary warmly supported the proposal empowering States which possess territories in the Congo basin to levy ad valorem duties on all imported goods, contrary to provisions in the general Act of the Conference in 1885; and, if so, on what grounds did he base his support, and had he received instructions in that sense from Her Majesty's Government, and what were those instructions?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are under an engagement to keep the proceedings of the Conference secret until its labours are terminated. I regret, therefore, that I cannot make any statement as to what passed on the occasion referred to, beyond saying that the British Plenipotentiaries did not act without authority.

H.M.S. BARRACOUTA—HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that nothing has yet been done to carry out the recommendation of the jury in the recent Barracouta case at Sheerness with respect to the hospital accommodation, and that, in case of accidents, the sufferers, if not military men, would still be sent to Chatham, although there has been, and is, ample accommodation in the Military Hospital at Sheerness?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Gentleman has already put to me a somewhat similar question, which I answered on the 15th April. As recently as the year 1888, the Admiralty extended the then existing accommodation for patients at Sheerness, and they are of opinion that the Naval Infirmary is sufficient to meet ordinary requirements. In regard to the statement that there is ample accommodation in the Military Hospital for naval as well as military patients, I can only repeat that the number of beds in the Hospital is considered to only suffice in the ordinary course for the requirements of the garrison; and, therefore, it would not be desirable to ask the Military Authorities to receive Naval patients except in cases of emergency.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: In consequence of the exceedingly unsatisfactory reply of the noble Lord, I will call attention to the subject when the Naval Estimates come on.

THE SCOTCH FORESHORES.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he has yet completed his inquiries into the 14 cases of alleged infringement of the Act of 11 George 3, c. 31, submitted to him on 20th March and 4th April, in compliance with his invitation of 6th March; whether he is aware that Mr. Donald Paterson, the local agent of the landowner at Barra, is now threatening the fish curers of Castlebay with vigorous prosecution, in consequence of their claim to the free use of the foreshores below the highest high-water mark, and for the space of 100 yards on waste or uncultivated land beyond such mark, for the purposes of fish curing and of drying the fishermen's nets, &c., under the above-named Act; and whether, as the fishing season opens at Barra immediately, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of taking some public action to protect those engaged in the fishing industry at Barra and elsewhere from interference and to secure to them the enjoyment of the benefits to which they are entitled under the said Act?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I have this morning received information regarding the cases referred to in the first part of the question, but have not yet had time to consider it; when I have done so I shall communicate with the hon. Member. As regards the particular case mentioned in the question, if the hon. Member will give me specific instances where prosecution is threatened, I will make inquiry.

VOLUNTEER BRIGADE PARADES.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the exact precedence to which a local corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers would be entitled when taking part in a brigade parade composed as follows: one regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry, local corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, local corps of Artillery Volunteers, and two companies of Rifle Volunteers?

LORD G. HAMILTON: In accordance with the established order of precedence a corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers would, in the case put by the hon. Member (a brigade parade of Yeomanry Cavalry, Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, Artillery Volunteers, and Rifle Volunteers) rank immediately after the regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether fresh disturbances have broken out in Newfoundland in connection with the lobster fisheries; and, if so, what is the nature of the dispute; and what steps will be taken to remedy the evil?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have received no information of disturbances in Newfoundland in connection with the lobster fisheries.

DUTY ON EXCISE LICENCES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the propriety of still further carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance, by making a considerable increase in the duty on Excise Licences?

MR. GOSCHEN: A re-adjustment of the duty on Spirit Retailers' Licences was made in 1880, so the hon. Member will see that the alteration was made since the Report of the Select Committee, which was in 1879. An increase in those licences is not under consideration.

PUBLIC HOUSE PROPERTY.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will cause a valuation to be made of all existing public house property, in order that it may be possible for the Local Authorities to give practical effect to Clause 9 of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, which provides that in estimating the value of the interest of any person in any licensed premises no account shall be taken of any increased value due to the operation of the Act?

MR. GOSCHEN: I venture to suggest to the hon. Member that this is a matter which would be better dealt with in Committee on the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill rather than in an answer across the floor of the House.

THE A DIVISION OF POLICE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any information from the Chief Commissioner of Police respecting an application which was signed by a number of constables of the A Division, asking the kind permission of their Chief Superintendent to be allowed to hold a meeting amongst the police of the A Division at Ambrosden Section House Police Station, for the purpose of discussing the Police Superannuation Bill; whether it is a fact, when the application was given to Inspector Boghurst to be forwarded to the Chief Superintendent, he, the Inspector, kept it back for some time, and what authority had Inspector Boghurst to do this; whether it is a fact that Inspector Boghurst was told, in the presence of a number of constables, by the Chief Superintendent, he was entirely in the wrong; whether it is a fact that they made a complaint against Inspector Boghurst at the same time to the Chief Superintendent of the way in which they have been recently treated by this Inspector; and whether he will cause an inquiry into this case?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; I have received no information from the Chief Commissioner on this subject. If Inspector Boghurst has in any way failed in his duty, it is a question of discipline which can be, and ought to be, dealt with in the ordinary way by the Chief Commissioner. I see no reason for making an inquiry in the matter.

HONG KONG—CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ORDINANCE.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the points of the Hong Kong Contagious Diseases Ordinance, 1889, it is proposed to alter by the new Ordinance directed by the Secretary of State?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The alterations in the Ordinance directed by the Secretary of State are so numerous, both as to form and as to the details, that the Ordinance will be repealed, and a new one enacted. It would be difficult to set forth in an answer all the numerous amendments; but their general effect will be to bring the Hong Kong law into agreement with the Ordinance No. 14 of 1888 of the Straits Settlements, which is printed at page 55 of the Parliamentary Paper H.C. 59 of 1889.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will grant a Return of Copies of further Correspondence, or extracts therefrom, relating to the Repeal of the Contagious Diseases Ordinances and Regulations in the Crown Colonies; and whether he will include therein the Hong Kong Ordinance of 1889, and the amending Ordinance if passed, and also Papers relating to the attempt on the part of the Municipalities of Singapore and Penang to re-introduce the system repealed under cover of a general health clause in the Straits Settlements Municipal Ordinance?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Papers will be presented shortly as a further Supplementary Return to the Address for Correspondence moved by the hon. Member in 1887. As I have stated in the House on former occasions, the Hong Kong Amending Ordinance has not yet been passed.

THE EASTERN SOUDAN.

In reply to a question by Mr. BRYCE,

Sir J. FERGUSSON said: The latest Reports show that there is still much in—security in the Eastern Soudan and great distress. There are Dervish detachments still at Tokar and Handoub, who control the districts adjoining, and make occasional raids. Measures of relief will probably be necessary for the destitute people about Suakin for several months longer, but not to the same extent as at first. Work is given to those able to do it; the sick are treated in hospital; there have been many deaths. The Soudan Trading Company have made preliminary agreements with native chiefs for the cultivation of cotton, and with a view to open the trade route to Berber, but it is too early yet to judge what the result is likely to be.

ARMY STORES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the circumstances of some grave irregularities which had existed for many years in the accounts for the coastwise freight of Army stores, and especially to the case of a contractor who charged £27 2s. 8d. for the freight from Woolwich to Tynemouth of articles valued at 15s. only, as reported by the Committee of Public Accounts; what action he intends to take to protect the Public Revenue against such practices in future; and whether it is the fact that the Treasury, having suggested the advisability of striking the name of such contractor from the War Office list of firms, it is proposed by the War Office, as stated in the Committee's Report, to merely require him as a condition of any new contract to make the repayment of this amount?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There was no doubt laxity, under considerable pressure, in the supervision of the shipments coastwise when carried out in private vessels. If my hon. Friend has seen the Report he will have noticed that steps have already been taken with the object stated in his second question. As soon as the defects in the system came to my notice this branch of the Service was re-organised. In the case referred to, the payment resulted from an erroneous calculation by the clerks in the Store Department, and the contractor has offered to refund what remained to him after his payment to the captain of the ship.

VIVISECTION.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the vivisection experiments on the local paralysis of the peripheral ganglia, and on the connection of different classes of nerve fibres with them, reported to the Royal Society on the 21st November, 1889, by Mr. J. N. Langley, F.R.S., were made wholly or partly in the year 1889, and, if partly, then what part of them; and whether, if these experiments were made in 1889, he will explain why, inasmuch as they were painful experiments, they were not included in Table III. of the Annual Report and Return under the Act 39 and 40 Vic. c. 77, under the head "pain," when Mr. Langley was making his report to the inspector?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have not been able, in the short time allowed to me, to ascertain the exact date of the experiments performed by Mr. Langley, but I will make inquiry. I presume, in the absence of any information to the contrary, that all the experiments with the exception of the six experiments on frogs as given in Table III. were under the ordinary licence, apart from a special certificate, i.e., they must all have been performed upon animals throughout under the influence of anaesthetics, and killed before recovery of consciousness.

REVENUE FROM STAMPS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what way and in what proportions that part of the revenue, amounting to over £5,000,000, derived from stamps on deeds and instruments, on bills of exchange and promissory notes, on patent medicines, and from receipt and Inland Revenue stamps, for which totals for the United Kingdom only are given in the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, is apportioned in the Parliamentary Paper on "Incidence of Imperial Taxation," to England, Scotland, and Ireland; and what is the cause of the difference in the total of the tax revenue for Imperial purposes from the three kingdoms given by the above Paper at £72,729,488, and that given by the Secretary to the Treasury at £75,764,000?

MR. GOSCHEN: The revenue derived from stamps on deeds, &c., forms part of the total revenue derived under the general head of stamps, which, amounting to £12,240,954, as given in the "Incidence of Imperial Taxation" Return, was apportioned between the three kingdoms, as stated in the second part of that Return, according to the country in which the duties were collected. The hon. Member is aware that the figures in the second part of the Return related to the year 1888-9. The figure used by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury on Monday, May 5—namely, £75,764,000—was the estimated total of the tax revenue for the current year (1890-1), as against the year 1888-9, to which the Return relates, together with the taxes estimated to be applicable in aid of local rates (namely, Probate Duty, beer and spirit extra duties), that is—(1) payable into the Exchequer, £72,060,000; (2) applicable for local rates, as given in the first part of the "Incidence of Imperial Taxation" Return, £3,704,000—total £75,764,000.

TOWN HOLDINGS COMMITTEE.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I had intended to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the intention of the Government to refer the subject of the Taxation and Rating of Feu Duties and Ground Annuals to the Committee now sitting on Town Holdings, &c., on which there is only one Scotch Member, or whether they would consent to refer the subject to a separate Committee next Session composed to a large extent of Scotch Members; but at the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question until Monday.

ABERDEEN AND TRANSFER OF LICENCES.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been directed to the decisions of the recent Quarter Session at Aberdeen, when several transfers of licences refused by the Burgh Court were granted on appeal; and whether, in view of the proposed Compensation Clauses in the Local Taxation and Excise Duties Bill, any provision will be made to prevent County Justices from imposing upon burghs which are counties in themselves, liabilities for compensation on account of licences which, in the exercise of discretion of the burgh Magistrates are not required, and have been granted against the wishes of the community more immediately concerned?

COUNTY VOTERS.

MR. RANKIN (Hereford, Leominster): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the voters in an outlying portion of one electoral district of any county may record their votes at a polling place in another electoral district of the same county, when the position of the aforesaid voters is such as to render it difficult for them to record their votes at the polling place in their own electoral district, care being taken to keep the voting papers of the two districts quite separate?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am not aware of any statutory provision under which the suggested arrangement could be made.

OUTRAGE IN CRETE.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the telegram in the Daily News of 12th May, with reference to Hassan Bey, the Turkish officer who outraged Marie Panandaki, to the following effect:—

“Canea, 8th May.

“No reparation having been made to the girl who was recently outraged by a Turkish officer, the Russian Consul has made a protest against the action taken by the Magistrate in the matter;”

whether the English Consul has added his protest and reported the circumstance as promised; and whether the Foreign Office will draw the attention of the British Ambassador at the Porte to the facts of the case and insist on the due punishment of the offender?

Mr. Eslemont

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Nothing in connection with this grave case has occurred to render expedient any representation at the Porte. Her Majesty's Consul has specially watched the proceedings in regard to it, and reported the arrest of the accused officer and his relegation for trial to the ordinary tribunals. It would be inconsistent with the whole course of administration by the present Governor General of Crete were there to be any failure by the Authorities to deal impartially with the case; and Her Majesty's Government can depend upon the Report of their own Representative concerning it.

THE LONDON FISH SUPPLY.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to some very remarkable statements made by Mr. J. Lawrence Hamilton, M.R.C.S., respecting the fish supply of the Metropolis; the deficiency of its markets; the enormous waste and the spoiling of fish, often delivered in a bad, and even putrid, state under the present system; increased cost, amounting to hundreds per cent., paid by the consumer, chiefly owing to rings of market middlemen, who pay only a fractional part to the fishermen; and whether, in view of the facts stated and the general abuses in connection with the fish trade, he will advise Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter, and report as to the best means for protecting the interests of the fishermen, for cheapening and increasing the fish supply, to improve its quality, and generally as to the advisability of further fish-market accommodation in the Metropolis.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am informed that the statements of Mr. Hamilton as to the fish supply of the Metropolis are, to say the least, highly coloured. Many of the questions raised by Mr. Hamilton have been already inquired into; and it does not appear that any more light would be thrown on the subject by the appointment of a Royal Commission. With regard to the alleged deficiency of markets, it is to be observed that, although new fish markets have been started, they have failed to compete with Billingsgate; and as to the waste of fish, though there must be waste in such a trade, the fish condemned in 1889 only amounted to one in 334.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, for the convenience of the House, he will now state when the Government intend to propose adjourning for Whitsuntide and re-assembling again after?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman, in answering the question, be kind enough to say what will be the business for next week, and especially if any Irish Supply will be taken before Whitsuntide?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I regret to say that in the present state of business it will not be possible for me to propose the adjournment for Whitsuntide before Friday, and it will then be necessary for me to ask the House to re-assemble on the following Thursday. The Irish Estimates will certainly not be taken until after the Thursday on which the House re-assembles.

*MR. CHILDERS: Will the House adjourn on Friday after the Morning Sitting or after the Evening Sitting?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That must depend upon the progress of business.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give any indication of what the business next week will be?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We must ask the House, in the first place, to pass the Budget Bill, which is the most important business to be dealt with. There will be other business also—namely, Supply, possibly a Vote on Account, to be taken before the Adjournment. We propose to proceed with the Budget Bill tomorrow.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the Tithes Bill at a Morning Sitting?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Tithe Bill will not be taken before the Whitsuntide Recess.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I trust that, considering the congested state of business in this House, there will be no adjournment over the Derby Day.

IRELAND—DETENTION OF DUMMY SWORDS UNDER THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Custom House Authorities at Belfast have seized and detained two dummy swords forwarded by Messrs. Goff, of Covent Garden, London, to Mr. John Quirke, of Dungannon, who had ordered them for the purposes of a local dramatic entertainment; if Mr. Quirke informed the Local Constabulary, and also the Custom House Authorities, the purpose for which these swords were required; and if there is anything in the regulations made under the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act which, under the circumstances, prevent the delivery of these swords to the consignee; and, if not, whether they shall be forthwith delivered?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that the swords referred to are not dummy swords, but disguised cavalry swords. They were detained in the usual course by the regulations under the statute quoted, which require any consignment of arms to be so labelled, and a written notice of the consignment to be given to the Custom Authorities had not been complied with. The Constabulary Authorities thereupon communicated with Mr. Quirke, who then informed them, as indicated in the second paragraph of the question. They pointed out to him the necessary course to pursue to obtain the arms. Upon that course being complied with the arms will be delivered to him.

DUNDRUM ASYLUM.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what medical classification of patients is adopted at the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that the classification is the same as that adopted in other lunatic asylums.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that the patients are divided into three classes—violent, semi-idiotic, and quiet?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware. I have no practical knowledge.

Dr. TANNER: I will put the question down again in order to afford the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of answering it in a proper manner. I have now further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many attendants were allowed out on leave from the Dundrum Asylum, on the occasion of the recent disturbance, when the band instruments were broken; what was the value of these instruments; what class were the patients who created the disturbance; what steps are taken usually to discriminate in the employment of violent and orderly patients; whether it is usual, in the asylum in question, when warder attendants are allowed out on pass, to fill their places pro tem. by men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and how many attendants were on special and ordinary leave on the occasion in question?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that:—(1.) Eight attendants were out on pass when the instruments were broken, all patients, except the bandmen, being in bed. (2.) Original price £18; but the instruments had been long in use, and they can be repaired. (3.) The patients creating disturbance suffered from mania with excitement. (4.) Resident physicians discriminate as to the fitness for employment of violent and orderly patients by observation and experience. (5.) It is not usual to fill the places of warders on pass by men of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Mr. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if a Departmental Inquiry was held relative to the recent disturbance at the Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Dundrum, when the police were called in to quell the disturbance; what was the result thereof, and can the Report be laid upon the Table?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: One of the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums inquired into, and reported on, the matter. The disturbance was not of a serious nature, and no Departmental inquiry was deemed necessary.

Dr. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire into the matter, and ascertain upon what grounds the police were called in, and whether, according to the evidence, the conduct of the warders was not most brutal?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I must protest against the language used by the hon. Member.

BALLYCOTTON PIER.

Dr. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that Mr. Wolfe Barry reported that the cement used in the construction of Ballycotton Pier was bad, and that the concrete in some places little better than loose gravel; if it is true that the Board of Works are going to carry out Mr. Barry's recommendations relative to the old pier, at the expense of £700, and to ignore all suggestions concerning the new structure; whether it is a fact that the Board have stated they have no responsibility as regards Mr. Barry's recommendations about the new pier; and on whose recommendation, and by what authority, was the original statement made, that the old pier was entirely removed, which will now require £700 to remove?

*Mr. JACKSON said he was not aware that Mr. Wolfe Barry reported that the cement used in the construction of the Ballycotton Pier was bad. There were two or three small portions in which the concrete was found to be defective, but he was informed this did not affect the stability of the pier. The Board of Works were deepening the harbour in accordance with the recommendations of Mr. Wolfe Barry. He was not aware that the Board had stated that they had no responsibility as regarded these recommendations. He was not aware that there had been any original statement—certainly not by him—that the old pier was entirely removed. The statement made was that the old pier had been removed in accordance with the specification of the contract. The deepening that was going on had reference not only to the foundation of the old pier, but to the rock.

Dr. TANNER: Will any of Mr. Barry's recommendations for remedying the defects of the new pier be carried out?

*Mr. JACKSON: I am sure the hon. Member would not desire to spend money unnecessarily; and if it is found that the pier is in a satisfactory condition, it is not proposed that further expenditure should take place in regard to it.

Dr. TANNER: Am I to understand that Mr. Wolfe Barry is perfectly satisfied with the new structure?

*MR. JACKSON: He has made certain recommendations in his Report, which has been presented to the House.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Has the hon. Gentleman any knowledge of the fact that a considerable settlement has taken place in the pier since his visit last year?

*MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I have no knowledge of that fact, and my information is completely to the contrary.

BOYCOTTING IN TIPPERARY.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to an article in Murray's Magazine for May, entitled "Mad Tipperary," in which it is stated that Mr. Edward Phillips, a Protestant farmer of English descent, proclaimed at a meeting of the National League—

"Is refused the common necessities of life, the local chemist being afraid to make him up a prescription. The blacksmiths have declined to shoe his horses; . . . and he cannot even take his family to church, as accommodation for his horse and carriage is refused at the Cashel hotels," because he has refused to leave his home at the dictation of the League; whether it is true that—

"While the funeral of a little girl, the daughter of a constable, was taking place, volleys of stones were thrown at the sorrowing relatives as they stood round the grave."

Whether "a midwife refused to attend a constable's wife in her confinement," and "said she had been warned against doing so;" and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a full statement of these and similar cases before introducing the Local Government (Ireland) Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the gentleman mentioned has been so boycotted at the dictation of the National League as to be refused the necessities of life; that the local chemist has been afraid to make up a prescription for him; that the blacksmith whom he used to employ has refused to work for him, and that the attendance of his family at church was interfered with as stated in the question. They report that it is also true that when a constable was burying his child in Tipperary graveyard, stones were thrown at the funeral party, and that a midwife refused to attend a constable's wife.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Arising out of the question, may I ask whether Phillips was not received at Connor's Hotel, Cashel, and supplied with every necessary; and whether, if the funeral of the girl was interfered with, and stones thrown at the police, any person has been summoned in consequence; if so, what sentences have been awarded, and if there was not a midwife who had always attended the constable's wife?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that I am unable to answer the question of the hon. Member.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman says that the chemist refused to make up a prescription. Was he afraid to do so, or did he decline?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have only given the Report as I received it.

FAIR RENT APPEALS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of fair rent appeals disposed of by the Chief Land Commission during the recent sitting at Belfast; the number of fair rents confirmed; the number of fair rents varied; and how many of these were reduced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the Chief Commissioners are on Circuit I have been unable to obtain the necessary Report, and must ask the hon. Member to be good enough to defer the question for a few days.

THE BLACKWATER.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state on what date the last Report was supplied by Captain Johnstone, Inspector of Fisheries at Mallow, to the Board of Conservators of the Lismore District; and did it relate to the angling on the Banteer portion of the Blackwater River, and, if so, would he have any objection to furnish a copy of the last Report of Water Bailiffs Coffey and Murphy, made to Inspector Johnstone, relating to that portion of the river?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Boards of Conservators being Local Bodies the actions of their officers do not come within the cognisance of the Executive Government. I, therefore, regret that I am unable to supply the information sought by the hon. Member.

THE BALTINGLAS UNION.

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that at the last election of Poor Law Guardians for the Ballingule Electoral Division of the Baltinglas Union, County Wicklow, an appointment to a person named John Driver to vote as proxy for a person named Anne Hudson was lodged with the Returning Officer; and whether it is a fact that the document referred to purported to have been signed on the 1st February by Anne Hudson, though she died on the previous 3rd January; and, if so, whether he will direct inquiry to be made as to the author of the forgery, with a view to enforcing against the delinquent the penalties which the law prescribes for such offences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. It is open to any person aggrieved to proceed for the recovery of the penalty provided by Statute, and in addition the papers will be laid before the Attorney General.

THE CONVICT M'CAFFEY

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the convict prisoner M'Caffrey, now in Downpatrick Gaol, whether he will state the nature of the disorderly conduct whilst en route to London and from London, for which he was punished; and what was the insubordinate conduct complained of in Pentonville Prison, for which he was placed in separation for nine days and lost 84 marks remission; what were the prohibited articles found in his possession, and for which he was reduced to second probation class for 203 days, besides the forfeiture of 360 marks for remission; what was the prohibited article found with him for which he was put two days on punishment diet; if he will mention the date of his last return to Downpatrick Gaol from London; and whether, since then, he has been sentenced to forfeiture of 746 marks of remission, also what period of remission these marks represent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board Report — (1) that the nature of the disorderly conduct on the occasion referred to was—

"Singing in the train going to and returning from London, and not desisting when repeatedly ordered to by the chief and other warders who were in charge."

(2) the insubordinate conduct referred to as having taken place in Pentonville Prison was—

"Persisting in talking whilst at exercise, and not desisting when ordered, necessitating his removal to another yard to exercise by himself."

The punishment referred to, namely, separation for nine days and loss of 84 marks remission, was for offences 1 and 2; (3) the prohibited articles were two pieces of lead pencil, two pieces of tobacco, and some paper with a communication in pencil thereon intended to be passed out of the prison surreptitiously; (4) the prohibited article on this occasion was tobacco; (5) April 18, 1889; (6) the 746 marks referred to have not all been forfeited since the convict's last return from London. Some were forfeited after his first return, but before his second journey to London. The period represented by the forfeited remission marks is 93½ days.

AFFAIRS IN TIPPERARY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Report published in the Glasgow Evening Citizen of an interview which purports to have been held between its special reporter in Tipperary and District Inspector Gamble; whether District Inspector Gamble refused to inform Father Humphries, when asked by him, whether the report of the interview was correct, or not; and whether it is usual, or in accordance with the rules of the Irish police service that officers of that body should grant interviews to newspaper reporters? I also desire to know whether, as the Inspector made slanderous statements, the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that he ought to be retained in the service?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not a proper question to put, and it has already been struck out of the Paper.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I desire to know whether it is intended to retain the services of an officer of this kind, who indulges in the practice of slandering the people of Tipperary?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not a proper question to put. I call on Dr. Tanner to put his question.

DR. TANNER: I decline to ask my question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to say I will repeat the question to-morrow.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the question were put in the proper and ordinary terms, no doubt it would be answered now.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to put my question now as it stands on the Paper?

*MR. SPEAKER: Certainly.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is true that such an interview took place, and that the rev. gentleman referred to received the answer indicated in the question. There was nothing unusual in granting the interview.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): Was it the object of the rev. gentleman to test certain statements made by the Chief Secretary, and is it the practice to give extraordinary facilities for making serious allegations against the Irish people?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that the constabulary at any time have done anything to suppress the circulation of the truth. I cannot say what was the intention which animated the reporter in seeking the interview.

MR. CLANCY: What I complain of is that facilities are given to one Party and refused to another.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the Chief Secretary read the account of the interview, and does he approve of the language used?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what it was.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then the right hon. Gentleman has not read the account of the interview?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will he make it his business to read it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If hon. Gentlemen will put any questions on the Paper I will endeavour to answer them.

MR. CLANCY: I wish to give notice that I will call attention to the matter.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that the houses of prominent Nationalists in Tipperary are at the present time continuously surrounded by policemen, from an early hour in the morning till after dark; that such people and their visitors are accompanied by policemen, who walk by their side, and when they stop to speak to any person or persons, they are told to "move on," and if they protest against this intrusion, are rudely pushed off the footpath on to the roadway; that the local leaders of the town are attended in all their movements by two policemen, who lie in waiting for them until they set out on their business, and should they go into the houses of their neighbours, are accompanied by them into the private apartments of those houses by these policemen, who persist in remaining, despite the protests of the owners of the houses; and whether this action of the police is according to instructions from the superior Police Authorities?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that, owing to the extensive system of boycotting which it has been attempted to establish in Tipperary, the local police have orders to closely watch all persons believed to be concerned in promoting the boycotting; but that it is not the case that persons are pushed off the footpath, nor do the police enter private apartments.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): May I ask whether, in view of the extreme urgency of the whole question, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the advisability of referring it to a Special Committee of the House, or, if he pleases, to a Special Commission, which should inquire into the whole nature and origin of the struggle between the people and the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that any doubt exists as to what the hon. Gentleman calls "the struggle" in Tipperary, or as to the incidents which accompanied it. I think the hon. Member would be the last to deny that boycotting, of which Father Humphreys boasts, exists in the locality.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Have not the statements been made in most credible newspapers? I shall take an early opportunity of moving the adjournment of the House to call attention to the matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not a fact that the Times sent over a special correspondent, who was so persistently harrassed by the police that he had to go to the police barracks to complain of it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never heard of it.

SWIFT'S HOSPITAL (DUBLIN)—ALLEGATIONS AGAINST MR. NEWLAND.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, although on the 7th November, 1889, it was officially reported to Mr. Richard Owen Armstrong, J.P., a member of the Board of Swift's Hospital (Lunatic Asylum), Dublin, that the funds of the institution had been to a large amount misappropriated by the Secretary, Mr. Newland, and that although Mr. Newland himself reported to Sir Ralph Cusack, J.P., D.L., another member of the Board of Swift's, that he had been guilty of extensive defalcations in the funds of the hospital, the members of the Board of Swift's, at a special meeting, agreed to allow Mr. Newland to make restitution to the extent of £1,000 of the funds he had fraudulently misappropriated; whether such action of the Board was legal; whether he is aware that, in consequence of this action of the Board, Mr. Newland, on the 15th November, 1889, lodged in the Bank of Ireland a sum of £1,000 to the credit of the Board of Swift's Hospital; but, being subsequently declared a bankrupt, the Board of Swift's Hospital were obliged to refund the said payment of £1,000; whether the total loss to the funds of Swift's Hospital caused by Mr. Newland's frauds has yet been ascertained; and, if so, what is the total amount of said loss; can he explain how it happened that it was not until the 7th February, 1890, three months after the discovery of Mr. Newland's frauds, that the members of the Board of Swift's caused informations to be sworn against Mr. Newland, who meantime had absconded, and placed himself outside the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Courts of Justice; and whether the Government proposes to take any action, and, if so, what action, in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: These alleged matters of fact have not come under the notice of the Irish Government, and I have no materials that will enable me to give the hon. Gentleman the information he requires.

MR. CLANCY: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to obtain information, seeing that two or three of his political supporters are charged with felony?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what ground the hon. Gentleman has for that statement.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): If Mr. Newland is guilty of these frauds will he be removed from the Commission of the Peace?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, if any information is brought to the notice of the Government, inquiry will be made and action if necessary taken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why should the law be enforced in a case of boycotting and not in a case of theft?

DR. GRIMSHAW.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Dr. Grimshaw, Registrar General for Ireland, was appointed to that position on the condition of devoting his entire time to the duties of the office; whether he is aware that Dr. Grimshaw holds other appointments of an honorary character, and also holds, and has held since his appointment as Registrar General, other offices for which he does receive, and has received, remuneration, the duties connected with which demand for their discharge a considerable amount of time; whether he is aware that Dr. Grimshaw is at present a member of the Conjoint Committee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and is paid for duties in connection with said position a sum of £40 or £50 per annum; and whether it is the intention of the Irish Government to call upon Dr. Grimshaw either to resign his appointment as Registrar General, or relinquish the office above mentioned, and refrain in future from seeking or accepting any such appointments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question. I have not been able to obtain the information, this question having appeared on this morning's Paper without previous notice.

ARMY ADMINISTRATION.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to take any steps, during the present Session, to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Army Administration, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale; and whether he can give this House the assurance that no such steps will be taken until an opportunity has first been afforded, after ample notice, for a full discussion on recommendations involving such important Constitutional changes in the administration of the defensive resources of the country?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are giving careful consideration to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Army and Navy. We are not yet in a position to say what the result of that consideration will be; but a statement will be made on the subject by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War on the War Office Vote when that is reached.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

*SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I should like to ask my right hon. Friend when he proposes to take the Army Estimates, especially the War Office Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The War Office Vote on the Army Estimates will be taken as soon as possible after Whitsuntide, although I am not certain when the Army Estimates can be taken. I will, however, undertake that ample notice shall be given.

REDEMPTION OF TITHES.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury is he will state the decision of the Government as to the proposed advance of public money for the redemption of tithe?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The President of the Board of Trade stated the other day, in reply to a question, that Her Majesty's Government were carefully considering the suggestions that had been made to them on this subject. If it should be decided to make any proposal to Parliament, based on these suggestions, notice of it will be given before the House is asked to go into Committee on the Bill.

THE LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the House, having unanimously passed the Second Reading of a Bill allocating a fund under the control of the Land Commission, under the provisions of "The Irish Church Amendment Act, 1881," for the purposes of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, it is the intention of the Government to abandon the clauses of the Land Purchase Bill which propose to apply the same fund in a different manner and for a different purpose; and, if not, whether the Government intend in any other way to give effect to the recent decision of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it unnecessary to enter into any controversy with the hon. Gentleman as to the description he gives in his question of the occurrence to which he refers; but I may express the opinion that the Land Purchase Bill will survive the Labourers Bill, and that, therefore, it is quite impossible for me to assume that any other appropriation of the Church Fund will be made than that provided in the Land Purchase Bill.

TREATIES WITH AFRICAN CHIEFS.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the rumours which have appeared in the public prints regarding Treaties or arrangements with Native Chiefs in the interior of Tropical Africa, alleged to have been recently made on behalf of Her Majesty or of any British Company; and whether he is now in a position to give the House any information upon this subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is understood that Mr. Stanley made certain engagements on his own behalf with Native Chiefs in the interior of Africa, but they were not made under any authority from Her Majesty's Government. I am not in a position to make any statement regarding them.

INDIGO RYOTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to a Petition presented by myself to-day, signed by 518 of the Indigo Ryots of Jessore, containing certain grave allegations, whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to transmit the Petition to India in order that the Government of India may make inquiry into the circumstances stated therein?

*SIR J. GORST: My noble Friend the Secretary of State for India has been supplied, by the courtesy of the hon. Gentleman, with a copy of the Petition to which he has referred; but as he is not in a position to form an opinion as to the genuineness of the Petition, or the truth of the statements it contains, he has referred it for inquiry to the Government of India.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any intention of taking the discussion on the New Code and the Education Estimates before Whitsuntide; and, if so, whether he can now state on which day the discussion will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall be very glad if it can be taken before Whitsuntide.

MR. MUNDELLA: I wish to appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury with reference to the fixing of a day for the discussion of the New Code on the Education Estimates. There are a great number of Members on both sides of the House who are much interested in the subject, and they are anxious that the discussion shall not be fixed for a day when there will not be a full attendance of Members, as there would not be immediately after the holidays. If the right hon. Gentleman cannot give an early day next week, will he fix a day after the holidays?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am as anxious as anyone can be that the Code and the Estimates shall be discussed with a full attendance of hon. Members. If the right hon. Gentleman and his friends can assure me that the Budget Bill will be substantially disposed of this week, Monday shall be assigned for the Education Debate, as that arrangement seems to be desired.

MOTION.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Proceedings on the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.40.) The House divided:—Ayes 261; Noes 146.—(Div. List, No. 85.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [12th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to assent to a Bill which provides by payment out of public moneys for the extinction of annual licences in the manner provided in the said Bill,"—(Mr. Cairnes.)
—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*(4.55.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Mr. Speaker, during the time of questions the Lord Advocate, in reply to a question which some one put to him from this side of the House, said that he objected to the word "compensation" in regard to the clauses of the Bill which is now under discussion. There has been a good deal of that sort of talk up and down the country lately. "Compensation" is a word which has been used with two meanings; but, so far as I can understand the Bill, it is a Compensation Bill, and I will give my authority in one sentence from an article in the Times newspaper—which hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House accept as an authority—published a very few days ago. It said distinctly—

"On the Second Reading of the Licensing Bill, the decision of the House will be clear and unchallengable, so far as the principle of compensation is involved."

It is clear enough what we are about. But before I discuss this compensation, I must make my earnest protest against the subject being discussed at all in this House of Commons. We hear a great deal, in our political jargon—very properly, I dare say—about the "mandate of the country." Now, what mandate has this House to take up this question? The subject was not raised in a single electoral address in 1886. Further, the Government tried to deal with this question two years ago, and their proposal for compensation was met with almost universal condemnation out of doors. As to this Bill, it comes before us most unfairly, but as it is before us, we must do our best for our constituents, and deal with the measure in a manner which will be best for the country. Now, the remarkable point about this Bill is that it is a Temperance Bill. [Cheers.] I am very glad to hear that cheer from my hon. Friends opposite. There has been a wonderful change within the last fortnight; they have all become great temperance reformers. It is a very encouraging sign. It is the first time I have known in this House a Government bringing forward what is avowed to be a purely Temperance Bill. How does it come about? There is the great Temperance Reformer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he, when he brought forward his Budget, was so shocked at the drinking which goes on in the drinking shops licensed by the Authorities, that he said "Something must be done." It was a very interesting Debate that Budget Debate. It went through the usual course. I have been present at so many Budget speeches that I know exactly what takes place. The Chancellor of the Exchequer when he comes to the drink revenue rolls it like a sweet morsel under his tongue, and then—knowing that he must say something on the moral question, with, as Mr. Disraeli used to say, "a face arranged for the occasion"—in the next breath he proceeds to deplore the immorality which the drink traffic occasions in the country. I have seen this dozens of times, but it came out more strongly than usual this year. I want to show what the effect of all this drinking is on the real, genuine Tory mind, not on the mind of the Liberal Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Member for Woolwich made a speech lately at the Blackheath Licensed Victuallers' and Beersellers' Protection Society—it was a Greenwich dinner—in which he said—

"If people had the means of enjoying all that God sent"—that was rum—"let them; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there had been an increase in the Revenue because people enjoyed themselves, he was very glad to hear it."

Of course, an honest, fine old English gentleman was glad, and I honour him for his straightforward declaration, and I think the publican who went down to Greenwich was justified more than the Pharisee on the Treasury Bench. But I want to call attention to a remarkable fact. We are told that this Bill is brought in entirely in the interest of temperance. That is very extraordinary, because almost every Temperance Society in the Kingdom condemns it, as do also the men who have been working in the cause of temperance all their lives. Somebody says "Not the hon. Member for South Tyrone." Well, the exception proves the rule. I want the right hon. Gentleman opposite to explain how it is that the great bulk of the temperance world condemn his Bill, while it is warmly applauded by the drink sellers. Is it not likely that the men who devote most of their time to the consideration of the subject of temperance should know more about it than the men who devote their time to the sale of drink? So far as I know, the Chancellor of the Exchequer became an advocate of temperance on the 17th of April, and the noble Lord the Member for Paddington started on his career on the 29th. Are not those who have been advocates of temperance all their lives, and who have not a ld. or a fd. interest in the trade, but only look to the public good, as likely to be right as the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord, supported by men whose income is endangered in the carrying out of measures of this sort? If we were discussing a private Bill upstairs, men interested in the trade would not be allowed to vote. They would have had nothing to say. If we were a jury trying a case, men interested would not be allowed to sit on it; but when it is a question of a great monopoly against the nation, then the jury box is packed and crammed with the friends of the plaintiff. But before I go further I want to vindicate those who are sometimes called the Temperance Party from some remarks which were made on Tuesday by the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir William Houldsworth). The hon. Baronet called us extreme temperance men, and I desire to clear that matter up. I do not profess to be a greater advocate of temperance than anyone else. We are all advocates of temperance, only we act in different ways. I have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) declare that he is one of the warmest advocates of temperance. It is only a question of how temperance is best promoted. The Party the hon. Baronet referred to was the Prohibition Party, and he accused us of having a cut-and-dried system, and of refusing everything but that, with the result that temperance is retarded. Well, I challenge the hon. Baronet to say what measure has ever been brought in, by what Member on either side of the House since I have been a Member, for diminishing the liquor traffic even by 10 minutes which I have not cordially supported and generally spoken in favour of. That is the right policy. I am for prohibition of the whole traffic. I would sweep it away to-morrow, and I make no secret of my opinion. But I am not a dog in the manger. I hold that half a loaf is better than no bread, and when I get one half I will go for the other half. I have supported the Sunday Closing measures, the shortening of the hours, and I even acquiesced in the proposition of the late Mr. O'Sullivan for keeping spirits in bond for 10 years, only I suggested an Amendment to keep them in bond for 100 years. I would ask the hon. Baronet, who spoke for the Church of England Temperance Society, whether he can say that he has supported all these measures in the way that the Prohibition Party has done? I am the President of the United Kingdom Alliance for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and I believe that every hour or every 10 minutes taken from the publican is a benefit to the public. We make no secret of our view; we object to the liquor traffic, believing it to be the curse of the country; therefore, we support every measure with a tendency to diminish its volume. And now, as I am in a sort of justifying humour, I want to justify myself and my friends against a charge very often made against us. It is said—

“If the wicked teetotalers had suffered Mr. Bruce's Bill to pass, what a reduction of public houses there would have been.”

The noble Lord the Member for Paddington said—

“If that Bill had passed into law, the public houses in London would, in the year 1882, have been reduced from upwards of 10,000 in 1872 to about 3,000; in England and Wales, from upwards of 100,000 in 1872 to about 32,000.”

Mr. Bruce's Bill, in the first place, was for England only, and with regard to the diminution of the trade it proposed that certain holders of licences, who were described as publicans and as holders of limited publicans' licences, should not be interfered with for 10 years; but at the end of 10 years they should have a renewal of their licences for 10 years more, if they did not exceed one per 10,000 in towns and one per 600 in the country. Their allocation having been determined by the Magistrates, they were to be sold to the highest bidder. When the applications for these licences exceeded the proportions named, all the number exceeding one per 1,000 in towns and one per 600 in the country were to receive the assent of a three-fifths majority in a poll of the ratepayers. But that only referred to on-licences and houses which were supposed to supply nothing but drink. But the schedules showed that there were 17 different sorts of licences, and to four only of those 17 did those provisions apply. Any diminution which would have taken place would have been probably through the operation of the popular veto. So the House will see there is no justification for saying that that Bill of itself would have swept away so many licences as the noble Lord the Member for Paddington alleges. I want to show clearly what the policy of the United Kingdom Alliance was. It is said we were the cause of the overthrow of the Bill; but it will be seen that the great opposition came from the publicans before whom the Government quailed. The United Kingdom Alliance, at that time, passed a resolution that the Council—

"Having fully considered the Intoxicating Liquors Bill, resolves that the friends of the Alliance be requested not to oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, with the intention of obtaining in Committee the insertion of an absolute veto for the majority of the ratepayers on the issue of licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and the equally absolute rejection of all compensation clauses."

That, I think, was the right attitude to take, and I hope we shall not be charged again with being the wicked people who prevented the Bill from passing. It was killed through the fear the Government had of the great publican power of this country. Well, what is the present Bill? It is a measure to apply public money for the supposed benefit of the public. But apart from the temperance point of view, when we begin to give Imperial taxation to be expended by Local Authorities we start on a very dangerous road. It is a sound Constitutional principle that those who raise the taxes should distribute them, and if you leave Imperial taxes to Local Bodies to distribute you will find that it leads to corruption, jobbery, and all sorts of evils. The object here, no doubt, is a good one, and I am glad the Government has recognised the necessity of diminishing the number of drink shops in this country; but the licensing system is for the protection of the public, and my case and the case of the Government is that that system has broken down. The President of the Local Government Board said that it is admitted on all hands that public houses are much too numerous, and I contend that the Magistrates have the power to reduce the number. I think I hear the President of the Local Government Board dissent from that statement.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): All I said was that we do not interfere with that power.

*SIR W. LAWSON: Then what is this Bill for? But I will go on with my argument. I say the Magistrates have the power, and they have not exercised it sufficiently. And now I come to the Solicitor General, whom I look upon as the greatest licensing authority in the country. He makes the greatest mistakes, and on that ground I consider him the greatest authority. He tries to make out that the publicans have some legal right to the renewal of their licences, and he says no statement to the contrary can be found in any decision. The hon. and learned Gentleman plays on that word "decision," just as the Government are playing on the word "compensation." But in the Queen's Bench Division, on the 24th of November, 1882, there was a special case of inquiry into this very point, and Mr. Justice Field said—

"But in every case in every year there is a new licence granted;"

while further on he said—

"The Legislature recognises no vested right at all in any holder of a licence."

Now, I respect the opinion of my hon. and learned Friend very much, but I respect the opinion of a Judge of the land still more.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I daresay the hon. Baronet will allow me to say that I have Lord Field's authority, given to me yesterday, for saying in his name he never made the statement that there was no vested interest.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Who was the reporter?

*SIR W. LAWSON: Well, I do not want to squabble about it. We will put it all in the papers to-morrow. The Solicitor General said in his speech the other night that it was not competent for the Justices to take away a man's licence simply because they thought there were too many houses. But an authority sitting on the same Bench said in the course of the evening it was perfectly true that the Magistrates might refuse to renew a licence. That authority was the Solicitor General himself. Out of his own mouth I convict him. I think that when we have two such contradictory statements from the Solicitor General I am entitled to refer him to Mr. Justice Field, who used the words I have quoted, whatever he may say. The remedy for the present state of things has been provided in many cases. In many districts where there are landlords who wish to benefit their fellow-men, drinkshops have been prohibited, and the result is improved temperance and order and morality. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) said the other night that he looked on this power of the landlords to clear their estates of drinkshops as tyrannical. But has he ever heard a single complaint from such estates? I challenge him to bring forward dwellers on these estates who will say it is a tyrannical act on the part of a landlord to release men from the proximity of these houses. When I first brought this question forward in the House of Commons I proposed the Permissive Bill, which was nothing else than giving the people the power to clear out drinkshops. On that occasion I was hard put to for a Seconder, but Mr. Thomas Bazley was induced by the action of some work-people to put his name on the back of the Bill. They asked him whether he had not a village of his own from which he had kept out the public houses. He said he had, and he thought it a splendid thing. They asked him, "Do you not think that we working men ought to have the same privilege as you have?" He said, "Yes, I do," and he put his name to the back of the Bill. How do we stand now? The Magistrates will not reduce the number of licences; the House, so far, will not allow the inhabitants to have the veto; and now the Government come forward with the proposal to protect the people by this new system of purchasing the licences. The Government, in fact, say, "We will call upon the taxpayer's pocket to rectify the shortcomings of the Magistrates. That is the whole end and object of the Bill. The public, having permitted the publicans to carry on a lucrative trade, was now called upon to bribe them to go out of the business. I want to know what these men have done for the benefit of the country that they are to be endowed with a large sum of money? We sometimes give pensions to men for killing a great number of the enemies of the country, but these men have killed their own fellow-countrymen. I am supposed to use strong language about the trade; but I have not said anything so strong as has been said by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), the new convert, whose language reminds me of what Sheridan said when he saw a Highlander in a large pair of trousers—"Converts are always enthusiastic." They talk about my language. Did I ever say that the trade was "devilish and destructive?" No; I said it was an injurious trade, and ought not to be carried on. But I am not a lord. Everyone who looks into this question uses strong language. Baron Dowse said from the Bench—

"The measure of the degradation of any district is in exact proportion to the amount of alcohol consumed in it."

My friend, Sir William Grantham, one of our English Judges, talked at Liverpool about "the unholy profits of that horrid trade"—meaning the trade of the publicans. Strong language from me, but all right from a Judge. The Edinburgh Review said—

"The liquor traffic, and particularly the retail branch of it, is a public nuisance physically, economically, and morally."

I am sure we are all justified in trying to get rid of a public nuisance. Charles Buxton said—

"The struggle of the library, and the church, and the school, against the public house and the beer shop is one development of war between heaven and hell."

That was almost as strong as the remark of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. Now that public opinion is aroused on this subject, and there is a chance of something being done, the Government come down and demand compensation for these destroyers! Sir, I remember during the time the discussion was going on about slave-owning that two men were talking on the subject of compensation in a picture-gallery. The one who was against compensation took the other to the picture of the Egyptians passing through the Red Sea, and said "Look there; that is God's compensation to slave owners." It is only compensation, the system of purchasing up these licences, which we condemn; and we condemn it because, as it was very well put by my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow the other night, it is a financial barrier to the advancement of temperance reform. There is nothing complaining of a Suspensory Act in all the petitions and telegrams that are reaching Members, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not send out, lithographed from the Treasury Chambers, such circulars as that in which the following passage occurs:—

"He wishes to express his regret that the efforts of the Government to promote the cause of temperance, by placing stringent regulations upon the issue of new licences, should be met with such hostility by those whom they might legitimately expect to find supporting them in a measure directed to such an end."

[Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite are very short-sighted when they cheer a sentence like that. They do not seem to understand the matter. Let us have a Suspensory Act by all means. But when we come to the question of compensation I ask who has licensed the public houses all these years? Not the people. The licensing has been in the hands of the classes, and the classes have licensed public houses, which have been the means of demoralising the masses. ["No, no," from the Opposition.] I am astonished that anyone could say "no" to that statement. Can any hon. Gentleman tell me of a single public house with the licensing of which a working man has had anything to do? I contend that the gentlemen of England, those of wealth and position, who have spent their time in licensing these places are worse than those who get drunk at them, for the tempter is always worse than the tempted. I am not attacking Gentlemen opposite. We are all of us guilty. It is clear, beyond a doubt, that the upper classes have produced these houses, and that the lower classes suffer most by them. I say let the Magistrates pay the compensation, if it is to be paid. The plan of the Government is revolting, odious, and repulsive, for by it this money is proposed to be raised by getting the people to spend more on these evil things. We are told that the publicans have an equitable and a moral claim. What is equity? I ask the Solicitor General. Speaking as a layman, I suppose it means an attempt to do justice all round? [The SOLICITOR GENERAL signified assent.] I am glad that the hon. Gentleman and I are agreed upon one point. But if justice is to be done all round, why should not justice be done to the people who have been injured by the public houses as well as to the publicans? If anybody is entitled to compensation it is the man whose property, by being next door to a public house, has been depreciated. Magistrates take care never to licence a house next door to themselves. A friend of mine, with whom I sometimes go on the stump, often says at a meeting, "I have a sovereign in my pocket, and I will give it to anybody who can find such a Magistrate." One day a man wrote to me to claim the sovereign, saying he had found a drink shop next door to a Magistrate's residence. I wrote back to ask "Did he vote for the licence?" and I have never heard a word from that man since. Then there are the ratepayers, and the widows and orphans who suffered in the ruined homes. Is there to be no compensation for them? It is only your one-sided compensation I object to. But I would say to the Government: "Let bygones be bygones. If you let us alone we will let you alone. If you will not ask for compensation for the publicans, we will not ask for compensation for all the misery done by them." What precedent is there for this proposal? Was a single penny paid to the slave traders when that trade was abolished? When the Corn Laws were repealed, 40 years ago, did the great corn-growers receive any compensation? When gambling houses were done away with, did the proprietors get a penny in compensation? When the Factory Acts were passed, did the factory owners get any compensation? Take Mr. Plimsoll's law. I got a letter only this morning from a man who says that when that law was passed many hundreds of small owners of ships were utterly ruined by having their vessels taken forcibly from them by the Board of Trade, and no compensation was given to them. "Many of them," he says, "had to go to the workhouse." Fancy Lord Burton going to the workhouse. He says further, "I myself lost to the extent of £2,500 in this way." No one said they were entitled to compensation; they were doing an evil to the public, and they had to be stopped. You have passed many laws taking away privileges drink-sellers enjoyed. We have had all kinds of Bills. I remember Mr. O'Sullivan saying that if the Irish Sunday Closing Bill were passed hundreds of publicans would be ruined. I suppose they drink more on Sunday in Ireland than on any other day, and someone proposed there ought to be compensation, but I do not think a score of Members voted for it. Mr. Meldon got a Bill through which did away with a certain number of beershops in Dublin which were under a certain rating. Some hundreds were swept away, and not a penny of compensation was given to any of the holders of the licences. But now I come to the gem. On the 10th of August, 1882, an Act was passed to put certain persons, who hitherto had been able to get a certain class of licences automatically by going up to the Magistrates, on the same footing as licensed victuallers. That Bill was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie). I see he remembers something of it. A poor man wrote to me yesterday. I will give his name, because I do not deal in anonymous letters. He writes from 32, Deansgate, Northampton, and his name is George Westall. He says—

"I was, myself, at the Brewster Sessions that year refused the renewal of two off-licences, on the ground that the Justices did not consider them necessary for the wants of the neighbourhood. I held each of the houses on lease at high rents. I had procured the licences by employing precisely the same machinery, and by as much an expenditure as any licensed certificate rendered necessary. My premises were fitted and adapted to the business at a considerable outlay of money, and I had surely as much right to expect a renewal from the Magistrates as any other licensee. It certainly never occurred to me to look in any quarter for compensation. If I had asked for it I should have been laughed at, and so I had to put up with the loss."

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me; these are not my words, but the words of Mr. Westall—

"Yet we have the same Mr. Ritchie, who cared nothing for the off-licence holder in 1883, because he was poor and lowly, and without the advantage of a strong union at his back, telling the deputation which waited on him as representatives of the Church of England Temperance Society he should strongly urge the necessity for compensation whenever the licensing question might be dealt with. I have been connected with the trade all my life—

he must be a respectable man—and while asking you to excuse the length of this letter, and hoping you and your friends' effort to defeat the scandalous proposals of the Government will meet with the success it deserves,

I am, yours,

GEORGE WESTALL."

Now, what has the right hon. Gentleman got to say to that? He cannot speak again, but he may get the Home Secretary to explain what he is going to do for this poor man. At the very first Licensing Session that took place after the passing of the Act of 1882 the Magistrates of Darwen refused 34 off-licences.

Sir W. Lawson

The holders of these licences are wandering about the streets and workhouses at this moment, according to the President of the Local Government Board, and the right hon. Gentleman looks calmly on. I am astonished at him. He says—

"I believe public opinion will revolt against the iniquity of depriving men, women, and children of their livelihood by such a process as that which is favoured by the hon. Member for Barrow."

Unless he tells me he will subscribe to these poor people I shall think there is very little in this cheap outcry about people starving. This Bill is nothing less than an attempt to blackmail the people of this country in favour of the political supporters of the present Government. The Party opposite pretend to laugh at the demonstrations of the Temperance Party. But why do we organise demonstrations? Because we are boycotted by the Septennial Act, and cannot express our opinions at the poll. Let the Compensation Party try to get up a demonstration. You may not think much of our demonstrations, but I say of them that they are composed of bona fide, honest, earnest, working men. When you get up your demonstration in Hyde Park what will it be composed of? There will be a squadron of publicans and pot-boys, supported by the Church of England Temperance Society, and there will, perhaps, be a sprinkling of bishops. The procession will be brought up by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), and, probably, the Solicitor General will preside at one of the platforms. To demonstrate is all we can do. You may laugh. This is your day of power and triumph, and you are making the most of it. You will carry your Bill to-night. [Ministerial cheers.] I thought you would cheer that. But you will not carry the country. Why will you carry your Bill to-night? Why, because the flowing bowl is with you. But the flowing tide is with us. It is setting in very strong: it set in last week from the Bristol Channel, and if you persist with this atrocious Bill, I can tell you the flow of the tide will be fiercer, rapider, and stronger than anything you have any conception of. Yes, you will carry your Bill to-night. You will carry anything in this House with the support of those friends, whom the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian described the other day as being "good enough to disperse themselves amongst us." But will that be the end of the matter? Does anybody out of a lunatic asylum believe that the Government will persuade the democratic electorate of this country to spend their hard-earned wages in pensioning off a lot of decayed publicans? I do not think so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not find the people of this country so easy to deal with. He can manage the fellaheen of Egypt, he can draw their life blood from them, but he will find the working men of England not quite so easy to deal with. Although this criminal conspiracy against order, justice, and morality may have a momentary success, I feel confident that the day is not far distant when your policy will be reversed, and you yourselves will be condemned by an outraged and an indignant nation.

*(5.46.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have listened with pleasure to the humorous parts of the hon. Baronet's speech, but to the peroration I cannot concede the like approbation. Much of the speech of the hon. Baronet was not relevant to the subject-matter of the discussion. It was irrelevant, for example, to discuss what Mr. Bruce's Bill has effected or not effected. It was equally irrelevant to enter into an argument as to the general principle upon which compensation ought to be levied in the event of the introduction of a measure dealing with licensed houses on a large scale, for the present Bill does not touch that principle. The hon. Baronet, while not niggard of praise to himself, distributed censure with a lavish hand on everybody else. The Local Bodies to whom the Government propose to give certain discretion he treated as bodies so given up to corruption and jobbery that no Imperial Tax ought to be entrusted to their care; the Magistrates he treated as persons who always neglect their duties and who have not enforced their discretionary right of refusal to renew licences; and on the unhappy publicans, of course, the hon. Baronet poured out all the vials of his wrath. The hon. Baronet described the publican as a man who kills numbers of his fellow-countrymen. I hope that was one of the hon.

Baronet's jokes. [Sir W. LAWSON: Not at all.] It was rather a lugubrious joke, and I trust that the hon. Baronet in his sober moments will not apply that description to the whole class of publicans. The hon. Baronet, coming nearer to the question under consideration, argued stoutly that there is no vested interest whatever in licences. Into the controversy on this point between the hon. Baronet and the Solicitor General I will not enter, for the Solicitor General is quite able to take care of himself, especially as he has the assistance of Lord Field. I shall confine myself to the only question raised by these clauses of the Bill. The measure does not touch the jurisdiction of Magistrates, or their right to grant or refuse either licences or renewals. If necessary, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ritchie) will introduce words into the Bill to make this quite clear. What the Bill will do will be to sanction the use by a Public Body of money derived from drink for the purpose of extinguishing licences. The principle involved is by no means the principle of compensation. The principle that is involved is this: that a licence is a purchasable thing, capable of having assigned to it some appreciable value. Is that a true principle or not? I think the hon. Baronet will not deny that the practice of the trade has shown that licences are bargained for and sold in open market, and that large sums are paid for them, and these sales are permitted and sanctioned by the law. I invite the hon. Baronet's attention to the series of provisions in the Licensing Acts which facilitate, sanction, and protect such transactions. But it is said that a licence is altogether a precarious thing, so precarious that a Public Body ought not to be allowed to purchase it, especially with public money. In reply to that I have to say, in the first place, that this description of licences is not universally true. It is not true generally of Irish licences, and it is not true of the beerhouse licences protected by the Act of 1869. I do not say that they are numerous; but they are not to be left out of view when you are considering the question as a whole. I am not in a position to state the exact number or to give an answer as to the fact. They are not so few that we can disregard them in dealing with the question whether licensed houses are held on so precarious a tenure that they cannot have any purchasable or assignable value. Then, take the case of an ordinary public house with an "on" licence. I will assume for the purpose of argument that the discretion of the Magistrates is, as is averred, an absolute discretion—not an arbitrary but a judicial discretion. I will assume that, but adding this: that although if that view is entirely correct, as I assume it to be, so that the strict legal right of the licensee is for a year only, I do not suppose any candid man on either side will deny that, at any rate at the end of the year, there is also the chance of a renewal. Now, is that chance of renewal a good, a valuable chance? On that question it seems to me the evidence is overwhelming in favour of the view the Government have taken. The law has been administered by the authorities selected by Parliament, the Licensing Authorities; and in practice now for a series of years those authorities have administered the law in this way: that they have practically not refused to renew licences, either in the first instance or on appeal, unless there has been some misconduct on the part of the licence holder. The right hon. Member for Derby indicates dissent to that, and he is an authority. I hope he will supply the House not with cases of "off" licences refused under a different set of Statutes like the Darwen case, but where the Magistrates have refused "on" licences on the ground that they were not required. Why, the result of the "Sharp v. Wakefield" case came on the public and the profession with surprise. Nobody conversant with the subject had ever come across a case of an ordinary publican's licence being refused on such grounds as that. Well, on the faith of this custom of the Licensing Authorities, money has been invested in the liquor trade. I ask the House whether that state of things does not constitute a ground for some reasonable expectation which has some money value. It is impossible to look through the Licensing Acts without seeing in the mind of the Legislature an intention that the licence should continue for more than a year. Take, for instance, the provisional licence granted on view of plans of a house not yet built. Does any hon. Gentleman really say, as a man of business, and not in mere technical language, that it is intended that the house built in accordance with those plans, should be enjoyed only for a part of a year? If the landlord of a cottager were to do that with his tenant, and turn him out at the end of the first year, I can fancy how the hon. Baronet would pour out the vials of his wrath upon that unhappy landlord. Take again the careful provisions to be found throughout the Licensing Acts for preventing a business lapsing, even in the event of default and wrong on the part of the licensee. If the licensee commits an offence against the Licensing Acts, and forfeits his licence in the middle of the year, there is a provision for another person being put in by the owner to continue the business till the next Licensing Sessions. Again, when one looks at the facilities which the Legislature has given for the renewal of licences, the same intention is evident. There was no appeal from a refusal to grant a licence originally, but there was an appeal from a refusal to grant a renewal. Why are the provisions, that the personal attendance of an applicant for a renewal is unnecessary, and that notice must be given to such an applicant if any objection to the renewal of his licence is to be made, inserted in the Acts? If the law is looked at, it will be seen that "chance" of renewal is a good, valuable, and appreciable chance. A paper has been put into the hands of Members this morning, showing how the interests of public house lease and free holders are calculated for the purposes of the Inland Revenue. From that paper it appears that public houses are assessed to the Property Tax at a much higher rate than houses used for other trades in the same street and side by side with the licensed houses. For the Succession Duty the annual values are capitalised on the whole life of the successor, on the presumption that the licence would so long last, and the tax is levied upon the successor upon that basis. For Probate Duty, the lease of a public house which has 43 years to run, has been valued at £543, and the goodwill at nearly the same amount, £500. The value of that house is, therefore, doubled within a few pounds by reason of its being a public house. It is, therefore, assumed that the licence will continue to be renewed, because without that licence the goodwill is worthless. It is impossible to look at these facts without seeing that, for a series of years, the State has taxed public houses upon the assumption of an undefined continuance of the licence, and not a precarious tenure, and least of all a tenure for one year only. That the licence is intended to last only for a year, because it is renewable annually at the discretion of the Magistrates, is the most miserable technical argument that can possibly be presented to the House of Commons. The liquor trade has been put under restriction and control, and the system of licensing had been invented in part to get an annual duty for the Government, and in part to get the licence holder under proper police supervision. But, as Mr. Bruce said in 1871, the fact that the licence is an annual one is merely a "superficial fact," it is an accident that the term is so short, and it is not designed to limit the term, but to give frequent opportunity for correcting and reviewing the conduct of the licence holder, to see that the business is conducted in a proper and orderly manner. The licence is a restriction and not a boon. If it does give the holder a share in a species of monopoly, that is an accident and not a designed consequence. In 1830 there was free trade in beerhouses. That led to abuses, and then restrictions began to be put upon beerhouses, and finally, in 1869, beerhouses were put very much under the same restrictions as the ordinary public houses. All that series of restrictions was introduced for police motives, and by no means with the view of making the tenure precarious. Therefore, the conclusion I draw, both from the law and the practice, is that the "chance" of renewal has an appreciable money value, due to the manner in which the law has been administered, and to the way in which it has been understood by the public. For the House of Commons to ignore that chance would be to do injustice. What money value has that chance got? Here there has been extraordinary exaggeration during this Debate. I do the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Lawson) the justice of saying that I do not think his speech gives so much reason for complaint in this respect. For the greater part of the speech the hon. Baronet was floating far above the merely practical consideration of the Bill; but the hon. Member for Barrow has actually contended that the Bill gives the publican a freehold in what ought to be regarded as an annual licence. No criticism was ever more groundless. The Bill actually fixes nothing as to the value which is to be given. County Councils are regarded with favour by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Do they think that body is so foolish that they will not be able to avail themselves of the ordinary means in the market to beat down the value of a licence they want to buy? Their agents will quote "Sharp v. Wakefield" to the publican, and will say, "Mind, you hold this licence by a precarious tenure. You will not get your licence renewed if you do not take care." They will also quote the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth to him, and say, "Why, here are Local Option and local veto looming in the distance. You had better agree with your enemy while he is in the way with you. You had better take what is offered." As in any case of voluntary purchase, these arguments will be made use of by the purchaser in order to beat down the value of the licence he wishes to acquire. If the publican refuses to sell to the County Council it will be because he thinks that he will get more in the market. But, if he refuses a fair and proper offer, then the hands of the Licensing Authority will be very much more free, and a refusal to renew his licence will come with very much less harshness than it otherwise would come, because it will be said he had the opportunity of sale, and an offer he might have accepted, and he did not choose to avail himself of it. The hon. Baronet has repeated the argument, urged with much more force and precision by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, that there is no precedent for the State giving compensation in such a case as this, where the State has given to the licensee an unearned increment; that the State might take away that which it has given without recouping the licensee at all; and, therefore, that to compensate for doing so would be to make an unjustifiable use of public money. It appears to me that both the major and the minor premiss of his argument are false. In the first place, the State has, on many occasions, awarded solatium to those who have been deprived of that which was a free gift of the State. Officers, for instance, who held at the pleasure of the Crown, when deprived of their offices have been repeatedly compensated, and there has been no objection raised by financial reformers. Again, it is not true that the added value is a gift by the State to the trade; it is the result of good management, of good liquor, and the chance of a favourable neighbourhood; without these circumstances the licence of a public house would be of very little good. But it must be remembered also that in most cases the person in possession of a public house is a purchaser who has paid hard cash, and who had earned the increment with his own cash. These arguments against the Bill, therefore, fail. In truth, it seems to me all these arguments fail as directed against this particular Bill, because they are the arguments of the extreme temperance advocates who take the most active part in this Debate. What the extreme party intend is that when that future comes to which the hon. Baronet's hopes are pointing, a scheme of such a drastic character shall be brought forward that the hon. Baronet does not like any measure to be passed by the House which bears even the appearance of a fair and equitable treatment of the publican. These arguments are fig leaves intended to cover the nakedness of the spoliation which the hon. Baronet intends. The opposition of the hon. Baronet does not rest upon any arguments going to the merits of the Bill; there was much that was amusing in his speech, but he has not addressed himself to the merits of the Bill.

*SIR W. LAWSON: I spoke to the Amendment before the House.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Baronet knows that the Amendment, if carried, must have the consequence of defeating the Bill. This Bill aims at diminishing, and will succeed in diminishing, the number of public houses, not only by the action of a popular Representative Body, but also in a more direct and forcible way still, namely, in giving public notice to all who are interested in the liquor trade that the state of confirmed expectation, if I may use that phrase, which law and practice have caused to grow up in the minds of those who are interested in that traffic, is now going to be put an end to. There is now a distinct warning that they are not to look to the renewal of their licences in the belief that a licence once granted will be granted as long as there is good conduct. Will any man go to the expense of building and equipping a public house with the chance of only carrying on the trade for a year? I repeat that this Bill gives explicit notice to the whole trade that hereafter their licences are to be for a year and for no more, and will thus prevent any man in his senses from starting a public house. It is a most efficient check. Indeed, I would suggest to my right hon. Friend that there may be a difficulty here from the tenure of a licence being so limited. But, to my mind, it is undoubtedly a provision that will prevent anything like an addition to the present number of public houses. The suppression of licences which will be caused by allowing a Public Authority, by judicious use of the means entrusted to them for the purpose, to buy them up on terms which they think reasonable has been underrated in my opinion. If we cannot carry with us the assent of men who are so warm and enthusiastic on this question as the hon. Baronet, I believe that all moderate men will agree that this plan is one which certainly makes an advance, and which is neither violent nor unjust.

(6.25.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The right hon. Gentleman has in the course of his speech paid considerable attention to the speech of my hon. Friend who resumed the Debate to-night. The speech contained a fervent appeal to the right hon. Gentlemen, who was expected to follow him, an appeal founded upon an interesting and striking letter read to the House by my hon. Friend, the letter of a man who showed in what way the renewal of his licence had been refused—an offence, no doubt, but one subject to precisely the same conditions of law as an on-licence. No compensation had been given, and no compensation had been expected, and the right hon. Gentleman was asked how he could justify the withholding of compensation in such a case and the proposal in the Bill now before the House. I observe that the right hon. Gentleman entirely passed by that question. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted from a paper relating to the levy of increased duty by the Inland

Revenue Department, which he said is now in the hands of the House. That paper is not in the hands of the House; I mention this because it is impossible for me to take notice of a Paper which I have not seen and with regard to which I think the right hon. Gentleman has made a mistake. The question before us, Sir, is attended with some consolatory considerations. In the first place, there is no necessity for treating it as a Party question, and I, for my own part, have as little doubt of the sincerity of the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to produce a diminution of the evils connected with the liquor trade as I have on the other side of the utter futility of the means he proposes, and not only of their futility, but of the extremely dangerous character of those means, and the certainty that they will produce a directly opposite effect to that at which they aim. Another consideration which undoubtedly is to me one of the most satisfactory is that this question is gradually assuming larger and still larger dimensions in the public view, and that the tide of opinion with relation to the drink traffic is undoubtedly a rising tide. Even this Bill is an acknowledgement of that fact; and, indeed, but for that fact you would not have heard of this Bill. But I think that that fact ought to instil into the minds of the Government, and the minds of the vast proprietary interests which the Government in the main represent on this occasion, prudential considerations with reference to the policy of dealing with that public opinion in its present condition rather than waiting for a time when it will have become more powerful and more formidable, and possibly more exacting. In the very able speech of my hon. Friend who moved this Amendment there were indications that he did not urge the House to adopt the extremest course with regard to the settlement of this question. I cannot help thinking that it would be wise on the part of the Government were they to take more cognisance of the actual state of opinion, and the probability that from their point of view the difficulties which they have before them will be greatly augmented with every year they suffer to elapse before they arrive at some settlement of the question. The right hon. Gentleman says the Motion is hostile to the Bill. No doubt it is hostile to that which is regarded by the Government as a vital provision of the Bill. The President of the Local Government Board has said, and I understood the Home Secretary to echo the statement, that the Government will not persevere with the measure should this Motion be carried; but those right hon. Gentlemen know perfectly well that, although this Motion is directed against the main provision of the Bill, it is not intended to offer the smallest objection or opposition to any proposal on the part of the Government to deal with the question of subvention to County Councils for any of the purposes indicated in the Bill, except the one described in the Motion itself. Therefore, although the Motion is directed in its terms against the Bill, it does not bind those who support it to a condemnation of the entire plan of the Government, but it does absolutely bind them to exclude from it the plan for the purchase of public houses. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did me the honour to quote, from speeches made by me about 10 years ago, passages favouring within limits of terms, and favouring, in some degree, the principle of compensation in its application to the liquor trade. I should have been much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman if he had mentioned two circumstances which, in my opinion, are one of them material and the other vital to the case now before the House. The one that is material is, that the law has been cleared and settled since that date in a manner which, in my judgment and in the judgment of most men, saving the distinguished exception of the Solicitor General, is highly unfavourable, not only to the doctrine of vested interests, which the Home Secretary shrinks from maintaining in those terms, but likewise to the doctrine of permanent interest on the part of the publican in an annual licence. What is much more important is that those expressions of mine were used, not with respect to a plan of the character of that now before the House, but with respect to a general and sweeping measure for the extinction of all public houses whatever. The right hon. Gentleman complains of the use of the term "compensation" in regard to the money that would be paid under this Bill. I have some degree of sympathy with him; but I am not sure that if we withdraw the word compensation there is any word we could substitute for it that would be more acceptable to him. I rather incline to think that in the light of dry criticism there may be something in the plea he made that compensation is usually spoken of in compulsory as distinct from voluntary arrangements. That may be so; at the same time, the right hon. Gentleman knows that the public mind has embraced the term compensation as meaning, in connection with the liquor traffic, money paid for the extinction of licences; and it looks no further and does not go more nicely into the matter. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not an adequate description of the Bill to speak of it as one for granting compensation to publicans. It is really, in my opinion, a Bill for buying out an extremely small number of publicans upon those terms which the publicans themselves may fix. He says the buyer of those licences—that is, the County Council—will chaffer and huckster with the publican, and will use all possible means for lowering the price. But what are those means? It is very easy to talk of chaffering and huckstering in the market where there are two people, one of whom wishes to buy and the other to sell; but here there is only one who wishes to enter into a transaction. The publican does not wish to sell; the law has invested him with a perfect right to refuse to sell; the right to refuse to sell is absolute under this Bill, and he will refuse to sell until it is made worth his while. I am not using language of the slightest exaggeration when I say that, in my judgment, this Bill may be fairly described as a Bill for the endowment of public houses, or as a Bill to buy out a certain very limited number of publicans upon the terms which are agreeable to themselves and which come up to the measure which they take of interests that are involved. In answer to this the right hon. Gentleman suggested that if the publican refuses the offer of the County Council, that may be made a ground for the non-renewal of his licence. Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to put into the Bill an Amendment to that effect? I think I may say he will not, and I hold that that fact demonstrates the shadowy and un-substantial character of the right hon. Gentleman's position. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has said that we ought not to object to the payment of this money, this endowment, as I will call it, if the right hon. Gentleman prefers it to the term compensation, although if he does not object I will hark back to the term which is so rooted in the public mind—the right hon. Gentleman says we ought not to object to the payment of this money, which I call compensation, subject to the apology I have made, because it comes out of the drink traffic. I entirely object to that plea. I say this—that so long as I have known anything of the finance of this country, which has been nearly half a century, it has been a recognised and admitted principle that from alcoholic liquors, and especially from spirits, we ought to levy, not, as in other cases, the amount of duty most compatible with extended consumption, but the extremest amount of duty which will most limit the consumption; and therefore all that duty which can be levied up to the highest point is pre-engaged to the Public Service; and I would just as soon you undertook to pay this money straight out of the Exchequer, out of the Public Revenue, as that under a plea of this kind the revenue from the drink traffic should be used specially for the extinction of licences. Passing that by, I wish to point out that the two parties whom you bring into the market to deal together will not stand upon equal terms. The publican is contented with his position. What sort of houses will be chosen as the first subjects of the operations of this Bill? It will be the worst public houses, because they are the greatest nuisance to the neighbourhood; and likewise, in a large number of cases, they do the largest and most profitable business. So the Local Authorities will be urged by public opinion to get rid of these houses, and they will stand unarmed before the publican whose property they seek to acquire and whose chance of the renewal of his licence it is now for the first time proposed to convert into a solid, substantive property—a property in regard to which there are two alternatives presented, either to take it upon the estimate of the man who possesses it, or else to let it alone and allow the existing state of things to continue. It appears to me that nothing can be more deplorable than the position of the County Council in such a case. They are perfectly helpless, unarmed, and have no means of beating down the extreme terms which will be proposed by the publican, as they naturally would be by any man who does not wish to sell to somebody else who wishes to buy. The publican may, therefore, get any price he may choose to insist upon, and he cannot possibly be moved by the apprehension that unless he sells he will be endangering the renewal of his licence. I do not believe there is a single Magistrate who would entertain the notion that such a refusal to sell at a price which the publican might conscientiously believe to be just should be used as a reason for withholding the renewal of the licence. What, then, will this Bill do? It will bring about an almost infinitesimal reduction in the number of public houses. I call it infinitesimal in the light of the figures of the hon. Member for Barrow, which have not been impeached, and which indicate that only a few scores of public houses can be dealt with in the course of a year if this Bill passes as it stands. If that be so, it would hardly do anything to operate upon the vast total of 70,000 licences, which, at the rate of 100 a year, it would take 700 years to get rid of. But the diminution in number, trifling as it is, will not entail a corresponding diminution in the drink traffic. The business of the remaining houses will be increased, and it will be enlarged to the full extent of the apparent numerical diminution of the houses. But there is a more important consideration. In my belief, from the moment that this Bill receives the sanction of the Legislature—and I am rather sorry that my hon. Friend who opened the Debate this evening was willing to concede so freely and fully that it would receive the sanction of the Legislature, for I still cherish some doubts and hopes upon that subject—

SIR W. LAWSON: I only spoke of the Second Reading to-night.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having made his meaning clearer to my own stagnant intellect. I may be wrong, but it is my fixed, conscientious, and deliberate belief that from the moment when this Bill receives the sanction of the Legislature it will add, and add largely, to the value of every public house in the country. Unquestionably I conceive, if that be true, it is an evil a hundredfold greater than any which the most sanguine advocate of the Bill could possibly anticipate from its rejection. What will be the state of things under this Bill, which, for the sake of argument, I will suppose to have become law? Here will be the County Council in the field with a certain limited amount in its purse, which it is legitimately and properly desirous of laying out in reducing the number of public houses, and here are the Magistrates also in the field; and with respect to them I presume it to be beyond doubt that they have the power to reduce the number of public houses by the non-renewal of licences on the conviction in their own mind, it may be, that their number is in excess of the requirements. But if they choose they need not assign any reasons; and there is no authority existing which can compel the Magistrates or the Licensing Committees to declare why it is that they refuse a renewal. The right hon. Gentleman says—"Oh, we have been most careful to keep alive in their full integrity the present powers of the Magistrates to withhold renewal." That may be all very well, and I have no doubt that it is perfectly true as far as the letter of the law is concerned. But will the right hon. Gentleman or the President of the Local Government Board tell me that the position will not be vitally changed in any particular town or licensing district? I take two public houses in exactly the same circumstances and of exactly the same value in the same district. The County Council has bought up one for a large sum of money. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me that under this Bill the position of the Magistrates with regard to the non-renewal of the licence of the other will be the same? My contention is that it will be fundamentally changed. You have a vital change before you from the concurrent or the conflicting action of these two authorities. Take either alternative you like. Take the supposition that the County Council will buy, and that the Magistrates, paying no regard to what the Council has done, exercise their power exactly as before. What will be the state of things then? Would that be endured? The public conscience of the country and the public peace of the country would not allow of it. With such a direct bearing upon personal and private interests, which are always so highly appreciated in this country, such anomalies could not exist for a moment. Take the other alternative, which is the probable alternative. Wherever the County Council buys, the action of the Magistrates and the moral power of the Magistrates will be paralysed. These things are true, whatever you may say about the difficulties of the case; and I agree with you about them. I agree that there are most grave and serious difficulties. But if these things are true it is beyond all dispute that any benefits which you may hope will casually arise from the concurrence of favourable circumstances in some given instance by the operation of this Bill are as nothing in comparison with the consequences that must follow upon its operation, and the effect that it will have of paralysing the jurisdiction in the withdrawal and non-renewal of licences—a jurisdiction which is now living and vigorous. Undoubtedly I sympathise with my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow, who, in his able speech, declared his conviction that the passing of such a measure as this would be to interpose a new barrier, formidable beyond all description, to the progress of temperance legislation. Now, my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow used an expression which has struck me. I have no doubt that he intends to reserve to himself a free discretion to refuse all compensation of every kind and sort, all allowances and arrangements, under any circumstances. But, at the same time, my hon. Friend is a prudent Member of Parliament and tactician, and, I have no doubt with perfect sincerity of purpose, he pointed out that the question of universal compensation is not the question now before us. It is a compensation by a money payment that is proposed in the present instance, and it is to that compensation that I shall limit myself. I may say a few words with reference to the possibility of a wider measure; but to me it is beyond all doubt and question that considerations come into force, when we take into view great changes of the law, and in the basis of the law, which have no existence now whatever. At present, as I understand it, the case of the Government is that the number of public houses is enormous. Yes, Sir; but something else ought to be taken into consideration. Why is it that the position of the public houses in this country of ours is different from and lower than it is in any country in Europe? That is the result of the management which we have followed, and the number does not in the slightest degree tend to mitigate that statement. I am one of those who see the utmost, incurable, radical, and profound mischief from what is called the publican's monopoly, and not through any fault of the publican, or, indeed, of any one. My firm belief is that as long as the monopoly, connected with private interests, belongs to the trade you will never have true and efficient police supervision exercised over the public-houses, and without that they must continue to hold the disparaged and unsatisfactory position which they do hold now, and have held for many generations. I lay down with some confidence this proposition—it appears to me indisputable. The publican himself, or the interests connected with him—and there is a very important distinction to be drawn—can have no claim whatever in respect to any contingency to which they are subject under the law as it stands. It is impossible, if there be a contingency which may befall the publican under the law as it stands, by the regular and legitimate exercise of that law, that in respect to it he can have a claim for compensation. How does he stand? He takes his licence subject to a number of chances. In the first place, subject to the limitations of Sunday closing and short hours. In the second place, he takes it subject to competition of a most formidable kind. He may have the competition of what may be called free licences, the system which was established in Liverpool some 25 or 30 years ago, when the Magistrates adopted, and for several years went upon, the practice of issuing licences to all persons who could bring certificates of character and whose premises were properly constructed. He is debarred on that account from compensation. Then he is exposed to another form of competition, which I conceive to be more formidable still. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, at a very early stage of his distinguished political career, introduced a Bill for the purpose of establishing openly in this country what is called the Gothenburg system. The essence of that system is that no spirits shall be sold as private property, but that they shall be sold by public agents, paid for their labour by salaries out of public money, and that the profits shall be devoted to public purposes. It is possible that such a system might be adopted, but opinion was not ripe for it at that time. My right hon. Friend thought it to be the more prudent course not to ask for an experiment in Birmingham alone, but to extend it to the whole of the kingdom; and the House declined to entertain the proposition by a large majority. But suppose that such a Bill should be passed. Would the existing publicans have a claim to compensation? Not the least. Their legal position would remain as before. Of course, they have no claim to compensation if the licence be taken away for misconduct; and I was surprised at the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, who says that because an Act of Parliament provides for keeping alive a licence after misconduct till the conclusion of the year, therefore the publican has a further interest in its renewal beyond the year. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that there was on this side of the House a disposition to argue that there was something so essentially ingrained and inherent in a licence to sell spirits that under no circumstances could there be a permanent interest in it. The right hon. Gentleman very easily knocked down the man of straw whom he himself had set up by pointing out that there were licences in existence under certain conditions of law to which a permanence of interest undoubtedly attaches. The contention here is that nothing that can happen to the publican under the present law can by any possibility form a just ground for endowing him with public money in the event of his losing his licence from the working of the present law. Is it or is it not the fact that the Magistrates have free power, as was decided in the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield"? The Solicitor General, who represents the extremest of extremes in this matter, has, I am afraid, the honour and advantage of occupying an absolutely solitary position. I do not understand that the Solicitor General goes the length of saying that the Magistrates have not the power of judging absolutely whether they shall or shall not renew the licence. If that be so, how is it possible that while the Magistrates have that power you can consent to appropriate large sums of public money for the purpose of standing in the place of that very power which is given by the law, with notice to the publican—because the publican must be conceived to have had full notice of whatever the present law contemplates and avows—and in lieu of which power you are going to create a new power for buying out the publican on his own terms, with the certain effect, first, of attaching an endowment value to every public house in the country; and, secondly, with the almost certain effect of paralyzing, absolutely and entirely, the active powers of the Magistrates? With regard to the question of compensation, my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow appeared, at any rate, to contemplate a state of opinion in this House under which it was possible that if a general measure was introduced some arrangement of time might be made which would soften the transition in the event of a certain and sweeping extinction of public houses. I am bound to say that I reserve my own discretion upon that subject. I think it is one thing to say the publican has not, and cannot by any possibility have, any claim whatever under the provisions of the law as it now exists in regard to the non-renewal of licences that does not at once carry with it the consequence that if you fundamentally change the character of the law you bring in a state of things which the publican has no means of anticipating—if, instead of referring the question to a tribunal which must consider the whole case, you refer it to the whole population, which would simply express its will, sic volo, sic jubeo, although I entirely agree that it is desirable that the public should be invested with the power, in some well-chosen form, of exercising that restraint which the landlord now exercises where he thinks fit. I do not feel called upon wholly to recede from what I have said on former occasions in regard to the position of the publican.

But this I must say. I cannot conceive any state of things in which the State authority would have the smallest duty or the smallest warrant for looking at anybody in these transactions except the man with whom it deals—that is to say, the man to whom the licence is issued, and on whom it imposes its responsibility. Further than that I do not think it necessary to go at the present moment. I do not enter into the question whether arrangements of time might be made which would attain the purpose, apparently not altogether anathematised by the hon. Member for Barrow, whom I cannot refer to, as I have done repeatedly, without expressing the obligation under which I feel the House and myself are to him for the extremely able speech in which he submitted his Motion to the House. I simply repeat that for the present day and at the present moment I am dealing with the compensation which is before us. Right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench have said that they do not concede that by voting this Bill you would be committed to general compensation under a larger measure. Well, it is always right to give to men the credit of sincerity, even when in giving them the credit of sincerity you seem to be under the painful necessity of denying to them the attributes of common sense. But unquestionably to me it appears, on the contrary, to assume the nature of an argument a priori. I can understand a man saying, "Oh, if you bring upon a publican a set of new conditions which he could never have anticipated, then you are bound to consider some modification of the effects of a sharp and sudden rule which totally alters the practice of a district." That I can conceive, although I refuse this compensation; but to say that you will lay down a law which shall involve in itself the principle that no licence can be touched otherwise than for misconduct, or by the limited power of non-renewal which the Government seem to allow, without a large payment of public money—

*MR. RITCHIE: No, no; we do not say anything of the kind.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to say is that to vote for the present Bill does not at all commit the person so voting to a grant of compensation in case of the adoption of some very large measure of compensation with regard to public houses.

*MR. RITCHIE: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that by this Bill we propose that no licence shall be touched unless bought out under the provisions of this Bill; whereas we have said repeatedly that so far as regards any powers the Magistrates possess they will still have those powers.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: But no licence can be touched, setting aside misconduct, and the power of non-renewal, which the Government admit, but which, in my opinion, they are about to paralyse. I would say of this compensation that it is totally without ground or principle. In principle it is most dangerous, totally unsupported by precedent; and, as allusion has been made to West India compensation, I should like to know what Parliament would have said to West India compensation if £20,000,000 had been placed in the hands of a public authority to go round among the West India proprietors and emancipate such of the slaves as they could satisfy the proprietors they did not need. That is the plan now proposed, without principle to support it, without precedent to recommend it, founded, I have no doubt, on the best intentions on the part of the Government, but so framed that it will work to defeat those intentions, to paralyse every valuable provision that is embodied in the existing law, and throw back the cause for, perhaps, even an indefinite period, the progress of which we have observed and registered from day to day, and in the great future triumph of which we have undoubting confidence.

*(7.10.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Sir, I shall endeavour to deal with this matter from a practical point of view, and the point from which I approach the subject is simply this. Will, or will not, this measure tend to reduce the amount of intemperance in this country? A good deal has been said, perhaps unnecessarily, in reference to the difference between compensation and buying out the publicans. I do not think that that is a matter which is deserving of much discussion. Whether we are going to compensate the publicans or to buy up their houses seems to me a matter of little importance. The real and the practical question before us is whether this measure will tend to reduce the number of superfluous public houses; if it will have that effect, I, for my part, shall strongly support it. If, on the other hand, it can be shown that it will not have that tendency, I shall have no desire to support it. For many years we have been endeavouring to legislate for the reduction of the number of public houses. We have been told that there is a time coming when those unnecessary houses will be done away with, and many of us have been hoping that year after year something would be done to bring about so desirable a consummation. We are now told that if we will only wait a little longer we may have before us some wonderfully good and comprehensive measure that will operate with enormous effect throughout this country. I must say that I am somewhat sceptical as to these promises and prospects, and that I have little faith in such heroic legislative proposals. I think it much better that we should do what has to be done in a gradual and systematic manner. For my part, I should much prefer to see the public houses reduced in numbers by which I conceive to be the most desirable system, namely, by the action of the people themselves in ceasing to use public houses to the extent that has hitherto prevailed. Probably when the force of education and other means on which we may fairly calculate have been sufficiently brought to bear the difficulties attending the solution of this problem will be very much reduced. I think, however, we are all agreed that this process is not at the present moment sufficiently rapid. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth (Sir W. Lawson) has, I think, been very hard upon the Magistrates, and I think it very unreasonable to throw the blame on that body. During the last 20 or 30 years the whole tone of public opinion has undergone a distinct change in regard to this question. In former days licences were granted without consideration, no such questions as are now raised being brought before the public. People talk as if we were going to get rid of the whole of the public houses. There is a class of persons, of whom the hon. Baronet is one, who would absolutely abolish the sale of alcohol. But the great bulk of the people believe that alcohol is a reasonable article of diet, and, in moderation, may be fairly used. No doubt, at the present time, there is too much drinking. When we see, by the Return issued in 1888, that 150,000 persons were annually convicted of intemperance, which shows there is a deal too much drinking. That represents one of every 173 of the whole population who have been convicted of the offence of drinking. If one out of every 173 of the population were found to suffer from some other disease, because intemperance is a form of disease, we certainly would have legislation to redress the evil. When we know, according to the last Return, that no fewer than 1,451 persons died from intemperance, 50 per cent. more than from smallpox, it is quite clear that there is a great evil in our midst. Where does this excessive drinking take place? There are practical and important considerations in connection with this subject. Though, as a people, we are more temperate, still the fact remains that there is excessive drinking amongst a small class of the community. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer rather exaggerated the amount the people drink. I suppose we may say that half the population do not use alcohol in any form, being too young. Taking the other half of the population as using alcohol, I find that the amount consumed, on an average, per head of wine is 0·72 gallons; spirits, 1·92 gallons; and beer, 53·60 gallons. It would be well if all, or a great part, of the money spent in this direction were put into the Savings Banks. But if you distribute the amount consumed over the whole adult population nobody can say that it is an intoxicating amount. The whole consumption per day per head represents two teaspoonfuls of wine, a little over a table-spoonful of spirits, and one pint of beer. As prosperity increases, the consumption of alcohol may increase, in spite of the measures taken to prevent it; and, on the above consideration, it would not necessarily imply an increase of intemperance. I regret that not only the working people, but many others, last year caused the addition of £2,000,000 to the Revenue; still, in its very worst form, that only represents a third of a teaspoonful extra per head of the adult population. I hope I will not be considered disrespectful to the House if I refer to what we do ourselves. I find by the Report of the Kitchen Committee that, in 1889, 11,827 dinners and 8,930 luncheons were supplied—or 10,000 luncheons and dinners. So that it would have meant the same thing had 30 men dined and lunched in this place for a whole year. On the ordinary average, we should only have consumed during the whole Session 10 dozen bottles of wine, less than 30 dozen spirits, and 44 barrels of beer. I am afraid I cannot give what we do consume. The Report contains this very remarkable sentence—

“There are no further details of which, in the opinion of the Committee, it is desirable that the House should be informed.”

We all will agree that hon. Members of this House are models of moderation in this matter, but I would venture to prophecy that the consumption by Members here is, at least, three times as great as the average of the whole community. If every member of the community consumed the average taken by Members of this House millions would be added to the Revenue of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I resent the idea that the working classes are becoming more intemperate; I am certain they are not. A certain section do exceed, but the great bulk of the people, during the last few years, have become much more temperate. They do not agree with the hon. Baronet in giving up all alcohol, and they enjoy it reasonably, as they have a right to do. But the question is, Where is this excess among a small section of the community to be stopped? All will agree that the only way is by limiting the number of public houses at the corner of the streets in London, where “toping” goes on night after night, and where there is an altogether illegitimate use of alcohol. That is really the principle of the present Bill, though I do not believe the measure will lead to a rapid reduction of the consumption of alcohol. It is impossible to suddenly alter the habits of the people; you must work upon the new generation by taking away a certain number of these temptations from the different parts of our streets. Some say this should be done in a drastic manner, without compensation. But we have this fact staring us in the face, that for 20 years we have been trying to do it without success, and the fact remains that public houses are as numerous now as they were 20 years ago. [No.] The hon. Gentleman who says “No” I am afraid knows very little about it. By a Return published three or four years ago, it is shown that in five years the number of licences of all sorts was only reduced by 1,500—a comparatively small reduction; and the number of public houses in these is a very much smaller number. The hon. Member for Barrow has circulated a letter in which it is stated that it would take £250,000,000 to do away with public houses. I will go so far as to say that it might be desirable to do away with public houses to the amount of £100,000,000. Supposing we borrowed the money at 3 per cent. and 1 per cent Sinking Fund; and supposing we reduced unnecessary drinking by 10 per cent., what does that mean? It means a reduction of about £14,000,000 a year, even according to the hon. Member's exaggerated estimate. Instead of £3,000 per house, I think £1,500 would be much nearer the mark; but with the amount given by the hon. Member we would be able to get rid of houses at the rate of 150 a year. Taking 20 families per house, we would reduce intemperance in the first year among 3,000 families; in the second year among 6,000, and in the third year among 9,000; and in 10 years we would benefit 150,000 families. Is it not a fact that that would be a greater result than we have achieved in the whole 20 years since the throwing out of Mr. Bruce's Bill. It is said we should only get about £60,000 or £70,000 a year in London of this money. According to the hon. Member for Barrow's own estimate, which I think very excessive, this would enable us to close 12 or 15 of the worst public houses in London every year. The hon. Member for Barrow says that this can be done without paying anything. We have heard that for 20 years, but the nation has not yet come to the point of determining upon compelling a man to give up his legitimate business, without compensation, simply because a new idea has grown up as to the conduct of the trade. A great deal has been said about the legal position of the publican. I am not a lawyer, and I do not care very much to inquire into the legal phase of the question. I say that a practical common sense opinion is of very much more importance than a legal opinion. Whether you have a legal power or not, you do not and cannot exercise it, and year after year goes by, in consequence, without any reduction being made in the evil against which this Bill is directed. I think I may fairly say that the country is not prepared to promote the virtue of temperance at the cost of the publican alone. I remember once hearing of a lady who was very strong on the subject of vaccination, and who, on refusing to have her child vaccinated, was asked whether she was prepared to go to prison. She replied, she was not, but she would allow her husband to go to prison. This is exactly the attitude Gentlemen opposite assume in regard to the publican. They are very virtuous, and they wish to do away with intemperance, but they are not prepared to pay for it. They wish that the unfortunate publican, who has been allowed to carry on this business for so many years, should alone suffer. Take the case of a trade which is very similar to that of the publican. It is a trade which I myself believe it is not at all desirable that poor people should associate with; I refer to the trade of pawnbroker. I have been trying for many years, by writings and otherwise, to induce poor people to be their own pawnbrokers by putting by money in the Savings Banks and Penny Banks. Well, supposing Parliament could be induced to put an end to the pawnbroking system entirely, or, as in Paris, to do it by the State, is it conceivable that we should allow the pawnbrokers to be ruined because their establishments were closed by Act of Parliament? Certainly not, and yet, in my opinion, the habit of using the pawnbroker is as great an evil of the poor man as anything can possibly be. An attempt is made in the present Bill to reduce the number of public houses. It is certainly a bold measure. I candidly say I should like to see a clause inserted giving the publicans a 10 or 15 years' holding on good conduct, on condition that after that period there shall be a clean board so that we can do what we like. But I do urge hon. Members who have the cause of temperance at heart to remember that this is a question which has been before us for a very long time. We know that in all parts of our great cities public houses are not only in excess of the wants of the people, but lead to enormous temptations. I do hope that we shall carry this measure in the present Session. It furnishes an opportunity of doing something practical, even if it does not meet with the entire approval of the advocates of temperance.

(7.37.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Putting aside all Party politics, I do hope the present Ministry will soon end their pernicious career by consulting the country, because if they remain in power much longer we unfortunate taxpayers will have nothing left to us. Right hon. Gentlemen seem to have adopted the idea that they must indemnify every species of interest that in any way aided them at the last General Election. I respect them for their gratitude, but I suggest that they ought to get the money they want for this purpose out of the Primrose League funds and the Carlton Club funds instead of out of our pockets. In the Land Bill it is proposed that we should buy out the Irish landlords; in this Bill a licence for one year is to be converted into a freehold which is to be purchased out of public funds. A similar proposal was made in 1888, but it then absolutely failed. The Government find that they owe such a deep debt of gratitude to the publicans that they must make the attempt again, and they calmly—if it were not for the great respect I entertain for the Members of the Government, I would say, impudently—adopt the principle which they attempted to force upon us in 1888, and introduce it into their Budget scheme as if it were some small matter of detail. A great deal has been said in respect to the love of temperance on the part of Gentlemen on the other side of the House. We are asked to believe that they brought in this Bill in the interests of temperance. The greatest men have their weak points, and I have always thought that the weak point of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is, I might almost say, the credulity with which he believes in the excellencies of his political opponents. I do not share that credulity. For my part, I have no idea that the Government ever brought this in in the interests of anyone except their friends the publicans, and they do not care one groat whether temperance benefits or does not benefit. But if Ministers have been so very blind to facts as to imagine it is in the interests of temperance, obviously now that every association connected with temperance has protested against the measure, they ought to perceive that they have made a mistake, and if it is alone a question of temperance, they ought to be ready to withdraw the Bill. They must see this themselves. It is absurd for them to talk about acting in the interests of temperance, when all the advocates of temperance, like the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, who for very many years have devoted themselves to the cause, protest against the Bill, and say it will be injurious. What do they do? They say, "We have a Temperance Society that is in favour of the Bill. We have the Church of England Temperance Society." Well, I have no great confidence in the Church of England. For my part, I think that most of the members of the Church of England are Tories first and Christians next. I know that at elections there has been what the late Mr. John Bright would have called an "incestuous union" between the parsons and the pothouse-keepers in almost every village in the country, and when the former have to judge between their duty to morality and their duty to the political party that looks after them, and takes care to protect what they are pleased to call their property against what they are also pleased to call the marauding attempts on the part of Radicals to deprive them of that property, they throw in their lot with the Tories and pothouse-keepers. Tory pothouse-keeper and parson are both in the same boat. But it seems that for once I have been wrong in regard to the Church of England, and that they are not so bad as I thought they were. Their Association is not prepared to stomach this Bill of the Government. So far as I can gather, the approval which the Government boasts of is merely that of certain clerical Tory wire-pullers, who have tried to catch the Association and have utterly failed. I have observed that since the first day of this Debate we have not heard quite so much about the Church of England Temperance Association. The facts have come out, and now we know that it is not the Association, but only the wire-pullers who are in favour of the Bill of the Government. Putting aside the question of compensation altogether, I doubt whether this Bill will be of any advantage to temperance. In some streets, no more than half a mile long, there are as many as 30 or 40 public houses, and at the most this Bill will only do away with two or three of those houses. That will not remove the temptation from the people in the neighbourhood, and I believe there will be precisely the same amount of drink consumed and precisely the same amount of drunkenness. I protest against this attempt on the part of the Government to hoodwink the public by telling them the scheme will cost nothing. No tax can be ear-marked, and when a tax is paid into the Treasury it becomes the property of the entire community. It is as ridiculous to say that the taxpayers do not pay anything because the tax is levied from the publican and the brewer as it would be to say that those who pay for tea have some exclusive and particular right to the tax that is derived from tea. The Solicitor General is the only gentleman in this House who boldly said that the publican has a legal right to the renewal of his licence; but I take the liberty of believing in the law of Lord Justice Fry, Mr. Justice Stephen, and Mr. Justice Field, rather than in that of the Solicitor General. Some remark has been dropped to the Solicitor General by Mr. Justice Field, since he became Lord Field, and from that it would seem that his remarks in the Darwen case were not exactly as reported. Well, I deal with Mr. Justice Field when he was Mr. Justice Field. I do not trouble myself much about Lord Field's memory at the present moment, since he has become a Peer; but it does seem to me a most un-Constitutional thing for the Solicitor General to come to this House and say that he has had a private conversation with the Judge, and that the latter now repudiates the Report of his Judgment, and that, therefore, we are to believe what that Judge confided to him and not the Report. I am a great stickler for Constitutional propriety, and I think the course taken by the Solicitor General is thoroughly un-Constitutional and improper. I think the zeal of the Solicitor General in this matter has outrun his discretion. The President of the Local Government Board does not endorse the legal views of the Solicitor General, nor does the Home Secretary, who is an eminent lawyer, endorse them. The fact is, right hon. Gentlemen opposite do not plead the legal right. They only plead the equitable right, and they base it on the Probate Duty which has been charged on the goodwill of public houses. With regard to the Probate Duty argument, I contend that the Probate Duty has always been charged upon the profits made by the publicans as retailers. I do not believe that the President of the Local Government Board can give a single case in which probate has been paid on more than three years.

*MR. RITCHIE: It has been paid on a great deal more.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Can he give me a case in which it has been paid on more than five years?

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes, several.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am like the angel coming to Abraham. Will the right hon. Gentleman say he knows cases where it has been paid on 10 years?

*MR. RITCHIE: No.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman may perhaps find two or three cases where payment has been made on more than five years, but I should like—with all respect to him—to see them. He may find two or three such cases, but I defy him to show that the average is more than five years. Therefore, if the probate argument is taken as showing a title to something beyond one year's licence, it only goes to show that five years' compensation is the utmost which is given to a publican, not for the goodwill of his business, but for the goodwill based on his profits as a retailer. I have now a sad confession to make. Before I found temperance salvation I was myself a liquor trafficker. I had fallen so low as to occupy the degraded position of a Director of a large London brewery. An hon. Friend behind me shakes his head. He evidently thinks this impossible in me, but I got some advantage out of it, for I learned the tricks of the trade, and it is a curious fact, which has never been explained in the House, that the value of a public house is excessive not because of the monopoly granted in selling beer, but because the result of the monopoly is that the beer is always sold to the retailer at about twice its real value. In the past 20 years malt has fallen in price, hops have fallen, sugar has fallen, maize has fallen, and yet the price of beer at the present moment is the same as it was 20 years ago. The publican, of course, recoups himself by selling the beer at an excessive price to the consumer, and so besotted are these beer drinkers that although the idea of many of them is to get as much for their money as they possibly can in the form of beer, yet they allow themselves from year to year to pay twice the value of what would be a fair trade profit to the retailer. I think it will be admitted that the licensing system was not intended for this. The licensing system, as I say, gives not only a monopoly to the trade of certain persons, but by the operation of a species of ring amongst the brewers it gives the brewers the power of selling their beer at twice its value. When you talk about compensating at a valuation it is something like giving a monopoly, say, to a baker who sells to-day at the price he did 20 years ago, and then being asked to indemnify him because he would lose by not being able to sell. I will, with the permission of the House and from my knowledge of the trade, follow the history of licensed premises from the first, and show to whom the money goes and show how it is that the excessive price charged for beer raises the value of the public house. A man has two or three fields in the neighbourhood of London, and determines, as the town increases, to sell them on a building lease. Naturally, he has some estimate made as to what can be charged on each lot by the building contractors to whom he sells, and he bases on this estimate the amount he shall charge as ground rent. Say that the rent of a lot should be £5; he takes five lots and puts them down as public house lots, and for these, instead of charging £5, he charges £25. A building contractor agrees to take these on a lease for 70, 80, or 90 years, and pays £100 extra because of the facility given him of letting these public house lots at a higher ground rent. Then the builder spends £800 on each of the public houses and sells them for £1,800. Some miserable ex-butler or prize fighter takes a house, investing his own money—£500—and getting £1,000 on mortgage from the brewer and £300 from the distiller, who charge 5 per cent. The brewer makes him contract to take all his beer from him, which means a present of £100 per annum to the brewer, in addition to the £50 interest. This gives the brewer 15 per cent. Why does the brewer get so high an interest? Because he knows the transaction is a risky one—that the publican has only a one year's licence. Of course he counts on the licence being renewed. Then what occurs? As a rule, the ex-butler or prize fighter, at the end of two or three years, makes up his accounts, finds himself owing more than he is worth, and is a ruined man. The brewer forecloses, the house is put up for sale, and another ex-butler or prize fighter buys it, and, as a rule, you may take it that the publican is nothing but a sponge soaking up money, not for his own benefit, but for that of the brewer, who squeezes him. The beer seller is ruined in the process. The other case is where the publican does not intend to make an income out of the public house, but hopes to raise the quantity of beer sold and then to sell the house for a greatly enhanced price. Therefore, I think I have clearly shown what is known to everybody in the trade, that the price of public houses is entirely fictitious; that in London brewers compete amongst themselves for houses, and send up the price because they are able to get trade by doing so, or, in other words, they are able to get 15 per cent. for their money. In the country the system is different; it is even a worse system. In a town there are, perhaps, two or three brewers. These brewers buy up as many houses as they can. The greater number of the houses are absolutely worthless; in reality they would not pay their rent. The purchasers put in men who are tenants at will, and they oblige the men to sign an undertaking to give up the licences to any nominee of the brewers at a day's or a week's notice. The tenant really does not pay any rent, because he cannot make it; he is simply there as a servant of the brewer selling the beer for the brewer. If this Bill passes will any of these publicans get any compensation? Evidently they will not; the brewers have taken good care of that. The brewers understand perfectly well that public opinion is somewhat telling against their excessive profits. They have been wise in their generation. Wherever they have got a chance they have handed their breweries over to the public. They do not tell the public they get their large returns because of the insecurity of the capital. The brewers do not care when they pocket the money and retire to the House of Lords to legislate for us. We have heard a good deal about the poor unfortunate publican; he has been trotted before us in order to excite our compassion. I admit there are many respectable publicans; but when the publican is paraded before the House he has always a wife and about a dozen children, and it is asked if these are to be cast out in the street without anything. If the compensation, or endowment, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian called it, were limited to the amount, say, of two or three years of the publican's profits, and if the whole matter could be thus settled, I should not myself be opposed to it very strongly. I do not say the publican has a legal or equitable right to compensation, but he has a compassionate right, and if the compensation were limited to that it would be a flea-bite, and I would not strongly object to it; but when the principle is laid down that the brewers and all interested in public houses are to be compensated you practically rivet the public houses upon the community for ever and ever. I hope the compensation clauses in the Bill will be thrown out, and that those restricting the granting of licences will be carried. If I spoke of opposing the Bill line by line and word by word I should be called an obstructive. I have never been afraid of being called an obstructive. I was sent here to obstruct bad Bills. I am ready to recognise any Bill which is passed with a popular mandate. There is no popular mandate in this case. Nothing was said about compensation at the last General Election, and it is preposterous to say that any Ministry can calmly come down to the House with a proposal to convert a property not legal into legal property to the amount of £400,000,000, and then complain of the Bill being opposed in every shape and form.

*(8.40.) MR. MILVAIN (Durham): I cannot help thinking, after reading speeches and Resolutions in reference to this Bill, and listening to speeches delivered here from hon. Gentlemen on the other side, that the principle contained in the Bill has been misconceived—I will not say misrepresented. I heard the speech delivered to-night by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermonth, and I heard another, hardly equalling his best efforts, from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and we have just listened to the hon. Member for Northampton. To the latter I do not propose to reply, for I feel perfectly certain that those who know the hon. Member for Northampton best, and are accustomed to the display of his abilities, never treat his speeches seriously. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, I will say seldom treat them seriously. With the hon. Member's attacks on the parsons, publicans, and others I am not now concerned to deal; I leave those for the consideration of his constituents. The speech of the hon. Baronet has been replied to; and then we had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian going through, in his usual graceful and eloquent manner, the operation of making a sumptuous repast of his former expressions on this subject. I do not think it would be in my power fully to reply to the right hon. Gentleman, because it is difficult, after listening to his speech, to determine whether or not the right hon. Gentleman is in favour of the principle of compensation, or for what reason he is in favour of or opposed to it. But there was one expression he made use of in his opening remarks, an allusion to a remark that fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermonth, which, to my mind, is the kernel of the situation. The right hon. Gentleman said, referring to a letter to the hon. Baronet, in which the writer said his licence had been refused and no compensation given, that the argument founded on that letter had not been answered. But this Bill has nothing whatever to do with any compensation given to a publican, or to anyone interested in a licence which has been refused by the ordinary operation of the law. This is not the principle of the Bill, though it may be assumed to be by some who oppose the Bill. It is against this monstrous principle, as laid down by the hon. Baronet, that thousands I could almost say, but not to exaggerate, hundreds, of Resolutions have been directed, copies of which have been showered upon us. The objections of the hon. Baronet and of that section of the Temperance Party who oppose this Bill are founded upon the argument that it establishes the principle of compensation for non-renewal of licence, and gives by Act of Parliament a right to the continuance of the licence or compensation for non-continuance. I do not intend to enter into the law in detail, but, in order to determine whether that argument is fallacious or not, we must look at what is the existing law. I think it is universally agreed that there is vested in the Justices a discretion to refuse absolutely the continuance of licences, but they have no power arbitrarily to deprive the publican of his licence. If Justices were arbitrarily to deprive a publican of his licence, then, by the action of the Courts, those Justices might be compelled to assign reason for their action. So it is right to say that the absolute discretion of the Justices is qualified by a provision which compels them to exercise their discretion judicially, and the refusal must be for valid reasons. Some persons have said that so long as a man's character is good, and the character of his premises not open to objection, his licence ought not to be refused; but these are not the only considerations, though they are important ones, and I may say the leading principles which Parliament has laid down to guide Justices in the exercise of their powers. It is, of course, a very serious discretion vested in the Justices, and they exercise their responsibilities with great care and judgment. I have read an expression in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) in which he said it was a lamentable thing that the refusal of Justices to grant a licence in Petty Sessions should be overruled on appeal to Quarter Sessions. But it is not my experience, and I have some acquaintance with these matters. When Licensing Justices in their discretion, and for valid reasons, refuse to renew a licence, the Justices in Quarter Sessions always give very serious consideration to the case upon which the Licensing Justices have exercised their discretion, and it must also be remembered that the case comes before Quarter Sessions de novo, and frequently to assist them to their decision the Justices in Quarter Sessions have evidence before them which was not adduced before the Court of first instance

We heard from the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth an attack, though perhaps it was not intended as such, an attack upon the Justices, because, he said, the privileged classes granted these licences to the privileged few, as opposed to the masses. But the hon. Member appears to have forgotten that those who are interested in licences are not permitted to adjudicate upon them, while those who are radically opposed to them—the Temperance Party—are permitted to do so. In the recent case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" Lord Esher in his judgment said that this discretion of the Justices, if not exercised with the greatest care, might result in irreparable injury, and perhaps in injustice to many. I think that the reason why it might create injustice or irreparable injury is because the principle recognised in equity as well as in law might be departed from, the principle that the publican, so long as he is of good behaviour, and there are no valid reasons for his licence being refused, has a vested interest in his licence. How does the provisions of the Bill affect the existing law? Does the 6th clause of the Bill create a vested interest?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

*MR. MILVAIN: That "yes" comes from one who has not made himself acquainted with the Bill, else he would agree with me it does not. This 6th section of the Bill gives to the County Council power by agreement with the person having an interest in the licence to buy such interest. Where is the vested interest created there? The Justices may refuse, as they now on valid reason refuse, the continuance of a licence. The principle involved in this section is that a man who has something to sell may sell it to a person who is desirous of buying. I admit that for the purpose of the Bill the man who wishes to sell something is a publican, and that the person who wishes to buy is a public body, but this does not alter the principle that you should not deprive a man of his property unless you pay him for it.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): Is it his property?

*MR. MILVAIN: Surely, so long as he holds the licence.

MR. DE LISLE: For one year.

*MR. MILVAIN: A present possession with every prospect of future possession.

Mr. Milvain

Property in my possession temporarily is yet mine, and I claim to be compensated if deprived of it. The existing law, therefore, is not altered, and as the Bill does not create vested interests the objections raised by a section of the Temperance Party are based upon fallacy. With the principle upon which compensation should be assessed the Bill does not deal. I do not intend to occupy time with this, but there has been much misrepresentation as to the magnitude of the compensation. I think the hon. Member for Northampton said it would take £400,000,000 to buy up all the public houses, and I will not contend with him as to the amount, merely observing that the figures emphasise the magnitude of the interests involved. I will put a question to those who oppose what I think are principles of equity and justice. I should like to know from the opponents of the Bill whether, if they had the power to deprive a licensed house of its licence without compensation, they would deprive, say, the Grand Hotel in Northumberland Avenue of its licence without granting to the proprietors some compensation? Such a proceeding would create such a demonstration as we, as a Constitutional Party, are not in the habit of resorting to. We do not resort to mob law for the purpose of influencing the Representatives of the people, but such wholesale robbery would excite the indignation of a law-loving public, and if you desired to do this you dare not deprive such licence holders of their interests without compensation. How, then, on principles of equity and justice, can you deprive a way-side publican of his licence and his interest in his premises? In accordance with equity in the application of law you could not do so, I unhesitatingly say you dare not, you must not, and I even say you shall not deprive a man without compensation of his interest in his licence. We are told there is a great agitation in opposition to this measure. I take the words from the hon. Baronet, that all men who have been working all their lives in the cause of temperance are opposed to this Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON: I said almost all.

*MR. MILVAIN: Yes; the hon. Baronet made a certain exception. I do not know whether his exception included only the Church of England Temperance Society. I happen to have within my own knowledge the fact that there is a large and influential section of the Temperance Party whose opinions are not so advanced that politics confuse their temperance advocacy, and who are in favour of this Bill. [Sir, W. LAWSON: Who are they?] I will read an extract from a North Country paper, and I may give the name of the gentleman concerned, seeing that it has appeared in the press. On the 6th May there was a meeting of the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Temperance Society, and in the course of the proceedings the resignation of the hon. Secretary, Mr. W. J. Frater, was considered. Mr. Hardman asked the Secretary to re-consider the matter. Mr. Frater then made a speech in which he said he could no longer continue to occupy his position as Secretary if the Society passed a resolution antagonistic to Mr. Goschen's proposal. He went on to declare his opinion that to deprive a publican of his means of living 'for no fault of his own would be to do an injury, to commit an injustice and a robbery. He expressed his conviction that the Government proposal was a serious attempt towards the end they had in view, diminishing the number of public houses, and it would be a serious mistake to refuse the measure. What the politics of Mr. Frater are I have no idea; but his language speaks volumes as to the manner in which the proposals of the Government are regarded by men who are not politicians before they are temperance advocates. In my view, the licensed victualler does not carry on a praiseworthy occupation; but it is an occupation which is, and always has been, recognised by law, and which is safeguarded by law; and, for my part, I will be no party to supporting any Amendment to the Bill, the effect of which would be to deprive him of his lawful occupation without any repayment for the outlay he has made upon it and such interest as he has in it. For these reasons I shall vote against the Amendment.

*(9.3.) Mr. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): The hon. Member who last spoke seems to think that we on this side of the House are opposed to every kind of compensation, and against every kind of arrangement which might break the fall of the publican. But that is not so, and I believe it is in the power of Parliament and of statesmen to discover some mode of letting the publican down easier than the hon. Gentleman opposite seem to fear. But what we oppose is the proposition of the Government, which we believe to be inadmissible. We oppose the proposition with earnestness, believing it to be altogether indefensible. I have watched the progress of this Debate with great interest, for an extraordinary change has come over the position of the Government. Until now the Tory Government has always been looked upon as friendly to the publicans; there has been a close alliance with them, and the publicans have always cast their votes for the Tories, and against what is known as the Temperance Party. But now the Government profess themselves the friends of temperance. We have been told several times that the Government have brought in a more effective measure in the cause of temperance than has ever before been introduced; but the unfortunate thing is that the Temperance Party cannot discover the good they are doing. Temperance people throughout the country fear the friendship of the Government much more than they fear their hostility. The mode of introducing this question to the House by the Government has been eminently unsatisfactory and calculated to arouse suspicion. It is not straightforward to bring in a Bill dealing with a great number of subjects and to include in it one question which is passionately opposed both in this House and in the country. It is an irrational course, and scarcely respectful to the House of Commons. I am not afraid to express my opinion of the measure. To my mind the Bill is a gigantic imposture. It boasts of doing so much for the cause of temperance, and it does very little indeed, and that little in a direction which will do a vast amount of harm. The Government claim support for the Bill because it puts a check on the issue of licences. I am not particularly grateful for that, because it is the very least thing the Government could do. At the present time the country is so covered with public houses and saturated with drink that no respectable Bench of Magistrates would dream of adding to the number of licences in the present condition of things. Whether or not you suspend the issue of new licences by Act of Parliament I believe very few fresh licences will be granted. However, it is a pity the Bill introduces an exception in the case of growing communities. The Government would, I think, have been supported by the opinion of the country if no such exception had been made. The chief achievement of the Bill will be to diminish the number of public houses; but I believe that in 20 years the results of the Bill in that direction would, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, be infinitesimal. The serious objection to the Bill is that it provides payment shall be made for diminishing the number of public houses. It has not yet been stated how much of the compensation is to go to the brewer and how much to the publican. I am told that 90 per cent. of the houses are in the hands of the brewers, and if that is the case the bulk of the compensation will go, not to the unfortunate publican, but to the wealthy capitalist. I suspect that a great amount of time will be occupied before this Bill is passed into law, and it will be interesting to notice if the First Lord will apply the closure. If he does he will make it almost impossible for the temperance-loving people of this country to diminish the public houses. But I do not believe the Government will venture on a contest of such great length. I trust that those clauses of the Bill which relate to this question will be dropped by the Government, as they dropped them two years ago, for then there would be much rejoicing throughout the country, instead of the wholesale condemnation which must follow on a refusal to accept the opinion of the people.

* (9.15.) MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): It has been generally assumed by the opponents of the Bill that there is no vested interest in any licensed house; but that is an entire misconception, because the Act of 1869 creates a vested interest in every beer-house that was in existence on May 1, 1869. The Act is 32 and 33 Vict., c. 27, and section 19 provides, in regard to the "on" beerhouses in existence on May 1, 1869, that "it shall not be lawful" for the Justices to refuse to renew any such licence except upon one of four grounds, namely, that the licence holder is not able to show that he is a man of good character, that the house is the habitual resort of thieves and prostitutes, that the licence holder has been convicted at some previous time of some offence against the licensing law, or that the house is not structurally a fit one to be used as a licensed house. If the Justices or the Quarter Sessions on appeal refused a renewal, except upon one of these grounds, the Court of Queen's Bench would be bound to issue a mandamus ordering the Justices to renew the licence. It is, therefore, clear that the holders of these licences have an absolute, statutory, vested interest. It has been assumed that the number of the "on" beerhouses is insignificant; on the contrary, the number is enormous, and there can be no doubt that every one of these beerhouse licence holders is entitled to compensation, unless, indeed, Parliament is prepared to enter upon a policy of confiscation. A Parliamentary Return, No. 187, dated April 26, 1870, shows exactly how the matter stood on May 1st, 1869. The number of fully-licensed houses—that is the only class affected by the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield"—in the Metropolis was then 5,950, and the number of beerhouses—"on" not "off" houses, which have an absolute statutory vested interest given them by Parliament—was 3,927. The proportion was, therefore, as three to two. That is to say, of all the licensed houses in the Metropolis, two-fifths are, undoubtedly, entitled to compensation in any scheme which Parliament may adopt. The figures for England and Wales, outside the Metropolis, are still more remarkable. The fully-licensed houses at the same date were 63,419, and beer houses 45,203, making in all 108,622, so that beer licences constituted 44 per cent. of the whole of the licensed houses. Therefore, upon the most indisputable evidence, it is established that in England and Wales, apart from the Metropolis, the licensed holders of 44 per cent. of the licensed houses, and in the Metropolis two-fifths, are entitled to compensation. I hope some hon. Member opposite will deal with these figures. I now come to the Return obtained by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, which contains some most remarkable statistics. It gives the figures for counties and boroughs. It shows, for instance, that in Manchester there are only 494 fully-licensed houses, whereas there are 1,640 "on" beerhouses, with an absolute statutory title secured by the Act of 1869.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardigan-shire): Were all these houses in existence on the 1st May, 1869?

Mr. Jacob Bright

*MR. FORREST FULTON: The Return does not distinguish between those that were in existence and those that were not.

An hon. MEMBER: That makes all the difference.

*MR. FORREST FULTON: The Return was made up to 1870, so I think I am entitled to assume they were in existence on the 1st May, 1869. I do not think the noble Lord appreciated the enormous importance of this point.

MR. DE LISLE: The Act provides that the licences may be done away with, on certain conditions.

*MR. FORREST FULTON: Yes, if the hon. Member turns to 32 and 33 Vict., c. 27, he will find the four grounds stated. I have already read them to the House. I may say again briefly that the Act provides it shall not be lawful for the Justices to refuse to renew any licence in existence on the 1st May, 1869, except upon one or other of these four grounds. First, that the licence holder is not able to show he is a man of good character, secondly, or unless the person opposing is able to prove that the house is habitually the resort of thieves and prostitutes; thirdly, unless the person opposing is able to show that the licence holder has been convicted at some previous time of some offence against the licensing law; and, fourthly, unless he is able to show that the licensed house is not fit for the purposes of a licensed house, that it has not, for instance, a sufficient number of rooms. Those are the only four grounds upon which a licence can be refused. I must say that I think, from what I have heard in the course of the Debate, that the Justices of the South of England have been grossly maligned as to their conduct in the administration of the Licensing Law. I can only say from my experience of the Justices in the South of England, which now extends over a period of 18 years, that there is nothing so difficult as to get a new licence. In the county of Essex no new licences have been granted since 1872, except upon the surrender either of a fully licensed house or of two beerhouses. Again, in the County of Middlesex not more than 10 per cent. of the new licences granted by the Licensing Justices have been confirmed by the confirming Committee. In the County of Lancashire there are 2,361 fully licensed houses and 2,069 on beerhouses; in

Kent 1,617 fully licensed houses and 1,065 on beerhouses; in Huntingdon 208 fully licensed houses and 217 on beer houses, and in Somerset 821 fully licensed houses and 503 on beerhouses. In the borough of Wolverhampton there are 203 fully licensed houses and 204 on beerhouses. I have no reason to suppose that the Borough Justices of Wolverhampton have not discharged their duties in the same manner as the Justices with whom I have been brought in more immediate contact in the home counties, and acting upon that surmise it may be assumed that there have been very few fresh licences granted in Wolverhampton since 1869. Therefore, we may assume that, roughly speaking, almost every one of these 204 on beerhouses has an absolute statutory title, and the licensed holder is entitled to compensation. This is a matter which the temperance advocates never attempt to deal with, except in a general way. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby referred to the "on" beerhouses as if they were a mere handful, a dozen or two scattered about the country, which nobody need take into consideration. If the House will consider the figures I have drawn their attention to, it will be seen they deal with facts which ought to be dealt with, and especially dealt with by the opponents of compensation. I will not discuss the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield," except to this extent. I have no hesitation in saying that the case would never have reached the Queen's Bench at all but for this fact, namely, that in addition to the reason given by the Licensing Justices that the house was not required there was another reason, which was that the house was a long distance away from police supervision, and that, in order that it might be subject to proper supervision, there would have had to have been an increase in the number of the County constables, and a consequent increase in the county rate. But for this latter fact I believe the Court of Quarter Sessions would have renewed the licence. I now come to the case cited by the hon. Baronet, the Member for Cocker-mouth, namely, the refusal to renew two "off" beer licences at Northampton in 1882. In my opinion, if the Magistrates refused to renew an off licence merely on the ground that it was not required in the neighbourhood, they did not exercise a judicial discretion. An exactly similar case occurred in my experience in the County of Middlesex, where the Justices took the same view of the law as that which I have just stated. It was, I think, in 1882 or 1883 that certain Justices of the Brentford Division refused to renew 20 off-licences which had been in existence for some years, on the ground that they were not required in the neighbourhood; and the consequence was that there were 20 appeals to the Quarter Sessions. There were at that Quarter Sessions some 26 or 27 Magistrates, including several Members of this House. One of them, I think, was the late Mr. Ayrton, and they gave a unanimous decision to this effect—

“We have a discretion, if we care to exercise it, to refuse to renew, under this Act, any off-licences though they may have been in existence 20 years; but we say, as a Court of Quarter Sessions unanimously, that to refuse to renew an off-licence merely upon the ground it is not required in the neighbourhood is not, in the opinion of this Court of Quarter Session, the exercise of a judicial discretion.”

The consequence was, that every one of those appeals was allowed, and there had never been a single instance since in the Southern Counties of a refusal to renew a licence under such circumstances. It was only an attempt to test the Act, and see what view Quarter Sessions would take of a new Act of Parliament (45 and 46 Vict. c. 34), which was never intended to apply to existing licences. So far as my judgment is concerned, long before the decision of “Sharp v. Wakefield,” I was of opinion with regard to fully licensed houses that the Justices had an absolute discretion to refuse to renew a licence if they chose to do so. But, at the same time, I have always said this, and I say so now, without the slightest hesitation, that we must look at the whole Act of Parliament, and if the Justices have a discretion it must be exercised in a judicial way. When we come to look into the Act, we must remember this fact, that the Act provides even where the licensed victualler commits an offence against the law, so gross as to cause his licence to be endorsed, it gives him a right of appeal to Quarter Sessions. If there is a second endorsement the Act requires that the owner of the house shall receive notice of the fact that there have been two convictions recorded upon the licence in respect of his house so as to allow him to come in and defend his vested interest in the matter; and even when a third conviction has been recorded upon the licence the Act provides that the utmost that could happen to the premises is that they should be disqualified for two years. Side by side with all this is the fact that if a licence is removed from one part of a licensing division to another, the owner of the premises must consent to the removal. The suggestion before the House is that the owner of licensed premises is not recognised by the Act of Parliament as having a vested interest in the property. Yet it was held that in the case of a man holding an ordinary brewer's mortgage (“Garrett v. Middlesex,” J.J., 12 Q.B.D., 620) he had a right to come in and appeal where his own tenant refused to do so. Can it be said, therefore, that the owner of licensed premises was not recognised by Parliament as having a vested interest in his property? Who can doubt that when, in 1874, Parliament introduced a provisional grant a vested interest was not contemplated? The effect of this grant is that before building new licensed premises a man must satisfy the Justices that the licence is required, must submit plans of the building for approval, and must have the approval confirmed and the order made final. Is it to be supposed that a man who has been to all this trouble and enormous expense could be liable to have his licence refused when he applied for its renewal the next year? The hon. Member for Northampton has given some illustrations from his experience as Chairman of a Brewery Company. But his illustrations are perfectly ridiculous to any one who knows the working of the licensing laws. The hon. Member has spoken of five public houses being built on one estate; but it would be a very extraordinary part of England in which any one could get five new licences upon a new estate in less than 20 years at least. Let the hon. Member tell us the estate on which those five licences were granted, for as is such a stounding statement that I can hardly believe it has any existence, except in the imagination of the hon. Gentleman. I have had some experience of licensing matters, and I should like the hon. Member to tell us where these five plots of land were on which this enterprising butler built houses and got licences? I state again, in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that by a Return made in 1870 the number of beerhouses on the 26th April, 1870, far from being insignificant, constitute two-fifths of the whole of the licensed houses in the Metropolis, and 44 per cent. of the whole of the licensed houses in the rest of England and Wales.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): At that time, 20 years ago. I said now.

*MR. FORREST FULTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not shown that these licences have ceased to exist. By the Return obtained by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, I find that in Manchester of 1,600 houses only 440 were fully licensed houses. The beer houses in existence in 1869 still exist. ["No!"] Well, how have they ceased to exist? I can only say my experience of licensed houses entirely differs from that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It is the smaller, not the larger, houses which are badly conducted. The large amount of money, sometimes £30,000, invested in the larger public houses is sufficient to induce care in their management. I believe the effect of this Bill will be to cause the automatic closure of houses which are not paying. ["Oh!" and laughter.] Well, I have observed with great astonishment, for many years past, the number of houses which, though not paying, have been kept on; and I was informed that if they were closed under the present system application might be made for new licences. That could not be done if this Bill were passed, and many of these houses would thus close automatically.

(9.50.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness &c.): Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the opinion of hon. Members as to the matter before the House, they will recognise the valuable contribution made by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman to whom we have just listened. If I differ from him in voting for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Barrow, it is for the reasons I desire to state to the House. I have arrived at this conclusion with considerable regret, for I think it will be generally recognised in the country that the Government have made a very honest attempt to deal with a very troublesome question in the interests of temperance and with due regard to the interests of all concerned. There are certain provisions in the Bill which I regard as eminently beneficial, particularly those relating to police superannuation and free education in Scotland, and I hope they will become law. But I cannot think it right that such clauses as those to which the Amendment refer should be tacked on to the Bill, although I cannot agree with a great deal that has been said in support of the Amendment. It appears to me that under certain circumstances the claim for compensation will be absolutely irresistible. If the Legislature are to make a sudden change in the policy which has hitherto been pursued with regard to licences, it will be difficult to see how on any principle of fairness a claim for money compensation can be resisted. It may be true that there is only a legal right to a licence for one year—that there is no legal right to renewal; but, surely, in dealing with a matter of this kind, one ought not to look at it only from the point of bare legality, but should have regard to those equitable considerations which ought to be taken into account when dealing with interests that have grown up in the faith that the existing policy will be continued. One of the reasons alleged in support of the Bill is that it is desirable the number of licences should be reduced, and I approve that object; but surely it is possible that this can be done gradually, and with such fair notice to each individual whose interests may be affected, that the claim for money compensation will not arise. It is only when effecting a change of this kind suddenly that a claim for money compensation can be made and can scarcely be resisted. It appears to me, therefore, that the true and wise way of dealing with the question, which I admit is one of great importance and even of urgency, is that we should not be in too great a hurry about it. A great part of the discussion on the Bill has referred to the question of compensation, but I do not think it arises on the Bill at all, for the only way in which the Bill affects existing licences is to increase their value by restricting licences in the future. Therefore, there is no particular reason why the Bill should introduce the question of payment to the holders of existing licences. In the vote that I intend to give in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Barrow, I feel that I shall reserve absolutely intact for consideration at any future time the question of compensation on its merits. I confess that I prefer that the matter should be dealt with in such a way—by giving fair notice, as I have said, to those whose interests will be affected—that the question of compensation will not arise. I have come to the conclusion that the results of the Bill, if it is passed, must be imperceptible, or, if we wish to secure results worth all the trouble of the measure, we will have to embark in an enterprise of gigantic magnitude. I will not detain the House longer. I only rose to state the reasons which have led me to feel that it is my duty to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Barrow.

*(10.0.) MR. WHARTON (York, W.R.): I should not have risen to address the House if it had not been for some remarks made the other day by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan). The right hon. Baronet appeared to me to lay the blame for what he called the present condition of things, namely, the superfluity of public houses, not on the Licensing Justices at Petty Sessions, but upon the decisions of Justices in Quarter Sessions when cases came before them. The right hon. Baronet quoted several cases which I was not able to verify, but one case I have been able to inquire into. It was a case which came up on appeal from the Borough Justices of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to the Court of Quarter Sessions at Newcastle. The right hon. Baronet told the House that the reason that the Justices of the borough of Newcastle convicted the publican, and I think endorsed the licence, was that the house was illegally conducted. On appeal the Justices ascertained that the landlord's daughter had lost her watch, and that that was the only charge against the house. The Justices of Quarter Sessions, as I think very rightly, reversed the decision of the Justices below. I have only to say, with regard to appeals to Quarter Sessions, that the cases are inquired into with the greatest possible care. They are there gone into with the assistance of the learned counsel on each side, and, as a rule, the cases there absorb four, five, and six times the period they do at the Petty Sessions. Certainly the blame for the superfluity of licences does not rest with the Quarter Sessions. As to the grounds upon which the Justices in Quarter Sessions come to their decisions, I may instance a case in which I myself was concerned. That was a case in which the Justices of the borough of South Shields—now many years ago—made what was called a raid upon public houses in the borough, and of their own motion struck off no fewer than 31 licences. The whole of the 31 licence holders appealed to the Quarter Sessions at Durham. The Justices went most carefully into the cases, with the result that they confirmed the decision of the Justices below in eight cases, and reversed the decisions in 23 cases. It has been said that there is no vested right or interest or property in public houses, but so good has the Legislature considered the right of the holder of a licence to his licence that it has enacted that the licence shall not be taken away until a Court of Appeal has decided that it shall. I am not going to argue that there is any legal title in a public house, but surely everyone, looking at the matter from a common-sense point of view, must agree that there is an equitable right based upon the custom of the country, and the custom of the country is almost the same as a legal right. Now, one of the clauses of the Bill provides that the County Council shall take over, or make a payment, for such licences as it may be decided to take over and pay for. I imagine that the first thing a County Council, through their Licensing Committee, will do will be to ascertain which houses it is best to purchase with a view to reducing the superfluity of public houses. I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that the most expensive, the most sought after, the most used, and the best used public houses will become the subject of purchase. I have had 20 years' experience of licensing, and my belief is that it is just the least used, the most out of the way, or in other words, the worst houses—the resorts of the worst characters—which will be done away with. The best thing for a public house is publicity. It is just the little houses which pay the worst, and become the resort and abode of thieves and other bad characters. I believe the owners of these houses, particularly when they are the owners of property elsewhere, will be only too willing to get rid of the houses. There is another clause in the

Mr. Finlay

Bill which I believe will prove most valuable, and that is the clause which provides that no new licences shall be granted. The reason why certain public houses have not been got rid of in the past is that the owners have been afraid lest a licence would be granted to another house in the neighbourhood. This Bill takes away that clause, and my belief is that the County Councils will find that in many cases they will be able to acquire the licences of such houses as I have mentioned at a merely nominal price; that the owners will be only too glad to get rid of them, because the public house traffic will then be thrown into other and better houses, in which very probably they are also interested; and then there will be the advantage that in a village, for instance, the police will only have, perhaps, four public houses instead of six, or three instead of four to look after. I am sorry to have heard from the other side a slur thrown upon either the good faith or the wisdom of the County Councils. The County Councils, at any rate, have the virtue of being the popularly elected representatives of the ratepayers of the counties, and surely they may be trusted, if any persons can be, to make the best bargain they can for the county when they come to deal with matters of this sort. At any rate, I do not think they are likely to waste the ratepayers' money. We have heard a great deal about compensation. The object of the Bill is to empower County Councils to purchase the interest in public houses—you may call it compensation or not, just as you please. Personally, I think the word "compensation" is wrongly applied, for purchase is not compensation. If an hon. Gentleman opposite buys a horse, does he say he made compensation to the man he bought it from? In this case there is to be contract between the County Council and the owner of the licence. Compensation, as I have always held, is money paid to a man for something that is taken from him by force. No force is to be used in this case, and, therefore, this cannot in any way be called a question of compensation. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth (Sir W. Lawson) has characterised the scheme of purchasing public houses out of the money produced by drink as wicked; but let me remind the hon. Baronet that the plan of the Government is almost in the exact terms of a scheme suggested by Mr. John Bright, who held a high place in the affections of the people. I consider this a sensible and workable plan. I believe it will accomplish that which we all have in view, namely, a sensible reduction in what I call the superfluity of public houses, and holding this opinion I shall vote most heartily for the Second Reading of the Bill.

(10.16.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Now that we are drawing towards the close of this Debate, we may, I think, ask ourselves what it is exactly that the measure of the Government proposes to accomplish, and how it proposes to accomplish its object. First of all, the Government say that there is a superfluity of public houses in this country, that it is a very serious evil, that it ought to be diminished, and that the only effectual method of diminishing it is to use the public funds of this country for the purpose. When we are going to deal with an evil of this kind, it is prudent to consider how this evil came about, in order that we may have regard to the remedy we are going to apply to it in the present and for the future. How has this evil, this superfluity of public houses, arisen? There are too many public houses; who has brought them into existence? I do not want to say anything severe or harsh of the Magistrates of the country; but this Bill amounts to a vote of censure upon the Magistrates for their conduct in the past. The evil has been created by the authority who could alone have prevented it. That is not all. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite speak of public houses and this system which you justly declare to be a public evil as if it were like slavery, something that has been created and fostered by the State. But this evil has been created and maintained directly contrary to the law of the land and in opposition to the intention of the Legislature as declared in the different Licensing Acts. The whole system of licensing it is admitted rests, with slight variations to which I may presently refer, on the Act of 1828—that is to say, an Act passed 60 years ago. Under that Act it is not denied by anyone that the Magistrates were made Trustees for the public interest in regard to regulating the sale of liquor. They were given absolute authority as to what new licences they should give, and equally absolute authority as to what licences should each year be withheld. That being so—that being a proposition which no one can dispute—we have to ask ourselves how it can be that under such an Act there can have grown up a system under which a licence granted for one year becomes a permanent one, and that you should be obliged to bring in a Bill to get rid of a mischief that has been created by Trustees who ought to have protected the interests of the country? What was the meaning and object of the licence being made annual? Everybody knows, and even the Solicitor General will admit, that in declaring that the licence should be granted for a year, the object was that the Magistrates, who were Trustees for the public, should every year review the situation in their district, and deal with it accordingly. If it appeared that more licences were required, they were given power to grant such licences; whereas if they should be of opinion that less were required, they were given an equally absolute and uncontrollable discretion to refuse licences. If, therefore, the evil, such as it has been represented, exists, it can only be by the fault of those who were appointed Trustees for the public. The charge which Her Majesty's Government, by their speeches and their measure, make against the Licensing Authorities, who, for two generations, have had charge of this question, is a severe one. If they are right in their contention, these authorities, whose power was expressly limited to giving a licence carrying with it an annual interest, have created a permanent interest in all licences which cannot be got rid of except by a vast expenditure of public money. Now, that is a most remarkable view to take of the conduct of those Trustees. What would be said of any ordinary Trustees whose powers were limited to giving an annual interest, and who, after having been charged with the Trust for many years, turn round and say, "We have so conducted our affairs that this interest, which the Legislature told us to give for only a year, has become permanent?" A grosser breach of trust on the part of people charged with the protection of a national interest it would be impossible to conceive. What would any country gentleman opposite think of a tenant for life who, under the terms of a settlement, was strictly forbidden from making leases for more than seven years, who at the end of his period of management, turned round and said, "I have so managed affairs as to grant to every tenant on the estate a freehold interest?" I think hon. Gentlemen opposite would not like such a doctrine, and yet that is precisely analogous to that which the Magistrates have done according to the arguments of Her Majesty's Government. I confess I do not take so unfavourable a view of the conduct of the Magistrates. I do not believe that they have been guilty of this gross breach of trust which is alleged against them. I do not believe that in breach of their trust they have laid this gigantic burden on the nation—that they have imposed such an incubus on it as the Government would represent them to have done. I agree with an hon. Gentleman who said that if in past years the Magistrates were very free in granting licences, they were at the time doubtless acting in accordance with the then prevailing views of the community. The Magistrates now take a different view of the subject, and at the present time share the present feelings of the community in regard to this matter. I think it is just that that acknowledgment should be made. I utterly deny that they have created this property which is alleged by Her Majesty's Government and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I believe that they have observed the law and not given any greater interest to publicans than they were empowered to do. I absolve them from the heavy charge which would lie at their door if the doctrine of the Government were true. I am sorry that Her Majesty's Government should have thought fit to put forward as one of their main defenders the Solicitor General, who has again brought forward the whole armoury of arguments with which he supported the compensation proposals of 1888. I listened with great attention to the ingenious and able argument of the Home Secretary, but from beginning to end it was nothing but an argument in favour of compensation. The Solicitor General still maintains that mistification of the subject on the law in which he has so habitually indulged, and I think we ought really to come to some understanding on this subject. I will, therefore, refer to his statement of the law, and then I will refer to the statement of the law made by Her Majesty's Judges, and the House will have to choose between the law of the Solicitor General and that of Her Majesty's Judges. The Solicitor General made a statement, and said it was not his individual opinion, but the views upon which Her Majesty's Government then acted. He says it is his opinion still, and it is, therefore, to be presumed that they are the views on which they are now acting. Now, what are those views? The Solicitor General said—

"The advice on which the Government was acting, and is prepared to act, is that under the Licensing Statutes the Justices are not justified in refusing to renew a public house licence simply on the ground that there is no need for it or that there are too many licensed houses in the neighbourhood."

And again—

"Taking these Statutes all together, it is not competent for the Magistrates to refuse the renewal of a licence previously granted, except upon some special ground personal to the holder of the licence," and then—

"I believe that the Statutes, if properly read, do give a licensed victualler a vested interest in the continuous enjoyment of his licence."

There is no doubt what are the principles which the Solicitor General laid down—which he says he still adheres to—and what are the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to act in this matter. Now, Sir, I have always maintained—and I told the Solicitor General in 1883, five years before that time, that that is not the law of the country. I told it him on the authority of cases then decided; on the authority of the Law Officers of the Crown—every Law Officer of the Crown, except himself who ever advised on the matter. Such is the law of the Solicitor General, which, apparently, has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. Now let us see what is the law as laid down by Her Majesty's Judges. Some controversy has arisen as to whether Mr. Justice Field said anything as to "vested interests." I shall quote from the report of the case which appears in a book brought out by the clerk to the Justices of Over-Darwen. Mr. Justice Field says, in the course of the argument—

"In every case in every year there is a new licence. That is not a renewal, but a new licence. The Legislature recognises no vested right at all in the holder of the licence; it simply relieves him from giving certain notices and complying with certain formalities which are necessary when he applies for a licence for the first time."

The counsel then says he thinks it does give the holder a vested interest, but that if the learned Judge is against him on that point he will not argue it further; and thereupon Mr. Justice Stephen, who was the other Judge, says—

"I think you exercise a very wise discretion in not going into that."

There is no doubt the words were used, and no doubt Mr. Justice Field may have forgotten a statement made in the course of the argument. But I do not mean to rely on any particular statement made in the course of argument. I rely on the decision on this very point. The Solicitor General said that "Sharp v. Wakefield" did not raise the question. Why, it is a decision on the very point of the issue raised by the Solicitor General—the point of vested right. The Master of the Rolls says this—

"In regard to both cases, new licences and renewals, there is given to the Justices a discretion, and to my mind it is impossible to construe the words otherwise than to say that the discretion given to them in both cases is the same in both cases, and that in both cases it is unlimited."

That is in perfect contradiction to the Solicitor General. Another Judge, Lord Justice Fry, says—

"The exercise of the discretion of the Justices is one and the same, both with regard to persons who are occupying and persons who are about to occupy public houses. No distinction is drawn between the two classes. The jurisdiction and power of the Magistrates are alike in both cases, and the discretion of the Magistrates is alike in both cases."

It is sometimes said that this is new law; but everyone acquainted with licensing knows that that is not so. The hon. and learned Member for North West Ham said he had always been of opinion that the Magistrates had absolute and uncontrolled discretion, and indeed it had been laid down years before by Chief Justice Cockburn that there was the same discretion given to Magistrates whether the licence was a new one or by way of renewal. The Solicitor General said that was true under the Act of 1828, but that it had been altered by the Acts of 1872 and 1874. When that argument was addressed to both the Court below and the Court of Appeal they brushed it aside. Therefore, on the law there is not, and never has been, a shadow of foundation for the unlearned doubts of the

Solicitor General. That matter is not arguable. It has been settled, and long settled, by the highest legal authority. But then it is said that, in point of fact, the Magistrates do always renew, except for personal misconduct on the part of the licence holder. That statement is as unfounded as the law of the Solicitor General. I say that the Magistrates have got the power, and are constantly using the power, of refusing these licences, not on personal grounds, but upon public grounds, because the houses are not wanted, and that licences are so refused without compensation. But if that is so the whole case for this Bill is gone, and worse than gone, because this Bill would prevent Magistrates from refusing to renew licences without compensation. Extraordinary as is the law of the Solicitor General—the adviser of the Crown—it is still more extraordinary that so little of the facts should be known by the administrators of the Crown. I will refer the House to a Return of last year, which contains a list of refusals of licences by Magistrates for the year 1886 and the four preceding years. I call particular attention to this, because I undertake to show that not here and there, and not by scores but by hundreds, the Magistrates are refusing to renew these licences on the ground of public interest alone and because the houses are not required. This is not, then, a dry question of technical law, but of actual public administration. I was challenged on this point by the hon. and learned Member for North West Ham, who has a very extensive personal knowledge of those matters; but he has not a knowledge of the practice throughout the country such as is shown in the paper I am about to quote. Let me give some examples. I will take the County of Chester. Here are two victuallers' houses and four beer-houses in the Leftwich Division, of which the licences are refused on the ground that they are not required. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) is in the House, but here is a case from the Liskeard Division which would interest him. The hon. and learned Member for North West Ham (Mr. Forrest Fulton) said he did not care about the Northampton case, as there had been no appeal to Quarter Sessions in that instance. Well, here is a case where there was an appeal to Quarter Sessions. There are five cases from the Liskeard Division where the licences are refused; and what is the reason, given? "Licence not necessary for the requirements of the district," "Ditto, ditto, ditto, ditto." "Refusal to renew confirmed on appeal to Quarter Sessions." Is my friend the Chairman of Committees going to vote? [Cries of "No, no" from hon. Members below the Gangway.] I am glad he has so many godfathers below the Gangway. This would be an interesting case for his constituents to consider. There are in this Return three columns—there are the licensed victuallers' houses, the beer-houses, and a number of other licences. As regards the discretion of the Magistrates, and as regards the right to compensation for taking away the licences, they all stand upon the same footing, with the exception of the limited class, which does not come in here, of the beer-houses licensed before 1869, and which are specially protected. If you go through this paper, you will find hundreds of cases where licences have been taken away without compensation, and simply on the ground of public interest, and that the houses were not required. I do not wish to weary the House; but I really do regard this as the most material part of the case. Here is a case in the county in which I myself reside. In the Kingsclere Division of Hampshire two off beer licences, and one under the head of "other licences," were refused on the ground, "Licences not required for the accommodation of the public," and on nothing whatever of a personal nature. Then there is a case from the Rossendale Division. Twenty-four licences were refused because of "no necessity" simply. On page 12, I find 15 "off" licences refused on the ground, "Not required," notice having been previously given that they would be objected to on that ground only.

SIR E. CLARKE: Off licences?

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the Solicitor General is prepared to set up some more bad law I will argue that point; but for the present I will undertake to say it was decided in the Darwen case and in "Sharp v. Wakefield," which was a case of an on licence, that the discretion of the Magistrates is absolute in all cases, except in the case of beerhouses, which come under the Act of 1869. In the Leigh Division of Lancashire 48 licences for the sale of beer off the premises were refused on the ground that they were not required. In the Wigan Division of the same county 11 licences were refused on the ground that they were not required in the neighbourhood. In fact, there is not a single page in this Return in which you will not find that in county after county and in borough after borough the Magistrates have been taking away these licences as disadvantageous to the public. The Magistrates have got the power and are using it. Their consciences have been awakened on this subject, and they are doing the work which you propose should be done under this Bill a great deal better than it would be done if your scheme of compensation were established. Whether you take off licences or on licences in this Return you will find that the Magistrates are now cancelling and refusing to renew licences simply on the ground that there are too many of them. On page 37 you will find the Over-Darwen case, and on page 38 there is a record of the refusal of 31 licences. In none of the cases mentioned here was any compensation given. Why? Because the Magistrates knew that they had a right to refuse these licences. The President of the Local Government Board, addressing the deputation from the Church of England Temperance Society, said—

"The Government were persuaded that there was an enormous amount of harm done by the small fry of public houses, houses of comparatively little value, and which probably would be of no market value if conducted in such a manner as they would wish to see."

Well, if these houses are of small market value, or of no market value, why pay compensation in respect of them? The hon. and learned Member for North West Ham, who is conversant with the subject, has declared that there are a great many public houses in the country and in London which are conducted at a loss, and yet you propose to buy these houses up with public money. Was there ever so monstrous a proposition? I undertake the defence of the Magistrates of this country against the Government. I say they have not been neglectful of their duty, and the assumption that you must have a Bill of this kind because the Magistrates do not control these licences is as unfounded in fact as it is absolutely without foundation in law. If it were otherwise the proper remedy would not be a Bill of this kind, but to change the authority, to supersede the trustees, to put in the place of the Magistrates the County Council or some other Representative Body which would do that which the Magistrates ought to have done. The hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Jeffreys) complained the other night that the police do not report the houses to the Magistrates. Is it not perfectly understood that the police are not expected to report houses in many cases? I think the Magistrates would do well if they gave instructions to the police to be much more careful about reporting public houses than they are at present. Now, what will be the effect of this legislation? The result will be to increase enormously in value the property of the great Joint Stock Brewery Companies. You are to buy out the small men, and the big men will be established behind the impregnable barrier of a guaranteed monopoly. A worse use to put the public funds of the country to I cannot conceive. In my neighbourhood the free public houses are all being bought up by one brewer. If a brewer owns, say, five public houses, and you buy up two, the only result will be to increase the value of the remaining three. Everyone knows that is the way the thing will work. In my opinion, you will not increase temperance in the least if you leave three public houses out of five in a village. There will still be as much drunkenness as when there were five. I remember the late Mr. Henley, who was one of the most sagacious men who ever sat in this House, saying that it was a vain thing to imagine that by buying up one or two public houses here and there temperance would be promoted. I believe, from what I have heard since, that that opinion is perfectly well founded. This purchase operation of yours, involving an outlay of £350,000 a year, will act like the Sinking Fund, which keeps up the price of Consols, for it will keep up the price of public houses all over the country in the interest of the great breweries. You do not tell the County Councils on what principles they are to buy. You do not all go as far as the Solicitor General, or that ultra-publican the Member for South Tyrone

(Mr. T. W. Russell) ; but you say that something must be given to the publicans because they have an expectation worth something, and in consequence you propose to buy up some of the public houses and to increase the value of the remainder. A paper has been handed about this afternoon respecting the argument of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) on the Probate Duty. The noble Lord thinks he has made a great discovery—so he has. It is one of the most remarkable mare's nests ever brought to light. The Inland Revenue officers will always get money out of everything they can. Do you suppose that if a man at the time of his death was in possession of smuggled goods they would not take probate on them? Of course they would. To say that the practice of the Inland Revenue officers on a matter of this kind makes any difference is altogether an absurdity. Of course this scheme will operate exactly like a tontine. You will buy out some public houses and increase the value of the remainder. You propose to weed the garden of the public houses so as to allow the plants that are left to grow to gigantic size. You have no right to impose upon the County Councils the duty which you propose to put upon them without telling them the principles upon which they are to act. It is not fair to them or to the public. You say this Bill does not involve compensation. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) pointed out that such a statement was against common sense. What will the publicans say to this Bill? Will they think it does not involve compensation? I received the other day—I suppose as a mark of their confidence—the last number of a publication called Brewers and Distillers, in which it is said :—

“It may be wise or very much otherwise on the part of the Government, from a strictly Party point of view, to re-introduce the dropped compensation clauses under cover of a Local Taxation Bill. With that we have nothing to do. The sole question for us is whether, assuming the Government to be strong enough to carry these clauses in the teeth of opposition from hot foes and lukewarm friends, the liquor trade is likely to stand on a firmer footing.”

And the conclusion at which they arrive is this :—

“If Lord Salisbury and his Colleagues and supporters succeed in passing this Bill, the trade, as a guild and vested interest, will have no need of any further plea for compensation.”

There is only one condition they make, and that is : that the off-licences shall be included in the Bill, in order that the principle of compensation may apply to every kind of licence; and that is the concession which the Government have made to the Church of England Temperance Society.

*MR. RITCHIE: That was not at all what the Church of England Temperance Society asked. What they asked was that so far as the Suspensory Clauses were concerned, off-licences should be included.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, Sir, however that may be, in my opinion this Bill was introduced, not because the Magistrates cannot and do not terminate licences, but because they can and do; and because the publicans are now finding out that public houses are being put an end to without compensation, they demand a Bill which will ensure that they shall not be put an end to without compensation in the future. You say that the jurisdiction of the Magistrates will remain unimpaired. Well, I think my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian has pretty well exposed that statement. You cannot have two Kings of Brentford smelling of the same public house. Take the Red Lion or the Blue Boar. The County Council say to the Magistrates, “It is a bad house, refuse the licence.” The Magistrates will say to the County Council, “Is it a bad house? Then buy it up.” That will be the position between those two bodies. The Home Secretary says that the County Council will be able to offer a particular sum for a house, and say, “If you do not take a particular sum we will go to our friends, the Magistrates, and get them to take away the licence.” I should like to know what will to-morrow be the view of the trade on that threat of the Home Secretary. You say to offer them a particular sum, and they do not take that, you are to give them no compensation at all. A most unjust, or a more indefensible proceeding I never heard. How can the Magistrates continue, as they are now doing, to put an end to licences when you erect a special body for the purpose of buying them out? It is quite obvious, my right hon. Friend the Mem for Mid Lothian has said, that you will entirely paralyse their authority. I was much struck by what the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester said in his speech the other night, that he thought it was very likely that the County Councils would not exercise the power you give them. I am sure I hope they will not. I hope public opinion will be strong enough to prevent their paralysing the hands of the Magistrates and wasting public money. I hope the London County Council will take the view it seems disposed to take, and repudiate altogether an office which, in my opinion, can only be exercised to the public disadvantage. I cannot conceive on what principle the County Councils will proceed. The haggling for these public houses was described by the Home Secretary in a most amusing form. He said the County Councils would hold up to them the figure of my hon. Friend the Member for Cockermouth, and tell the publicans that if they did not take a particular sum a worse thing would happen to them, that then they would point to "Sharp v. Wakefield," and that that would induce the publican to take a small sum. But, Sir, the publican will say, "I do not care for that case. That was only decided by the Judges of the land. I have got the Solicitor General on my side. What do I care about the Member for Cockermouth? I have got the Home Secretary on my side." And, therefore, I venture to say this manner of putting down the publicans will be totally unsuccessful. It is said that we are inconsistent on this side of the House in taking this course on the subject of compensation. I deny that. In the year 1883 I stated these views on the part of the Cabinet after mature deliberation—a Cabinet of which both the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham were Members. In that year the Cabinet expressed a deliberate determination to support the principle of local option, and the transfer of the power of the Magistrates to an Elective Body. That will be found stated in the Debate of 1883, and to those principles we adhere exactly in the form they were then stated. I stated then that we supported and recommended the transfer of power to the authority of a Representative Body, without any proposal of compensation. Now, Sir, it is said that the Temperance Party accept a great responsibility in declining this measure. I admit that entirely, and we accept the responsibility. I say that this Bill does nothing for the cause of temperance which is not equally well and better done without it. You say that you are going by this Bill to suspend the issue of further licences. I am obliged to say to that "Thank you for nothing." The fact is that no new licences are being issued by the Magistrates of this country except upon the conditions which you propose by this Bill. We have already got that security in an ample form by public opinion and the action of the Magistrates, and I deny that it is any advantage that you offer to the temperance cause. Then you say that you get rid of the small fry of the public houses by this Bill; I say that the Magistrates have the power and are getting rid of them already. You say that we must go by degrees in this matter. I do not believe that any great change of this kind can be made suddenly, but the Magistrates are going by degrees, and I hope that every day they will go faster in the exercise of their authority. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has shown conclusively that this Bill will practically paralyse the power of the Magistrates, and that it is an enormous evil. That is the good which you profess. I say that all the good you profess can be done, and is being done now, and we prefer to be left alone. But this Bill not only does no good which is not being accomplished, but it does a great deal of evil. The evil you are doing by this Bill, in my opinion, is that you are giving a practical recognition by Statute to a portentous monopoly. That is a very great evil, whatever you may intend—and I am not bringing a charge of any evil intention against the Government; on the contrary, I believe that they have the best intention in this matter—but we believe that the result of your action will be for the first time to give Parliamentary sanction to and a permanent property in licences; that you will have accomplished that which your predecessors in legislation desired specially to prevent—namely, that licences should have anything more than an annual existence. You are creating by implication in this Bill a freehold property of millions of money which will hang like a millstone round the neck of society in this country, and that is an enormous evil. As to the fallacy that this money will come from drink, I need say nothing; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said enough with regard to that. These we believe to be the evil consequences of your legislation; we cannot and will not consent to it. We believe that so far from advancing the cause of temperance it will greatly retard it. We believe that, whatever you may intend, it is an insidious and a fatal blow to the future prospects of the Temperance cause. You say that you have got the support of the Church of England Temperance Society. Yes, I know, but I think you will find that the Church of England Temperance Society does not now represent, and never has represented, the great body of the Temperance Party in this country. They have had many questions which they have preferred to that of temperance at the critical moment, and though they may have one eye upon the Compensation Bill, they have the other eye upon the next Bill which is coming before the House, the Tithe Bill, and do not suppose that with the Temperance Party in this country the executive caucus of the Church of England Temperance Society is going to carry any considerable weight. Then you have got the aid of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. Well, you have used that instrument so often that you have used it up. The hon. Member for South Tyrone is a faithful and well-trained setter, who at the crack of the Government whip is always ready to go "down-charge." As to the influence he will give you with the Temperance Party, why, his influence with to-day is about on a level with his influence with the tenants of Ireland. He has been advocating both, and he has deserted both. The hon. Member has spoken very freely of me, and I may speak freely of him.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I have not the slightest objection.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sure he has not, because he is a fighting man. Well, the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth said that you would carry the Second Reading of this Bill. Of course you will. Why, with your composite majority you will carry the Second Reading of the Bill, but when you carry the Second Reading you will not have advanced very far upon your road. You are only at the commencement of this struggle, and depend upon it we mean to fight it out to the end. The consequences are too tremendous, the stake is too immense, to be settled by a single Division. We shall offer to this Bill, at every stage of it, the most persistent and determined resistance. We are resolved that the country shall have time to understand the whole question, and the liabilities in which it involves it. We are determined that the taxpayers of the country shall know what it is that this Bill makes them responsible for now, and what it will make them responsible for in the future. We believe that it erects an insuperable barrier against the hopes of temperance reform. We shall resist this measure to the best of our abilities in this Parliament, and if you should succeed in carrying it into effect in this Parliament, we believe that there is no count in the indictment we shall bring against you in the next which will more entirely condemn you than this.

*(11.22.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): We are accustomed to hear from the right hon. Gentleman language such as that with which he has just concluded his speech. We are frequently told that the Second Reading of a Bill may be carried, that we are beginning a great struggle, and that the consequences which will follow are to be tremendous. We have encountered such things in the past, and we hope to encounter them successfully in the future, and even if this Bill does become law we shall face that indictment which he says he will make against us in the country without feeling that alarm which he presages for us. We are told that the country shall know what this Bill makes them responsible for. That is the one thing which we most heartily desire. No measure has been at any time submitted to Parliament with regard to which so much misapprehension, not to say misrepresentation has been prevalent. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman that this Bill will place an insuperable barrier against temperance reform. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to give the Government credit for good intentions, and I suppose he will give us credit for ordinary intelligence. I am unable to see by what means a measure which proposes to prohibit the issue of fresh licences, which affords facilities for diminishing the number of public houses, places an insuperable barrier against temperance reform. At the beginning of his speech the right hon. Gentleman constructed what appeared to me to be a serious indictment against the Magistrates of the country, although he was good enough to say that he believed the Magistrates had, on the whole, done their duty and had acted in accordance with public opinion, and had sought to diminish or control the issue of licences so that they should not be in excess of the wants of the community. There was one interesting portion also of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, in which he referred to a Return presented to the House last year, and from which he argued that a great reduction in the number of public houses had been effected during the last five or six years, by the Magistrates. The Return purported to be a Return of the number of licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors in which renewal has been refused in 1886 and the four preceding years. In the summary at the end of the Return it is shown that in England and Wales 432 publicans' licences were refused in the five years from all causes whatever.

Sir W. HARCOURT: 9,241 licences of every description were refused.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: The numbers are 432 publicans' licences; 832 beer house licences; and upwards of 900 other licences. I think that the right hon. Gentleman said that the Magistrates are refusing licences by the hundreds, and I think he left it to be inferred that these were licences that the County Council would deal with under this Bill.

Sir W. HARCOURT: No, I said scores. I said there were hundreds of licences of all descriptions. Of course, the publicans' licences are much the fewer.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: Now, I think we are getting to the facts of the case. I understand that the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth and the hon. Member for Barrow desire above all to see the number of public houses diminished, because it is the public house which is the danger to the community. Now, instead of these public houses being refused by the hundred on other grounds than misconduct—

Sir W. HARCOURT: No, I do not say that.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: Well, then, it is not to be understood that during the last five years Magistrates have refused the renewal of public house licences by hundreds; that is not to be understood, and, therefore, the power not having been exercised, we are in face of a difficulty which renders it necessary for the House to consider whether it is, on the whole, advisable in the public interests that things should remain as they are. I say that the number of cases shown in this Return of refusals to renew licences on the ground of their not being required is 46 only in the five years. The total number of public house licences refused in the five years was 432. Of these, 386 were refused on the ground of misconduct or because of the houses themselves being shut up; 46 were refused on other grounds than those; and as regards those 46, 26 were not appealed from. There were 20 appeals; of those 20 appeals 15 were successful, and the licences were granted on appeal; and in only five cases were the refusals confirmed. According to this Return we have, therefore, the net result that in five years 46 public houses in England and Wales, out of a total of 67,125, were closed because they were not required, in the judgment of the Magistrates, for the convenience of the neighbourhood. The right hon. Gentleman may be of opinion that that is a satisfactory result and that it is desirable to maintain that total number of 67,000; but we do not agree with him in that view. We think it is expedient, notwithstanding the dangers which he has shadowed forth, to supplement the machinery which is in existence for regulating the number of public houses in England by allowing a representative Local Authority to exercise the influence, power, and knowledge its members possess in order to diminish the number of houses which offer temptations to drink. I will not enter into the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman as to the law of the case; I am not dealing with the law; I am dealing with the facts; and I think I have adduced enough to show that Magistrates have not the power to reduce licences, or do not like to exercise it on their own responsibility. Coming to another point, I think it is right the House should know that there is no trade carried on in this country which is more constantly subjected to Probate Duty than is the trade of the publican. When the Office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was held by the right hon. Member for Derby and by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian Probate Duty was exacted as now upon the goodwill, and upon the leases of publicans to a larger extent, and in a larger proportion than it was exacted, or is exacted, upon any other trade. A paper has been handed me to-day by the Inland Revenue Department showing in several cases the amounts of valuation for probate, as compared with the amounts at which publicans had been assessed to Income Tax; and the figures in three cases are as follows: Income, £300; probate, £1,000; income, £200; probate, £1,000; income, £600; probate, £2,300. These amounts are larger in proportion than in almost any trade that is carried on in the City of London.

SIR W. HARCOURT: On how many years' purchase is assessment made?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman will find that £2,000 is 10 years' purchase of a house assessed in Schedule D at £200; that £1,000 is five years' purchase of a house assessed at £200; that £800 value is three and a quarter years' of a house assessed at £250 a year, and so on. I hope I have convinced the right hon. Gentleman that the value of this property depends entirely upon the licence, and that the Inland Revenue, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Government have assessed Probate Duty at three, and, in some instances, 10 years' purchase. As regards the lease, the right hon. Gentleman is himself aware of the circumstances under which the Property Tax is paid under Schedule A. An examination of Schedule A shows that of two houses, one being precisely the same in accommodation as the other and of the same value, except so far as the licence is concerned, the licensed house pays upon £140 a year, while the unlicensed house pays £100. Then, again, so far as Succession Duty is concerned, the owner of the licensed house pays upon the capitalised value of £140 a year as distinguished from the capitalised value of the unlicensed house at £100 a year. The assumption of the Inland Revenue, therefore, is that the licence will be renewed unless there is any fault on the part of the individual himself; and the evidence furnished by this Return shows that in only 31 cases altogether out of 67,000 in five years has the licence been refused on the ground of public necessity. I observe in the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian there was a singular tendency to hark back to the extraordinary view of Free Trade which I believe he at some time entertained. He referred to a system which prevailed in Liverpool some years ago. We all remember when Free Trade licences existed in Liverpool, but we also remember that universal public opinion put an end to that Free Trade, and it was denounced as being most injurious to the interests of the community. Do what we will, we have to face a problem, and if we can by any means reduce the number of public houses we shall, I believe, be doing great benefit to the community. I will not at this hour detain the House at any length, but I must say a word as to the extraordinary misconception which prevails with regard to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says that if this Bill passes it will paralyse the action of the Magistrates. I have already shown what that action is at the present time, and that only 31 public houses in five years have been closed owing to the extraordinary action of the Magistrates. There appears to be an impression abroad that this Bill is different from what it really is. I have here a Circular from the Congregational Union of England and Wales—a most respectable body, quite incapable of making intentional misrepresentations. In that Circular they protest against the principle of compensation for non-renewed licences for the sale of alcoholic liquors being created by Act of Parliament, or a right given for continuation of licence. That is an entire and absolute misrepresentation. The power to purchase licences depends upon a licence being in existence. If a licence had not been renewed it could not be purchased. It would be contrary to law, and it would be a breach of the law if any money were given to any person for any licence which had been refused. To represent this as compensation for non-renewed licences for the sale of alcoholic liquor is to state what is not the fact. It is only necessary to read the words of the clause by which the County Council are empowered—

"To agree with any person having any interest in premises in the county in respect of which a licence has been granted, with the view of such premises ceasing to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquor," to see that if the licence has been refused there is no power in the County Council to give any compensation to the possessor of the licence. The clause is an absolute negative to the proposition in the Circular I have alluded to. Then I have received a letter from a gentleman belonging to the Congregational Church in Crediton (Mr. F. Allen), in which he says that if the basis of compensation could be shifted from the fictitious ground of legal right or vested interest and payment be made only on the basis of deprivation of annual income, he believed that the great bulk of the people would support the proposal. The suggestions made in that letter are in entire harmony with the provisions of the Bill. The gentleman knows nothing at all about it, but says that if the basis of the payment made was on account of an individual being deprived of his means of livelihood the public generally would support the Bill. That is precisely what we intend to do. We must come to this conclusion—that, whatever the law may be, the licences are renewed. I have shown that the reduction effected in the number of licences, on the ground that they are not required, is absolutely infinitesimal. There is no progress whatever made in that direction, because the Magistrates have before them the knowledge that these men have a property in their licences and the goodwill of their houses, and that it would be absolutely unjust to deprive them of it unless they have committed some offence. Even a Magistrate who is a teetotaler feels that he would be committing a personal wrong in such circumstances. By this Bill we put no restraint whatever upon the power of the Magistrates to renew licences; we do not paralyse their action in the slightest degree. There is the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that the Magistrates are doing their duty with the consciousness that the eye of the public is upon them. I could give the House further instances in regard to the valuation of goodwill, but there is one fact to which I would wish to call attention. In all these numerous instances of probate being charged upon the goodwill, no single application for a return of the duty can be traced at Somerset House, although the person who paid the tax would be entitled to make such an application if the licence were not renewed. Therefore, it can be fairly inferred that the licences have always been carried on to the successors. One right hon. Gentleman, who was also the Chairman of an important County Council, has stated that he did not anticipate the least difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the Bill; and I do not apprehend that the London County Council will hesitate to discharge a duty which the Legislature has imposed upon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby gave us an alarming forecast of the terrible consequences of the passing of this Bill. He has told us we are only at the commencement of opposition that will take the most extreme shape, and that if the Act passes the consequences to us will be most disastrous—tremendous, I think, he said. But I believe that the consequences of the Bill, though not tremendous even for good, will tend greatly to the advancement of temperance. There is no compulsion on the Councils to buy, and there is none on the publicans to sell. I myself rather welcome a proposal which does not involve that unpleasant word "compulsion"—a word that seems so grateful to hon. Gentlemen opposite. But there are many persons throughout the country who are most desirous to diminish the number of public houses, and there are many landowners who will gladly assist the County Councils in the work of reduction. Many who have strong interests in promoting order and peace and morality in their neighbourhoods will do their utmost, now that these facilities are provided, to help to make the machinery of the measure operate. At any rate, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite has admitted, this Bill is an honest attempt on the part of the Government to abate an evil. How was it that we were able to introduce this scheme? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his opening Budget statement, had to confess that there was an enormous increase in the consumption of drink. It was believed that the work of the Temperance Party had arrested that consumption. But it has been shown that, with increasing prosperity and ability to purchase, those who desire to possess themselves of alcohol have largely given way to the temptation. The temperance movement has failed to arrest the desire, and if, with higher wages, we have but to look for a larger Drink Bill, there is a sufficient reason why the Government should believe that the House and the country are prepared to assent to the restrictions which we propose on the facilities for drinking. The circumstances under which the Bill was prepared not only justified it, but made it imperative. Reference has been made to the working classes in this debate, and I can only say that it is not for us to place temptations in their way. It is for us to lessen those temptations if we have the power to do so, but we can hardly say to those men, "We can trust you with the franchise, but we cannot trust you with the control of your own appetites." I admit that it is desirable that we should do our best to reduce the number of public houses, but it is absolutely impossible to carry out any scheme amounting to a total prohibition of the traffic. There is another point to which I wish to refer, and that is to a Resolution moved by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, on March 13, 1877. It was as follows:—

"That it is desirable to empower the Town Councils of boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Acts to acquire compulsorily on payment of fair compensation the existing interests of the retail sale of intoxicating drinks within their respective districts; and thereafter if they see fit to carry on the trade for the convenience of the inhabitants, but so that no individual shall have any interest in, nor derive any profit from, the sale."

That Resolution was supported by, among others, the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, and even by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth himself. It is clear, therefore, that the hon. Baronet was at one time, if he is not now, willing to give fair compensation to the publican. Hon. Members opposite, it is said, are now alarmed at the enormous figures that have been brought forward to show the vast cost that would be involved in acquiring the entire trade; but, Sir, I have always denied the expediency of such a course, and the Government have no intention of seeking to acquire the entire trade. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has spoken of it costing from £250,000,000 to £400,000,000 to give fair compensation to all who are interested in the trade, but I repeat the Government are opposed to such an idea. We certainly think that the number of licences is too large. We desire to diminish them, but we do not desire, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, to pay £250,000,000 of public money in compensation in order to acquire the interest of everybody engaged in the liquor trade. We do not ask that any considerable number of persons shall be compensated compulsorily because we do not propose to take any person's trade by compulsion, and do not, therefore, propose to compensate anybody. What we do propose is that, at the discretion of the Representative Authority, power shall be given to that authority to purchase houses where they are admitted to be in excess of the needs of the population. I say that it is possible to diminish the temptation to which large numbers of our fellowmen are subjected, and I think that this House is bound to second any honest efforts on the part of the Government, to lessen the evils which are admitted to exist at present in the drink traffic, and, without in the slightest degree diminishing the responsibility of the Licensing Authority, or without interfering in the smallest measure with their action in any way in which they can legally act to lessen the evils we all deplore. I say that the House will do a good work if, with that object in view, you enable the County Councils to purchase some of those licences from year to year.

DR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I rise, Sir, not to take part in this Debate, but to ask a question of the Government. I do not know whether they will answer it, but, if they do not, it is one of those matters in which their silence will be as significant as their speech. With regard to the Scotch portion of the Bill, we are in this position—that the Scotch Members approve of it generally, but there is one part of it with regard to which a difference of opinion arises, that is, with regard to the buying up of the licences. The question I have to ask is this—If the Government find that a majority of the Scotch Members are opposed to that portion of the distribution of the money allocated to Scotland, and which does not belong to England, will they withdraw that clause as far as it applies to Scotland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Gentleman must feel that that is not a question which I can answer here. While we wish to pay the greatest respect to the opinions and wishes of the Scotch Members in Committee, we are certainly not in a position to enter into any engagement here.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

(12.32.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House give the House an assurance that the Committee stage of this Bill will not be taken before Whitsuntide?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Committee stage will not be taken before Whitsuntide.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL.—(No. 231.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(12.36.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would put it to Her Majesty's Government that we cannot, at the Morning Sitting to-morrow, discuss the Clauses of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill which bear upon the subject we have decided to-night. Four clauses of the Bill have been postponed. As to that part which was not postponed, we are unanimously agreed; but we disagree as to the postponed clauses, and I would urge on the Government, in a spirit of friendship—deprecating in the strongest degree anything in the nature of a hostile attitude—that, in the interests of the taxpayers and of the finance of the country, the clauses as to which we are not agreed should be added to the Bill, the Second Reading of which we have just passed. If the Government will concede this point I can assure them that the concession will not be regarded by hon. Members on these Benches in a spirit of triumph, or as giving us an opportunity to crow over them; and I think I can also assure them that they will get their Budget Bill with unanimity. If they accept my suggestion we shall have a contentious Bill and a non-contentious Bill, and the latter will pass with unanimity.

*(12.36.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I fully endorse the sentiment of the hon. and learned Member; and trust that there will be no acrimony on either side in regard to this matter; and if the Government are unable to accept the suggestion he has made, I trust it will not be considered that it is owing to hostility to himself or his proposal. The tax the hon. Member has referred to is being levied in accordance with the Resolution of the House, and it would occasion considerable inconvenience if delay occurred in putting the Resolution into an Act of Parliament. Though part of the proposed taxes are to be applied to licensing reform, there are other important portions bearing upon other matters which require the sanction of Parliament at an early date. Under the circumstances, I think the hon. Gentleman will see we are justified in withholding our assent to his proposal.

Committee deferred until to-morrow at Two of the clock.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 4.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. TOMLINSON: I object.

(12.38.) MR. T. M. HEALY: As a matter of order, Sir, I would ask whether you should not leave the Chair without Question put? I would not press you for a decision at the moment, but will raise the point again on another occasion.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is right, and that I should leave the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER left the Chair accordingly.

In the Committee (MR. JACKSON in the Chair).

Clause 1.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. TOMLINSON: I object.

(12.39.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to suggest that a Question should be put from the Chair before objection is taken. An objection in Committee disposes of nothing. But, Sir (MR. JACKSON having left the Chair when objection was taken), I would respectfully submit to you that you should take the Chair to begin with.

(12.39.) THE CHAIRMAN (having resumed the Chair): Though I am bound to take the Chair I understand that, as objection is taken, no Question can be put.

(12.39.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Might I respectfully suggest that a Question should be put before objection can be taken?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have called Clause 1. It is not necessary to put a further question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I submit to you, Sir, that you have just ruled that you should not put the Question.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out that no objection was raised, and the hon. Member in charge of the Bill moved that I report Progress.

Objection being taken to further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

MARRIAGES IN BRITISH EMBASSIES, &c., BILL.—(No. 183.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday, 2nd June.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL.

(NO. 249.)—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Government what they intend to do with regard to this Bill after the Second Reading of the Local Taxation Bill to-night? They promised, as I understand, to re-commit that Bill pro forma with regard to Ireland. I would submit that it is desirable to have the Irish Bill separate and distinct from the English Bill, and that the Government clauses should be tacked on to the former. I merely proffer the measure as a general outline, which is subject to amendment. I want to know whether the Government are in earnest in regard to the suspension of new licences. All parties in Ireland are agreed in supporting my measure, and I would suggest that this Bill should be read a second time to-night, if only pro forma. I beg to move the Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the slightest objection to the principle of the
The Chairman

Bill, though I am somewhat surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have thought it necessary to bring it forward. The omission of Ireland from the Government measure was purely a matter of accident, and, as far as I am aware, it is not even necessary to re-commit the Bill pro forma in order to introduce an Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But that promise was made distinctly by the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what my right hon. Friend may have said; but, at all events, the substance of what he said, and what I now say, is identical—that Ireland should share to the full in the advantages now given to England and Scotland with regard to the non-granting of new licences. Under these circumstances, I think it is hardly worth while for the hon. Gentleman to put the House to the trouble of deciding this question. I have, however, not the slightest objection to his Bill running pari passu with the Government measure, and I do not object to the Second Reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed for to-morrow.

LIFE AND PROPERTY PROTECTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Bill for the better protection of Life and Property in the United Kingdom, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dixon-Hartland and Mr. Moss.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 277.]

SLANDER LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Gully, Bill to amend the Law relating to Slander, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gully, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Addison, Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Caine, and Mr. Milvain.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 278.]

WORKING CLASSES DWELLINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Knowles, Bill to facilitate gifts of land for dwellings for the working classes in populous places, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Knowles, Mr. Ambrose, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Warrington, and Mr. Whitmore.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 279.]

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Select Committee on the Metropolis Management and Building Acts (Amendment) Bill nominated of: Mr. Bartley, Mr. Richard Chamberlain, Mr. Leveson Gower, and Mr. Causton, with Three Members to be added by the Committee of Selection.

House adjourned at five minutes

RECENT ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: My Lords, I rise to ask the noble Marquess opposite a question of which I have given him private notice. I will offer him no apology for asking it, because although the subject to which it refers is evidently a ridiculous fabrication, it is none the less desirable he should have the opportunity of pointing out in his place in Parliament how entirely baseless it is. Yesterday in one of the morning papers there appeared a translation of a statement which appeared in a German newspaper, from which I will read an extract—

"It is an open secret that in the summer of 1889 the German Foreign Office requested England almost peremptorily to conclude an offensive and defensive treaty, and to join the Triple Alliance. By this pressing demand put forward and made the topic at all the clubs, and by Count Herbert Bismarck's appearance, Lord Salisbury was exposed to considerable embarrassment, which was increased by the innumerable questions put by the Opposition, and specially by Mr. Labouchere. The natural consequence was a marked estrangement; and the Anglo-German relations were considerably strained when the Emperor William II. ascended the Throne," and so it goes on. That is the only part of the statement to which I desire to call the noble Marquess's attention, and I do so for the purpose of enabling him to give it an emphatic contradiction.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I am much obliged to the noble Earl for having given me private notice of his question, and I have in consequence looked at the translation of the article to which he refers. It is the most extraordinary fabrication that I ever saw. The statement that in the summer of 1888—is an absolute imagination. The German Foreign Office has never requested us, either peremptorily or otherwise, to conclude an offensive and defensive Treaty, or to join the Triple Alliance. The German Foreign Office and Prince Bismarck, to whom the matter specially refers, were cognisant of the institutions of this country, and knew that it was perfectly impossible for any English Minister to enter into an offensive and defensive Treaty or to join the Triple Alliance, and no such proposition has ever been made to us. I also desire to deny in the most absolute manner that there was any marked estrangement or any estrangement in the Anglo-German relations when the Emperor William II. ascended the Throne. They were then as they are now, and as they have been for a very long time, relations of the most cordial friendship, founded undoubtedly upon the wisdom of the rulers who have guided Germany, but founded still more upon the natural interests and sympathies of the two peoples.

"The German Foreign Office requested England almost peremptorily to conclude an offensive and defensive Treaty and to join the Triple Alliance"

NAVY—FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, I am anxious to call your Lordships' attention to the invention of flashing signals used in the Navy, and to the treatment which the inventor, Admiral Colomb, has received in reference to that invention. Before I go into the matter I should like to make one remark, and that is, that I do not touch upon it in any way as a personal grievance alone, for if that were the case I should certainly not have taken up the question. If any injustice has been done it is not to Admiral Colomb alone, but it is to the whole service of the Navy generally. I have looked into the matter very thoroughly, and I have consulted all the principal authorities upon the subject, and, I have come to the conclusion that there has been no doubt a very great injustice done, and that unless some suitable reward is given to Admiral Colomb there cannot be the slightest doubt that it will be looked upon in the Navy as a great slur and disgrace cast upon that noble Service. My Lords, I will endeavour, in bringing the matter forward, to deal with it as shortly as possible. First, in regard to its importance and value. Your Lordships are aware that it is of the most vital importance that the ships of the Navy should be able to communicate with each other on dark nights and also in fogs, for if men-of-war are unable to make such communication there can be no doubt that their usefulness is very seriously crippled, and undoubtedly they will often be in a very imminent peril. When you consider those circumstances, when you remember that our ships cost enormous sums of money—some of them nearly a million sterling—I think you cannot entertain the slightest doubt that any invention which tends towards their safety or usefulness must be of vital and paramount importance. My Lords, in the year 1859 the same system of light-signals was in force which had been used in the year 1799, and the same signals were used in the case of fogs, namely, guns fired at intervals. The system of signalling which was then used at night was merely the hoisting of a certain number of lanterns either vertically, horizontally, in squares, in triangles, or in some manner to form a particular figure. Unfortunately, mistakes in consequence very often arose. It was very difficult to see the signals at a short distance, and if a rope should get entangled in any of the lanterns the signals were entirely misunderstood, and great trouble was caused. The result was that only a few set signals were used, and even those were hardly used at all. In fogs, guns were used, being fired from one to five times to cover certain intervals. During the period that our ships were sailing ships the difficulties did not arise to the same extent, but directly steam was used the ships went at much greater speed, and the danger from not having proper signals was very much increased. In the year 1859 our Admiralty had become fully alive to the difficulty, and when an invention was brought forward by an Austrian named Redl, they at once eagerly bought it up, and gave £1,500 for what they thought was an improvement. Unfortunately, that improvement turned out to be absolutely useless, and the money had been thrown away. Accordingly at that date the Admiralty looked round and they found a very intelligent officer who had taken a good deal of interest in signalling, and they asked him to undertake the duty of seeing whether some system of signals could not be invented by which signalling could be easily carried on at night. Mr. Colomb, now Admiral Colomb, at once set to work and for several years he worked away with great assiduity to see whether some new system could not be discovered. He found a great many difficulties in the way. He had to search through what had been done up to that time, and try a great many experiments. In 1861, after having worked for three years at the matter, he found himself quite successful, and that he had obtained a system which, if people were properly trained to work it, would undoubtedly be of very great service. Unfortunately, as very often happens under those circumstances, Admiral Colomb found he had immense difficulties to contend with. He found that people were prejudiced, that people would not believe it was possible to be done, and that when experiments were made they were often not admitted to have been successful, when perhaps five out of six persons thought they had been very successful. The result was, therefore, that he was bound to go on, and he worked steadily on until the year 1868, when finally this system of flashing signals was adopted and used. During those nine years he had undoubtedly to encounter very great difficulties. I have looked through the whole history of the matter and found that obstruction was constantly thrown in his way, that he had to encounter prejudice and trouble of all sorts; and I think Admiral Colomb is very much to be congratulated that, notwithstanding all those difficulties, he steadily pursued his course, until finally, in 1868, he succeeded in getting this system thoroughly adopted. During the first six years of that period Admiral Colomb had to pay all the expenses out of his own pocket. But in 1863 the Admiralty paid him a sum of £500 towards the expenses. My Lords, under the old system of light-signals there were constant mistakes made, and they could only signal for a distance of about one mile; but, under the new system of flashing signals, signals can be made up to 20 and 30 miles with the same ease and facility as can be done up to one mile. Under exceptional circumstances signals can even be made at much longer distances, and I believe on one occasion signals were made 60 miles away. That, of course, was done, as your Lordships will see, at once by using the flashing signals against the sky, and so reflecting the signals a long way off. My Lords, I do not wish to in any way make out that this invention was of any novel or extraordinary character. It was really an adaptation under very difficult circumstances of the Morse system of telegraphing. Instead of short and long strokes of the Morse alphabet you have long and short flashes of light for night signalling, and in fogs short and long sounds. As I have said, Admiral Colomb found very great difficulties in his way. One difficulty which I believe he could not for a long time overcome was that it is absolutely impossible to look steadily with the naked eye upon a winking light, or even with a glass, without losing a certain number of the winks; and if one of the winks should be lost the signal would, of course, become totally different. Admiral Colomb said, on the other hand, that this was a matter of training. He said—

“Look at your telegraph instruments. It requires education before men can properly understand them, and if men are trained they will very easily be able to distinguish the number of winks.”

He went on carefully and steadily, and at last he perfected a machine by which he was able, by putting a shade over a lamp, and by means of a certain mechanical arrangement, to entirely obviate the difficulty, and to make an accurate measurement of the time. And thus, my Lords, he perfected his machine. As to its great use, I think there can be no doubt. I believe there is not a single Admiral who has ever commanded a Fleet or squadron who will not acknowledge that without this system it would be absolutely impossible to manœuvre vessels. Your Lordships will remember when the Vanguard was lost, and a Court Martial was held to inquire into the circumstances, it was stated that if the system of flashing signals had been properly used the loss of that vessel would not have occurred. In your Lordships' House sit several Peers who have commanded fleets. The illustrious Duke, who generally sits upon the Cross Benches, and who has lately returned to England, has commanded the Mediterranean Fleet, and is, I know, keenly alive to the importance of the subject, and it was his intention to come down and support me. Unfortunately, he has been detained elsewhere. He has, however, written me a letter which he has desired that I should read to your Lordships—

“My dear Lord Sudeley,—I am afraid that I shall not be able to get down to the House this afternoon in time to be present when you bring forward the case of Admiral Colomb. I should have been very glad to have said a word in support of Admiral Colomb's claims for his most valuable invention of flashing signals, for I have had great experience of their use during the long period that I have had command of squadrons in the Royal Navy. I may safely say that without these signals squadrons could not be handled as at present, and every modern invention, such as the electric light, &c., adds to the usefulness of the system instead of detracting in any way from the value of the original invention. Believe me, yours very truly, ALFRED.”

I ought, my Lords, to have mentioned that it is quite immaterial what light is used for the flash, though, of course, if the electric light is used the flash is very much stronger and brighter. I have also a letter from Sir Thomas Symonds, Admiral of the Fleet, upon the subject, and he writes in exactly the same way—

“Having had experience of Admiral Colomb's flashing signals twice in command of fleet, I have always found them answer most satisfactorily without a hitch. They are of the utmost possible importance towards the safety and convenience of a fleet. They turn night into day. Admiral Colomb has conferred upon the Navy an inestimable benefit, more particularly during war, by his most talented invention, and I consider him deserving of great reward. In fact, it would be difficult to find an adequate recompense. He has been shockingly treated; his promotion has been very slow, and though he makes our Navy safe by night and in fogs, he is most unhand-somely awarded only £500, while his brother officer in the Sister Service is awarded £25,000 for a range-finder. I cannot understand his having been so meanly treated.”

Then, my Lords, the noble Lord Alcester, who has unfortunately been prevented by a severe accident from coming down to the House to-night as he intended to, most heartily supports this Motion. He has, however, written from his sick bed most strongly in favour of it. He says—

"There is no man now in existence who has done so much to improve the 'conducting' of Her Majesty's ships in safety as Admiral Colomb has done by his system of night signals. They have now been adopted by nearly every Maritime Power in the world, with modifications it is true, but the principle on which they are worked remains the same, and this during your service in the Royal Navy you must have been well aware of.

"His invention has rescued us from a slough of despond in which we had found ourselves from the days of Benbow, when the sole mode of communicating by signal by night was by means of lanterns, the lights of which could not be relied upon for remaining unextinguished in gales or rainy weather; whereas at the present day his system has been worked by aid of the electric light, when necessary, at distances at which the ancient signals could not have been discerned.

"And for this valuable invention all that Admiral Colomb has received is £500, and out of this he has had to pay £380 for maintaining the patent rights. Can anything be more miserable?"

My Lords, I will not weary you with many quotations, but I have here another letter from Admiral Sir Geoffrey Hornby. He has the reputation in the Navy of being one of the best of our Admirals in Fleet evolutions. He was two years at the Admiralty and is well up in the subject. He writes in very similar terms. After referring to his various commands he has had he states—"In the year 1863 he was Flag Captain to the late Sir Sydney Dacres when that Officer was ordered to try Colomb's system of night signals"

—this was when Admiral Colomb had first, as he believed, made this satisfactory invention, and five years before it was finally adopted in the Service—

"and they enabled him to order any manœuvre and to make any communication to his ships by night as the same could be done by day."

Then he says—

"It gave the Queen's Navy greater proportional advantages when compared with the old system than electric telegraphy gave over a system of semaphores, because under the old system we were limited at night to some 104 signals, each conveying our order or piece of information, e.g., 'Tack,' 'Wear stern most,' 'Ships first,' 'Have struck soundings,' 'Standing into danger,' &c., &c. But by Colomb's system any sentence may be signalled and any word spelt.

Lord Sudeley

"In this view it has always appeared to me that it was a professional disgrace that an officer who gave such great advantages to our Service should not receive an adequate reward."

My Lords, I will read only one more letter. It is from Admiral Sir George Wellesley, who has also commanded our Fleets. He says—

"It is hardly possible to overrate its importance, or for anyone who has not had personal and practical experience of this invention to estimate its full value, or how much it has conduced to the safety and efficiency of Her Majesty's Fleet.

"We have with Colomb's signals the power not only of conveying instantaneously every signal in our books but also any other communication either to the Fleet in general or any group of or single ship with perfect accuracy and rapidity. And, in conclusion, I would state that it is no less a curious than a true fact that signalling has been rendered more easy and rapid by night than by day, and with much less liability to mistake."

I will not weary your Lordships with any other quotations. It is perfectly clear, from the testimony of these eminent Naval Officers, that this system has undoubted advantages, and now, my Lords, let us see what reward has been given to its inventor. It has been urged that the sum which was given in the year 1868 was given as a reward or recompense. My Lords, it was given, not as a recompense, but to cover expenses. Admiral Colomb's expenses were very great. He had to pay no less than £380 for patent fees alone, leaving only £120 to go towards other expenses. But, my Lords, that point is too trivial to discuss at all, and I hardly think it is necessary to consider it. The actual fact is that Admiral Colomb has succeeded in inventing a system which has enabled our fleets to conduct operations at night, and in fogs, without any loss or risk whatever, and in doing so he has done a great service which I think your Lordships will agree ought to be adequately rewarded. I have heard for many years that constant communications have been going on between the Admiralty and the Treasury; but they have been without any result whatever, and I hope, when I have concluded my Motion, that my noble Friend will admit that the letters and documents in this matter may with advantage be laid on the Table. For some time it has been urged, and I believe that several letters have passed to that effect, that when Admiral Colomb perfected a land system of signalling for the Army, or for use in the Land Services, and when he received £500 for that, he thereby gave up all claim on the Treasury in respect of his invention for the Navy. But, my Lords, that was distinctly not the case. My noble Friend Lord Northbrook, who was at that time Under Secretary for War, has publicly stated that when the £500 was given Admiral Colomb made a distinct stipulation that he only accepted it as a reward for the small service he had done for signalling in the Army, and that it was on no ground whatever to be supposed that he was prevented from obtaining proper compensation for the invention used in the Navy. Therefore, I think, my Lords, we may at any rate drop that argument. But as several questions have arisen at different times as to whether Admiral Colomb had given up his right to compensation, he very wisely a short time ago placed all the documents and papers before a great legal authority, Sir Henry James, whose opinion was to this effect—"I think that Admiral Colomb did not, either in letter or spirit, accept the sums received by him in full satisfaction of all his claims, and that, therefore, Admiral Colomb is not precluded from pressing his claims for full and complete recompense for the services he has rendered to the country." I think, my Lords that disposes entirely of that matter. Last year a deputation waited on the First Lord of the Admiralty, and it was a very important deputation, consisting of six Members of your Lordships' House and six Members of the other House. The First Lord of the Admiralty then stated that he fully appreciated the value of this invention; that he sincerely hoped something might be done, and indeed that he thought the invention deserved a proper reward, and he would at once communicate to the Treasury, and he hoped the matter would soon be settled. Another year has passed and nothing has been done. This matter remains in the same state, a slur and disgrace upon the Navy. My Lords, I cannot believe for one moment that if this had occurred in the Sister Service—the Army—such service would have been allowed to remain unrewarded. I feel sure that long before this a reward of, say, £20,000 or £30,000 and a K.C.B. would have been given to any officer in the Army who had made such an invention. In saying this I do not speak without book. Some short time ago an invention was made for use in the Sister Service which cannot really, I think, be compared with this so far as the importance of the invention and its great advantages to the Navy are concerned, though that invention will be of great use no doubt for the Land Service. I am speaking of the range-finder; and, in time of war, certainly the range-finder will be of enormous utility. But what did Major Watkin, the inventor, receive as a fitting reward for that invention? He received £25,000 and £1,000 for 10 years. These two inventions ought to be put on a par. They are practically of the same character. Then, my Lords, there have been other inventions paid for very largely. For instance, only two years ago the enormous sum of £110,000 was paid for the Brennan torpedo. One argument has been used in this matter which I should like to meet, and that is that the invention was made so long ago that all claim has really dropped by lapse of time, that as Admiral Colomb has allowed the matter to drift for 25 years he has no claim now. I think this argument can hardly stand good. In the first place, Admiral Colomb was, up to a very short time ago, on full pay, and his position in the Navy prevented him from pressing his claims. Until he became a retired officer he could not bring that pressure to bear which he is now inclined to do, and to bring his claims prominently forward. Surely, my Lords, this is a case in which we ought to act in a large and generous spirit. It would be right, in the true interests of the Navy that such a view should be taken. When dealing with a profession where you have such a splendid body of officers animated with the highest principles of honour, loyalty, and zeal, no feeling of ill-use or bitterness should be allowed to arise. No doubt the Treasury, as guardians of the public purse, are bound to see that no money is wasted, but, on the other hand, it must not be forgotten that the Navy stands in a very peculiar position. It is a Service in which great hardships and personal discomforts have to be undergone, and it deserves the utmost consideration. Naval officers have great trials to bear. Our ships are at sea on foreign stations for many years, and our Naval officers are away from their homes for lengthened periods. The old system of pleasant cruizes in the days of sailing ships no longer exist. Constantly officers have to spend months and years cooped up in ships which are practically great masses of machinery and nothing else, and they have to spend weeks and months in harbour. I mention these things to show that there are great hardships to be borne in the Navy, and I think it would be a great pity if rewards were thought not to be properly bestowed. I maintain that, instead of being over-critical, the Government should rather go out of their way to see how far they could add to the popularity of the Navy, and to let the officers know that merit and zeal will be amply rewarded. Unfortunately, for several years past a very strong feeling has grown up in the Navy that, whilst in the Sister Service honours and rewards are looked after with the greatest care and attention, that is not the case to anything like the same extent in the Navy. I apprehend that is a matter deserving of the greatest care and consideration on the part of those in authority, lest the feeling should spread and produce serious discontent. I make this statement with considerable diffidence: I know I shall be told that it is wrong to mention it; but I am certain that that feeling exists in a far greater degree than the Admiralty themselves are at all aware of, and I am afraid that the manner in which Admiral Colomb's invention has been treated has created a feeling of bitterness of the extent of which few are aware. I will not trouble your Lordships any further. I will only say this, in conclusion: that here you have an instance of an invention which has been in the highest degree successful, an enormous saving to the country by preventing loss of vessels and a great boon to the Navy; you have an officer of high distinction, who has never had a single thing against him, absolutely unrewarded; you have every distinguished officer of the Navy of whom inquiry has been made strongly of opinion that the invention is of enormous benefit to the Navy. Every officer in the Navy, as far as I have ever heard, feels most acutely that gross injustice has been done, and that a slur and disgrace has been cast upon his profession which ought to be removed. My Lords, I sincerely hope that my noble and gallant Friend who is about to answer this question on behalf of the Admiralty, and who of all men is well aware how strong this feeling is in the Navy, will be able to tell us that at last the Treasury have given way to the Admiralty, and that even at the eleventh hour they see their way to giving Admiral Colomb proper compensation, due meed of honour, and suitable reward, so that we may no longer have before us this great disgrace to the Service.

Moved,

"That there be laid before the House correspondence between the Treasury and the Admiralty relating to the claim of Admiral Colomb for reward as the inventor of flashing signals."
—(L. Sudeley).

THE EARL OF CLANWILLIAM: My Lords, I regret very much the absence of Lord Alcester, whose opinion would have great weight with your Lordships, for he would have given us his own personal experience of the value of Admiral Colomb's flashing signals. I can only say from my own experience that I entirely concur in all that has fallen from my noble Friend. In former days, as he has described, the system of night signalling was by lanterns, which were hoisted up in various positions over or alongside each other. It took a considerable time to light the lanterns, and sometimes they were all blown out, and had to be taken down and lit again. Then, again, the light thrown by the lanterns could not be seen except in clear weather, and in fogs they were of no use whatever. But with this flashing system you can signal very much quicker at night to either a single ship or to a whole fleet than you can with flags in the daytime. I can only say, according to my experience in holding command, that without this system of flashing lights it would have been impossible to handle any fleet or squadron under steam, and I think, therefore, that the invention ought to be properly recognised.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: After what has fallen from the noble Lord and from the noble and gallant Officer opposite, I should not for a moment trouble your Lordships with any opinion of mine even if I could offer one that had the slightest pretension to authority upon this system of flashing signals, which is the subject of Admiral Colomb's invention. But as my name has been referred to in the matter, I will state the facts which have come under my cognizance. I simply wish to say that the answer which Admiral Colomb received to his application for a reward three years ago, namely, that having received previously a sum of £1,000 in two portions, he had accepted £500 of that in bar of any further claim, for a reward for the invention of flashing signals, was based upon an entire misapprehension of the facts of the case. I happened to hold the office of Under Secretary of State for War at the time, and I was the person who had to arrange with Admiral Colomb for payment to him of the sum of £500. That sum of £500 was paid to Admiral Colomb not on account of his general system of flashing signals for the Navy, but on account of the assistance he had given in the development of a joint system of signals for the Military and Naval Services combined. That sum was given him on the recommendation of two very distinguished officers, neither of whom is now alive, one of them being Admiral Sir Cooper Key. What I have to say is that if an answer was sent to Admiral Colomb basing the refusal of his claim on the ground that he had accepted that sum in bar of all future claims, it was not a correct answer, and it must have been sent under a misapprehension. Having gone through the whole of the papers connected with the case 20 years ago, and having had the advantage in going through them of the assistance of a most competent official at the War Office, I am quite satisfied that Admiral Colomb never intended to relinquish his claim to future reward when he gave his receipt for the £500.

*THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: My Lords, I so fully concur in the views which have been so clearly put before your Lordships that I shall venture to offer very few remarks indeed. But having known Admiral Colomb, and having had a great deal to do with more than one association which takes an interest in these matters, I should be sorry to let this occasion pass without offering a few observations founded upon my own personal experience in testimony not only of the ability of Admiral Colomb, but of his unwearied industry and his remarkable talent for clear exposition of difficult problems on matters of signalling and naval tactics. Last, but certainly not least, let me speak from my personal knowledge of his zeal in placing before the country at a time of threatened danger the absolute necessity of placing our shores in a state of defence. There was no worker more zealous and sincere in that great cause than Admiral Colomb. I received a letter yesterday from the distinguished Admiral who is now in command at Devonport (Sir W. M. Dowell), one short passage from which I will read to your Lordships—

"I have been in command of ships and squadrons for the last 18 years, and my opinion ought to be of some value. I consider these signals are invaluable."

—mark the word, my Lords, "invaluable."

"By them squadrons are conducted and manœuvred in safety both at night and in fogs."

Of their value in war, my Lords, we have not had experience, happily; and we can only imagine how great their value would be. I would appeal with the utmost confidence to every noble Lord who hears me, and would ask, is £120 an adequate compensation for an invention of such great utility to the Naval Service? Because that sum really is all the money which, so far, has gone into the pocket of the gallant Admiral. My noble Friend who has just spoken has cleared the ground of the suggestion that the £500 from the "War Office" was given on account of anything more than the invention for use in the two Services jointly, and that it was to be in bar of all future claims. It had no connection whatever with the compensation for the naval invention for which, as I said before, deducting the amount paid for "Patent Fees" only, the miserable sum of £120 has been paid to Admiral Colomb. Now, my Lords, let me say one word with reference to the action of the Treasury. In the House of Commons we were taught, and I hope that we have always retained the lessons we learnt there, that one of the first duties of Members of the Legislature was to support the Treasury, and protect it against aggressive inroads upon the public purse. That is a principle upon which I should always like to act. But, my Lords, the Treasury, in resisting this appeal, appear to me to have acted either upon some misunderstanding or from an entire misconception of the facts of the case which have been so clearly and well put by my noble Friend opposite. The Treasury are not infallible. They are liable to act wrongly like other people; and as it appears they have not done justice in this matter, it is worthy of your Lordships' grave consideration, for there has been testimony read to your Lordships showing that in the Navy this is regarded, and I think properly regarded, as an injustice to the Service. It may be a wrong opinion that the Navy is unfairly treated as compared with the Sister Service, but that appears to be the opinion entertained by naval men; and if that is their opinion, we should endeavour to remove it. I do not base anything upon that fact beyond arguing that grave consideration should be given to this case. I think it is the duty of every Member of both Houses of Parliament to do his best to remove that feeling because it is destructive of all confidence; and it is more than that, because, by discouraging our officers in either Service from applying their natural gifts of observation, guided by the light of their own experience and their own intellectual powers, for the benefit of the Public Service, we may lose products of the greatest value. Here we have had utilised in the Public Service an invention which has been proved by 20 years' experience to be the very best system that has ever been attempted to be used in the Navy; and I say that by such discouragement you are doing that which will have a prejudicial effect upon the efforts of officers who are desirous of doing their best for the Service. I will not detain your Lordships longer, but I do trust that the answer we may receive from the Admiralty, which, as we all know, has already gone fully into this matter, will now be satisfactory. I quite expect to hear from my noble Friend who represents the Admiralty a fitting recognition of the service which Admiral Colomb has rendered to the Navy by the invention of these "flashing" signals. I must apologise to your Lordships for the length of these remarks, but I feel bound to stand by a man who has had no adequate reward for conferring a great benefit upon the Naval Service.

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: My Lords, if success depended upon powerful advocacy, I think Admiral Colomb should have every reason to be satisfied with this evening's discussion. My noble and gallant Friend who introduced this matter has described the case of Admiral Colomb with perfect accuracy, with great fairness, and, I think, with great moderation. In bringing the matter forward he has quoted letters from several naval officers of high rank and position; men who have commanded Fleets at sea, who have manœuvred Fleets, and whose opinion is entitled to the greatest respect. He has received the support of the illustrious Duke who, as your Lordships know, has lately returned from command in the Mediterranean, and who, had he not been otherwise engaged, would have been here to-night to take part in the Debate and speak to the great value, as he considers, of this invention. My noble Friend has also been supported by numerous noble Lords in this House, all of whom have given consideration to the subject. All are agreed upon it. There is a consensus of opinion as to the value of this invention of Admiral Colomb, and I am not here to dispute that value; on the contrary, I fully admit it. We fully admit the value of that invention. We fully recognise the importance of this system of flashing signals in the Navy. No fleet or single ship is now sent to sea without them; and if we may test the value of an invention by the opinion entertained of it by foreigners, we have the very best testimony in this case, for I think I am right in saying that every foreign Naval Power has adopted this invention. By it we are able to send Fleets to sea and to manœuvre them at night, and in fogs, with the same safety and facility as we can in clear weather, or daylight. The system of Admiral Colomb was first officially tried in 1861, and it was finally adopted in the Service in 1868, when the inventor received a sum of £500 from the Admiralty. That sum, Admiral Colomb and my noble Friend maintain, was in no way intended as a reward for the invention, but that it was rather intended as a recompense for the loss of time he had incurred in perfecting the invention, and for loss of professional service. But the receipt given by Admiral Colomb was worded as having been received—

"In full discharge of all claims for the services in question and attendant expenses."

When two years afterwards, in 1870, the gallant Admiral was employed by the War Office as has been described by the noble Lord opposite, in establishing a system of signal communication, not only for land service, but for joint Naval and Military use, he received for the service a further sum of £500, £250 of which was paid by the Admiralty, and £250 by the War Office. On that occasion the receipt given was—

"In final and absolute discharge of all claims upon Her Majesty's Government on account of signal arrangements for land service, and in respect of joint signals for naval and military use."

My Lords, in 1876 the claims of the gallant Admiral for further remuneration were brought by the Admiralty before the Treasury, and the Treasury declined to entertain the claims, on the ground that by the wording of the receipt given to the War Office and to the Admiralty in 1870, Admiral Colomb had himself barred the door to the payment of further remuneration. And the Treasury also felt that were they in the circumstances to allow this case to be re-opened, they would really be paving the way to demands for the reconsideration of other claims, and inviting other inventors, who might think their claims for inventions had received inadequate reward, to appeal to the Treasury for further remuneration. The Admiralty looked upon that decision of the Treasury as final, and there the matter rested. In 1887, as has been stated by the noble Lord himself, Admiral Colomb wrote to Lord Northbrook, then Under Secretary of State for War, and the noble Lord's reply in July, 1887,—pointed out, as he has already explained, that Admiral Colomb's position in regard to the naval signals was in no way affected by the payment of the second £500. Your Lordships will remember that he had had one £500 from the Admiralty and a second £500 from the Admiralty and War Office jointly. Though the noble Lord says that the position of Admiral Colomb as to the naval signals was in no way affected by the payment of the second £500, he declines very naturally to express any opinion as to the claims against the Admiralty in respect of the first £500 paid for the flashing naval signals. That, my Lords, left that matter entirely open. The second payment of £500 was not in dispute. Admiral Colomb received that in full recompense; but the door was expressly left open for further claim to reward for the flashing signals for naval use. That is not disputed by anybody; but as the Treasury had based their refusal to entertain the claim for remuneration on the ground that he was debarred by the last receipt which he had given, from raising further claims against the Government, that being the very point upon which a contradiction was given by the noble Earl Lord Northbrook, the Admiralty felt bound to reopen the whole matter and to lay the case again before the Treasury. What the Admiralty have done is, they have written to the Treasury; they have recapitulated the whole matter, and have sent them copies of the letters, testimonials, and other documents which the noble Lords have referred to. Having done this they feel that they have done all that lay in their power to do. The matter now rests with the Treasury, and is now under their consideration. I see that by the notice my noble Friend moves for papers. As the correspondence between the Departments on the matter is not yet completed, and the documents referred to are now before the Treasury, I must decline for the present to produce any papers.

*LORD SUDELEY: Will my noble and gallant Friend inform the House how soon he thinks it would be possible to obtain an answer from the Treasury?

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: I am unable to say.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

WIDENING OF PARLIAMENT STREET.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTHBOURNE: My Lords, I hold in my hand a Bill of apparently very small importance, and not of any length, and it is, I believe, in the nature of an ordinary Continuance Bill. It, however, relates to a matter which I think your Lordships will agree with me is of very considerable public importance, and one in which, I am sure, your Lordships will take very great interest; I mean the widening of Parliament Street and of the approaches to your Lordships' House. When the Bill of which this Bill is in continuance was brought in, I believe the noble Marquess at the head of the Government insisted that that Bill should not pass without a large sum of money, £500,000, I believe, being subscribed by the shareholders in the company, and I think five years was the time which was allowed for that purpose. Three years of that time have already elapsed, and now we have a Continuance Bill, and I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he thinks that after the lapse of five years there will be any greater chance of the company being able to raise that sum, or whether at the end of seven years they will have a better chance than they had at the end of five; and also whether, if the money is not raised, or if there is not a fairly good prospect of its being raised, anything will be done. I would ask whether if the noble Lord sees that there is not any prospect of raising the money he is willing to allow this matter to go on—it being a matter of considerable importance, as affecting greatly the appearance of this city, and involving, in point of fact, a very considerable metropolitan improvement—without taking any steps in the matter. I should like, if I may be allowed to do so, to state in a very few words, for I will not trespass long upon your Lordships' time, why I think this Bill ought to meet, I will not say with rejection, but with the very strictest supervision from Her Majesty's Government. I am myself, to a certain extent, interested in the matter, though that interest is but a small one, and my friends and neighbours Messrs. Driver, through the Government Survey Office, have requested me to ascertain what the intention of the Government is with regard to the Bill which now stands for reading in the House of Commons at a rather suspiciously distant date, as late as the 5th July. Now, I am sure your Lordships will agree that it is not a desirable thing that private individuals should have their land taken from them by compulsory powers indefinitely. I should be the last person to throw any obstacle in the way of a public improvement; but I think we ought not to be, if I may say so, blown upon hot and cold in this matter, and that we ought not to have compulsory powers exercised over us for an indefinite time. My Lords, the difficulty on a former occasion was of a pressing kind. There was a great difficulty in securing money for this important public improvement, and the noble Marquess, being naturally anxious for the improvement to be carried out, gave those great powers to a private company. But that necessity, my Lords, no longer exists. We have in the County Council a body which has ample powers for raising money, and my opinion is that the County Council would be well able to undertake this work. Indeed, I understand that the matter has been before the County Council, and that the County Council were not unwilling to consider it; but they considered that as Parliament has given large powers to this company it would not be wise to interfere now in the matter. My Lords, the real and fatal objection I think to this Bill is, that we do not know what the character of this work is to be. When I say that, I do not mean to suggest that the Bill ought not to be passed, but to state what my great objection to it is. Here is a Bill for a great public improvement to be carried out, as sanctioned, by a private company; and I wish to know whether Her Majesty's Government, in regard to a great metropolitan improvement of this kind which may very fairly be compared to what has been done at Hyde Park Corner, with great advantage to the public, have taken care to have any plans laid before the House or before the country in order that we may judge of the character of the buildings along the approach to this magnificent structure. I should like to know from Her Majesty's Government what course they propose to take with regard to this Bill, and whether they are likely in the year 1890 to get any better satisfaction from the promoters of this private company than they did on a former occasion?

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government propose to answer the question which the noble Lord has put at considerable length; but I would venture to suggest to the House that the question is one of the most irregular kind. The noble Lord has made a speech against a private Bill which has not yet appeared before your Lordships' House, or even been read a second time in the House of Commons. The precedent is not a very convenient one in regard to private legislation if a noble Lord is to be allowed to make a strong speech against a private Bill which is not only not yet before your Lordships, but has not yet passed the House of Commons.

*LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, I am perfectly prepared to answer now the question which has been put; but I quite agree that it is not a question which ought to be put in this House. At present the Bill is before the House of Commons, and certainly any question upon it ought to be asked in the House of Commons. When the Bill comes up here I shall be prepared to answer the noble Lord any question he wishes to ask. Under those circumstances, I must respectfully say that I cannot answer the question.

LORD NORTHBOURNE: Under the circumstances, my Lords, I will at once withdraw the question; but my feeling was, as I hope the noble Marquess, whom we are all very glad to see in his place again, will also consider, that in this case the circumstances are of an exceptional character, because I believe it was always understood—"Order, order!"

SERVITUDES REDEMPTION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 16.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: My Lords, the Bill of which I move the Second Reading is the same Bill as I introduced into your Lordships' House at the end of last Session. At that time it was very favourably received on both sides of the House; but at the request of my noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland I withdrew the measure, with the view of letting it be considered in Scotland, and ascertaining the public opinion upon it in that country. I do not, therefore, think it necessary to go again into all the details of the measure, but rather to comment upon the opinions which appear to have been expressed with regard to it. From all I have learned upon the matter, opinion is distinctly favourable to legislation upon this vexed question. The first objection that was raised, was that there is hardly any precedent in Parliament for dealing in this way with private rights; but there is a distinct precedent in Scotland itself, as the old Scotch Parliament in 1695 dealt with commonities, or common lands held by two or three proprietors jointly in an Act which goes exactly upon these lines. The apparent difference between the two cases of commonities and servitude rights is very small, and in practice there is really no difference at all, as in the case with which this Bill deals, there is a joint ownership, where one person is the owner of the land and others have rights of pasture, shooting, &c., over it. A commonity is a joint ownership in land; a servitude right is where one person holds the land, and there may be two, three, or four owners of servitudes for the different rights described in this Bill—forestry, shooting, pasturage, and other rights—over that land and over the right of its owner. My Lords, it seems to me that if a joint proprietor in a commonity can demand a division of the land, the owner of land burdened with a servitude right should be equally entitled to have a division with those who exercise jointly with him the right of using the land. I can see no difference between the two, or what reason there can be for the owner of a servitude right not being allowed to claim such a division of the right as one who has a claim to a part of the land can demand. In Scotland, where such lands have been held in common they have all been divided, and I think it would be very largely to the public advantage if this dual ownership which exists in regard to these servitude rights were done away with. I have heard it said also that some rights of the public would be interfered with by this Bill, but that is not so. The Bill does not propose to touch any public right whatever; it merely deals with the private rights of proprietors and those who have servitude rights over land. Then, again, I have been asked what interest has the public in a measure of this sort, and what precedent there is for dealing in a general Bill with these relations between owners of private property. There are precedents for such interference. For instance, Parliament interfered with the entails of land, and decided when entails should cease. What greater instance of dealing with private interests could there be than that? I have mentioned the precedent of Parliament dealing with commonities in the Act of 1695, and there are a number of other precedents where private rights have been dealt with. For instance, an owner of real estate can compel his neighbour to join in building boundary fences, to deepen water courses in order to let water off his land, and to improve the drainage in connection with his property. But there is a much stronger case than any I have quoted in connection with dealing with private rights in the Old Roads and Bridges Act in Scotland, by which the Trustees who hold the roads have a right to go under any person's land and dig for materials for the maintenance of that road over the land, only paying where the land is enclosed, surface damage, and where it is unenclosed they deal with it as if it was their own property. I mention those as precedents to show that private interests have in other directions been touched by Act of Parliament. Now, as long as these joint or servitude rights remain the land is practically of little value to anybody. I have not the evidence of public opinion as represented by Petitions from Scotland in favour of this measure, but the reason of that is that the old bodies of Commissioners of Supply are defunct, and as the County Councils have not come into working order yet, they have been unable to report upon this matter; but as regards the opinion of those who own lands which are subject to these servitudes and to those who exercise rights over their ownership, I have received letters which are most favourable. With your Lordships' permission I will read one from a gentleman who has succeeded recently to his estate, Sir John Gladstone, of Fasque. He writes to me—

"I have been studying your Bill carefully, and it appears to me to cover all the ground required. There can be no doubt that power to get rid of servitudes will be a boon all round and would in many cases lead to the improvement of hundreds of thousands of acres, by dividing which under existing circumstances must remain in a state of nature for ever.—
Yours sincerely,
JOHN GLADSTONE."

Although some of the owners of rights over the solum which has the servitude

The Marquess of Huntly

over it may be willing, and I know one case where three out of four owners of these servitude rights are perfectly agreeable to allow them to be divided, yet one of the owners of the servitude rights, being an entailed proprietor, they cannot move in the matter. If you have dealt with entails in the way you have done by legislation, surely you can deal with a matter of such great public advantage as this, which is hindered from being carried out by the existence of the old entails. My Lords, I do not think there can be any real objection to this measure. There can be no doubt that the public will be largely the gainers by legislation of this kind. I would remind you that a large number of these rights are connected with hill grazings, and one great benefit of this measure will be the improvement of those grazings by draining so that the land will carry more sheep. If this measure is not carried it will still be to nobody's interest to improve those grazings, and practically those enormous grazing lands will remain of little value to anyone. I mentioned last year the several disadvantages under which proprietors labour from the existence of these servitude rights. I will not go into them again, but will only mention one instance of divoting which occurred in my own case. A neighbouring proprietor has the right of cutting turfs in a forest which belongs to me. Two of his tenants went to get the turf. They lit the heather to enable them to cut the turf easier, but the fire got the better of them, and the whole hillside was burnt. In that way the hillside grazing and the shooting also have been damaged for years to come, simply through the carelessness of a neighbouring proprietor. There is no remedy for this state of things except by doing away with these rights, as I propose. My Lords, it is objected that there is to be a summary process of going before the Sheriff. There was an extension of the Act of 1695 which enabled the parties concerned to go before the Sheriff with regard to commonities, and I have proceeded here entirely upon the lines of the legislation with regard to commonities. My noble Friend Lord Watson called attention last Session to the case of those feuars who may have become owners of rights by reason of having made contracts with the superior owner, I own that there is a grievance in those cases, and I should be quite prepared to meet it by the insertion of a special clause providing that—

“This Act shall not apply to rights of pasturage or of common pasturage where the same are constituted by deed or written contract, except by the consent of the party having the right to the said servitude.”

My Lords, the only public expression of opinion I have seen against the Bill is a document which has been circulated among your Lordships by solicitors of the Supreme Court in Edinburgh, but the reasons given for objecting to the Bill are not very clear from that document. It appears not an unfair deduction that those gentlemen object to what is rather a fruitful source of litigation between owners in regard to these servitude rights being extinguished as the source which probably brings considerable grist to their mill. I regret the absence of the noble Duke, the Duke of Argyll, from ill-health. He intended to come down to-night to speak upon this matter, and he writes to me saying he is unfortunately prevented from attending the House. He goes on to say—

“I think all these servitudes are bad things; but they must be dealt with most cautiously, especially when they include rights of grazing belonging to poor people. I think that a matter of this kind should be dealt with by Government and not by private Members.”

I quite admit the force of that, and I think the noble Duke is right. Though I have brought forward this Bill, I wish to say that I do not in the least desire to press it forward as a private Member if the Government will give any assistance in the matter. I should much rather my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland would undertake to deal with it, or else that the Government would allow the matter to be referred to a Committee. I can assure him that the measure is regarded as one of pressing importance to Scotland, and that it would be a very great boon to proprietors to have the question settled. I beg to move the Second Reading.

Moved, “That the Bill be read 2<sup>a</sup>.”

*LORD WATSON: My Lords, whilst not hostile to the object which the noble Marquess has in view, I have not been relieved of the difficulties which I expressed last year in regard to the method which he has resorted to in order to accomplish his ends. The great obstacle in the way of this measure is that it is very difficult to define the subjects to which it is intended to apply. I do know a great many subjects which are comprehended in this Bill, to which its principles ought certainly (as I have had occasion to say before) not to apply. In the case of commonities, to which the noble Marquess has referred, I may explain that they constituted a species of property which had existed in Scotland from time immemorial. The property was well-known and earmarked, and when the Legislature dealt with it under that name; there could be no mistake whatever as to the subjects included in their legislation. But when I come to the Bill of my noble Friend, I find a very great difference. He desires to assimilate the subjects, which he intends to bring within the scope of the Bill, to commonities, and I can quite conceive that in the cases which he has specially described, such as that of large tracts of moorland in the North of Scotland, the resemblance of one kind of property to the other is very close indeed. But this Bill is not confined to subjects of the class which the noble Marquess described; and I find myself at a loss, without some definite information on the subject, to formulate a definition which will confine its application to property of that description. My Lords, as the Bill is drawn, there is not the most insignificant patch of land in Scotland over which the proprietor has given a servitude right of this kind that is not within the scope of the measure, and I venture to say, as far as my knowledge extends, there is not an estate to the south of the Forth to which any provision such as is made by this Bill ought to apply. It would break contracts on the faith of which persons have built houses and acquired property down to the time of the passing of the Bill. I do not think it was the intention of the noble Marquess to bring in all those cases. The measure is not confined to feuars merely. I venture also to say this: that having spoken of the south of the Forth, I believe that to the north of the same line there are comparatively few instances in which there ought to be any application of this measure. I do not think that referring this Bill to the Law Committee would be of any use. They, perhaps, could say what ought to be the rights of the servitude owner and the proprietor inter se, if they knew the parties they were dealing with; but to pass the Bill as it stands would be to pass it in the dark, and to send it to a Committee as the noble Marquess suggests would be simply sending it to a body which has not the means of defining the subjects of the measure.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My Lords, I think, after the remarks which have fallen from my noble and learned Friend, it is scarcely necessary for me to say much in doing that which I regret being compelled to do, namely, state that I cannot, on behalf of the Government, accede to the measure which is proposed by the noble Marquess. The object of the Bill is to provide for the compulsory extinction of certain rights of servitude which have been enumerated by the noble Marquess, without any option whatever on the part of the owners of those rights to refuse or object to such extinction. The Bill gives power to extinguish such rights compulsorily, whether acquired by prescription or by deed; in other words, it gives power to set aside contracts against the wish of one of the parties interested. The noble Marquess has stated that this Bill is the same as that which he introduced last year, and that is no doubt the fact. He has also stated that at the time he introduced it last year, I appealed to him to withdraw it; but, at the same time, I asked him to elicit the views of the people in Scotland upon the subject, and as to whether they desired that such a measure should pass. The noble Marquess has now read one or two letters, the writers of which appear to desire that this measure should pass; but, on the other hand, I desire to say that I, as Secretary for Scotland, have not received one single request or communication on the subject from any part of Scotland. It cannot, therefore, think that there is any great desire that this measure should pass. I would venture to call attention to this fact that the noble Marquess, in stating that as far as he knows a certain amount of interest in the Bill has been manifested, has simply shown that the interest is on one side only; he has not shown that those who have rights of pasturage or rights of divot, which are, I think, the two most important rights, have any wish that their rights should be compulsorily taken away from them, or have any desire to alter the existing state of matters. Last year I pointed out that the Bill might operate very injuriously against those who possess rights of pasturage and turbary, and I adhere to that opinion still. I think it would be very injurious if power were given to the owner of the solum to take away those rights. But not only is there that difficulty; there is also this further objection: it seems to me that this Bill is purely one-sided. It gives to the proprietor of the solum by application to the Court of Session or to the Sheriff the right to demand or exact that the lands over which the rights of servitude exist should be divided on payment of compensation; but, on the other hand, it gives no right to the owners of the servitude or solum should they desire to make an exchange to enforce it. Therefore, while it seems to me that the Bill might, in certain cases, do considerable injustice to the owners of the servitudes, it does not, on the other hand, give a corresponding power to them to exact from the landlords an exchange such as might be desired by the landlords themselves. It appears to me also that such a power as this is, as a general rule, absolutely unnecessary. There are certainly to my knowledge cases which have arisen in reference to the power of purchase where there would be no reason whatever to interfere compulsorily with such rights as have arisen either by purchase or exchange; and the very object which the noble Marquess wishes to carry into effect might be attained without any further intervention of the law. It appears to me that there are means sufficient to meet the object which the noble Marquess has in view. With regard to the question of entails, that is a very complicated question; but I do not think that is a precedent which would justify the passing of such a measure as he proposes. The noble and learned Lord Watson has gone so fully into the legal aspect of the matter that I need not go further into it, but will merely say that I entirely concur in the views he has expressed. On the two grounds that I have explained, namely, that the Bill appears to be purely one-sided, and that on the other hand inconvenience, if not loss, might be occasioned to the owners of servitudes I should ask your Lordships not to give a Second Reading to it. I may say, in conclusion, that I entirely concur with the expression of opinion in the letter of the Duke of Argyll that these servitude rights are inconvenient in themselves; but I do not, at the same time, think that sufficient ground has been shown for passing this measure. My Lords, I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out the word "now," and add at the end of the Motion the words "this day six months." (The Lord Ker [M. Lothian].)

*The MARQUESS of HUNTLY: I have no wish to press this matter further after what has taken place, but I should like to remind your Lordships that the Bill provides either that the owner of the servitude can take its value in money or that the Sheriff can allocate to him land. I quite admit that if the parties were all free they could agree if they chose among themselves; but the difficulty is that there are these entails existing which prevent proprietors dealing with each other; and as you have already dealt with them by enactment, I cannot see why you should be unable to deal with servitude rights. I will only add that I would appeal to the Government in this, which is a similar case, to take up the subject in a Bill of their own.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn: then the original Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

FACTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 83.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read, and discharged.

POSTAL AND TELEGRAPH REFORMS. QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON: My Lords, in asking Her Majesty's Government "whether they will consider the adoption of certain desirable reforms in the Postal and Telegraphic Departments of this country; namely, Allowing the public to affix halfpenny stamps to cards for transmission by post, such cards conforming in all respects to Post Office Regulations; the stamping in plain figures the hour of collection as well as the date on letters; a reduction in the present high rate of portage for telegrams," I trust I shall not be considered venturesome on this my first occasion of addressing your Lordships' House, but I do so relying entirely on your forbearance. I felt some hesitation in putting this question of apparently trivial importance on the Paper; but my excuse is that it is a matter of public concern, and was so considered when I had the honour of a seat in another place. I was also further encouraged by the success which attended certain endeavours of Mr. Henniker Heaton to obtain a substantial reduction in our Indian and Colonial Postage system. The first question I ask is relative to the public being themselves allowed to affix adhesive halfpenny stamps upon any ordinary cards. It is evident that there are the same reasons of convenience in their being allowed to do so as there is in the case of ordinary letters. It would be a great convenience as compared either with having always to obtain the stamped cards or to send them to the Post Office to be stamped. I was told that there would be considerable friction between the Postal Department and the public who availed themselves of such a system; and the Postmaster General said the public would be unwilling to abide by the regulations which would have to be made with regard to the size, weight, and shape of the cards to be used. I cannot see that there would be likely to be any greater friction in that case than in the case of overweight letters, and the remedy would be the same as in that case, namely, that the addressee or receiver of the card would have to pay double postal rate. But that is not the only point. I have in my hand certain cards which have been allowed to have adhesive halfpenny stamps placed upon them when the Postmaster has been satisfied that the matter written on the different postcards is identical, as in the case of circulars. The only difference, therefore, would be that the Postal Authorities, instead of having the trouble of reading the matter upon the cards, would merely have to see that the cards conformed to the regulations as to size and so on. If you send half a dozen cards with the matter identical on each, the Postal Authorities will receive the cards with an ordinary adhesive stamp. And not only so, but all the ordinary regulations concerning size and weight are dropped, apparently, for it is possible to send an invitation card to a City banquet for a  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; so that all regulations as to size are apparently dropped as long as the Postal Authorities know that the cards are practically circulars. It seems an absolute anomaly that in the one case the public are not allowed to use adhesive stamps if it is desired to write a message on an ordinary card; but that, in the other case, if cards are sent out as circulars, the public may affix their own stamps. Then another point upon which objection is made to this system is that of cost. At the present time the Post Office has to pay £283 per 1,000,000 cards to Messrs. De la Rue, and as they use about 200,000,000 a year, that represents a sum of nearly £60,000 a year. In addition to that, there is a great difference also in regard to the cost of distribution and making up into packets, which is also large; whereas to issue 1,000,000  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. stamps only costs the Post Office £16 7s. 6d., as compared with this sum of £283 which they have to pay for the cards. I am aware that the Post Office claim to make good the loss they sustain in the amount spent upon these cards by the charge which they make of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the place of  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per single card. But my contention is, that if there be any loss upon this postal card system, the public are willing, to a great extent, to take upon themselves to supply their own cards. If, on the other hand, the Post Office are making a profit on the sale of these cards, they are not entitled to do so. I do not think there is any Act of Parliament entitling the Post Office to carry on a profit-making Stationery Department. All I wish to say is that as long as we have the postcard system the public are entitled to have it carried on as economically and as conveniently as possible, and in both Belgium and Germany they have this system. The next point to which I desire to call attention is stamping the hour of collection upon letters. All correspondence in addition to having the name of the post office and date stamped upon them should also show the hour of collection. This applies more particularly to the Metropolis, where it would afford a very urgently required check. There are continual complaints made of the irregularities of the postal system, and no dependence can be placed upon the time when a letter posted in one district will be delivered at another part of the Metropolis. Other countries have adopted such a system, and I have here papers showing that in America, Australia, and Canada, they have adopted the plan of stamping the hour of collection as well as the date, and that by that means they ensure much greater regularity in regard to the despatch and delivery of letters, in consequence of the great check thereby afforded upon the post offices. My last question is with regard to the charges for portage of telegrams. This applies, of course, to rural districts. When the sixpenny telegram system was introduced it was intended to be for the good of the whole community, but practically rural districts do not share in that benefit. Though the telegraph system was, of course, established for the benefit of the whole country, rural districts are left out in the cold entirely in regard to offices and messengers with which urban districts are plentifully supplied. That has the effect of preventing persons who live more than a mile from a post office enjoying the great boon of the sixpenny telegram. One great obstacle is that the public cannot get a post office established without a very large guarantee being provided; and this difficulty would be met if the Post Office Authorities would consent to a reduction of the guarantee upon the establishment of new postal telegraph offices. They did so last year in regard to establishing telegraph offices at fishing stations in Scotland, and I think they might extend the system in that way to a much greater degree throughout the country. I do not propose the abolition of all portage fees, but I think the scale of charges might be altered. Any surplus arising from year to year should, I think, be devoted to lessening the amounts paid for portage. At present, the whole country does not enjoy the benefit of the lowered telegraph tariff as long as heavy portage charges are imposed which are practically prohibitive to the poorer people who may have to pay what is, perhaps, the very considerable sum of 1s. or 1s. 6d. for a telegram. My Lords, those are the three points which I wish to bring before the notice of Her Majesty's Government. I know that the noble Lord, who will answer me, is not in direct connection with the Post Office, and, therefore, I cannot expect from him a very copious answer; but I trust he will make the necessary representations to the Post Office, and endeavour to induce them to undertake some reform in the directions I have pointed out.

THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, there is a fourth reform which would be very desirable, though it has not been mentioned by the noble Lord, upon which I should like to say a few words, and that is the carte-lettre which, in France, I have found of the greatest possible value. By means of that contrivance, the contents of a post card can be kept private, and the system saves a great deal of trouble, there being no envelope and no necessity of folding the letter.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will welcome the participation of the noble Lord in the discussions of this House, but I am afraid that my answer will not meet all his wishes. With regard to the first point I have to reply that the question of sending private cards with adhesive stamps through the post is at the present moment under the consideration of the Postmaster General. In reference to the second proposition that the hours of collection should be stamped upon letters, as well as the date, I have to point out that letters which have been posted have sometimes to be collected from a great distance before they can reach the office from which they are taken away, and where they are stamped; so that under no system would it be possible to do more than give approximately the time of collection, and I do not think there would be much advantage to be derived from that being done. I am informed by the Post Office Authorities that it would be impossible to enable the public to trace their correspondence without reference to the Department, which has already a sufficient check upon their officers. Therefore, the Postmaster General does not think that any public advantage would be gained by adopting my noble Friend's second proposition. As regards the question of portage for telegrams, I may say that the charge is only 6d. up to two miles distance from the delivery office, and 6d. per mile beyond. That is to say, a telegram will be delivered within three miles for 1s. Above that distance the charge is 1s. a mile for a messenger on horseback. The Postmaster General does not think that is too high a rate, and he can hold out no hope of any reductions in that direction. But I am authorised to state that wherever telegrams can be carried at a lower rate than I have mentioned, the public get the benefit of that lower rate; and also that, owing to the increased number of telegraph offices in the country, the delivery distances are gradually growing less and the charges accordingly reduced. During the last five years about 1,245 new telegraph stations have been opened. Of course, they have not all been in country districts; some of them are in the towns, but the Postmaster General is always anxious to give every facility for the opening of new telegraph offices, and the arrangements have been altered as to guarantees subscribed for by the public in districts to meet any deficiency which may arise in the Revenue. Those guarantees are now not asked for until the close of the year, and not, as formerly, required to be paid at the commencement. With regard to the fourth question, I am afraid I am not in a position to answer it, but I will communicate it to the Postmaster General.

PORTUGAL AND EAST AFRICA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a settlement has now been arrived at with Portugal as to affairs in East Africa; and, if so, whether he can lay Papers upon the Table showing the boundaries of the territories which will be hereafter within the respective spheres of influence of Great Britain and Portugal, said: My Lords, before I ask the Prime Minister the question which I have put down on the Notice Paper, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to make a few remarks upon this very important subject of our relations with Portugal in East-Central Africa, and I do so because I desire it to be known elsewhere that great anxiety prevails in cultivated English society that a settlement should be arrived at. This question has aroused immense interest; as, upon the settlement of it, which we hope may be effected, may rest the future destiny of East-Central Africa. As far as Portugal is concerned, regarding the events of last winter, I imagine that every Englishman felt great regret that there should have been even a passing disagreement with an old and tried ally, and that our desire was to keep on the best relations with a country with which we have had historical relations in the past; but I think no one can help being struck with the unanimity of opinion among all parties in the country upon the course which was taken by the Prime Minister with regard to Portugal upon the question of her procedure in East Africa. I seldom remember any such unanimous expression of opinion; and I go further, and say that there has seldom been an instance in which the general opinion of all the great countries in Europe has been more decidedly in favour of the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government. That, I think, is one of the most gratifying circumstances that has occurred for a long period. But, above all, the great issue at stake in this matter is the future of the vast tracts lying along the great waterways of East-Central Africa. I trust nobody outside will mistake the feeling of England in this matter. I suppose no feeling has ever grown up more rapidly than that with regard to the position of affairs in this part of Africa, within the last few years. I do not exaggerate when I say that the importance of our interest there has been canvassed in every cultivated centre throughout the United Kingdom. It is a very great interest that is at stake now—whether British trade and commerce, as well as British influences, are to have free course and access from the South to the North of Africa. There are other nations, too, who are interested in this matter, looking with the greatest anxiety to see how the negotiations with Germany are to end in reference to this large subject. We have a right to be deeply interested in this question of the future of this vast tract of Africa, for it was discovered and explored by our devoted fellow-countrymen, who first reached those great lakes, Victoria-Nyanza, Nyassa, and Tanganyika, that great chain of communication which must, at some future date, be the highway of Central Africa. Beyond that, when we think of the noble lives which have been lost in those tropical regions, the Christian devotion to duty which has been shown by our fellow-countrymen, Englishmen and Scotchmen—and especially Scotchmen—we have every reason to feel the deepest interest in the future of that country. If discovery and the introduction of commerce and trade into a country can give any such right, then England has that right. My Lords, it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to the fact that other nations have been trying in various ways to sever our communications between British South Africa and the great countries bordering on the Mediterranean. Your Lordships may remember that there were treaties made by France and Germany with Portugal; and we went out of our way, as it seems to me, to say that Portugal was free to send her traders from ocean to ocean, from Angola to Mozambique. I have always thought that it was rather dubious policy to show friendliness by putting a statement of that kind into a diplomatic document, when it was evident that British interests had a prior claim. I think it was a very big venture for a little country to make, first claiming those enormous powers, and then asking us to give a sort of consent to those claims. My Lords, you will hardly imagine that I overlook the fact that that was done in order to allow Portugal to, as it was called, “extend her civilising influence” over a territory 2,000 miles in extent, from Angola to Mozambique. That, I think, was a very large bid for Portugal to make. With regard to the great district from east to west which, up to within a few years ago, I will call “no man's land,” if there were any real rights of Portugal which would prevent our claiming advantage there, everybody would feel, however disagreeable it might be, that we must give way; but in the very interesting Blue Book presented to the House on this matter, my noble Friend the Prime Minister has defined very clearly what the rights of Portugal in this district are. He says, with regard to this claim to an extent of country 2,000 miles across, there is no claim whatever on the part of Portugal; that there is no claim whatever on the part of Portugal in all that district, except as to the sea coast and portions of the Zambesi river. Then, with regard to Lake Nyassa and Shiré, he says that no part of either was ever occupied by Portugal, nor any place beyond the confluence of the Zambesi and Shiré. As to the Upper Zambesi, there was a recognition of the occupation of two places, Tété and Zumbo, but of no other place or district on the river. So that we may consider that the whole of that district, except those points, is entirely open to Great Britain. As far as Tété goes, that is the case; but, except there, I do not think we need trouble ourselves very much about any preceding right. There are on the one side Sofala and Mozambique, on the other Angola and those places on the Upper Zambesi. I think that anyone rising from the study of that Blue Book must feel that the Prime Minister has been most long-suffering, indulgent, and patient in all his dealings with Portugal in this matter. He gave her ample time to escape from a difficult position, and I think it is a most remarkable case of the avoidance of any tone calculated to produce irritation, and of endeavours being made in every possible way to avoid hurting, in the slightest degree, the amour propre of an old ally. I should like to substantiate that statement for a few moments, if I am not detaining your Lordships too long at this hour of the night; but my excuse is that this is an important subject, and one of great interest to many. In the first place, I would remind the House of what Portugal was about during those three years after the Treaty with France and Germany was made as to this great tract of 2,000 miles. The moment the maps were published and the Portuguese Government claimed this territory the Prime Minister entered a protest at once, and declared that England would recognise in no way whatever such a vast and shadowy claim. That protest was the beginning of what may be called this special transaction. Then how did Portugal act? Knowing that Great Britain declined to accept her claims in any way to these vast territories, the first thing that happened almost immediately afterwards was that Portugal virtually closed the Zambesi (the navigation of which had been free for the last 10 years) owing to the imposition of very high duties. One of our steamers which had plied there for years was seized, and it was intimated that thereafter all vessels on the Zambesi would have to sail under the Portuguese flag. At that time England had announced a protectorate over Matabeleland. Portugal immediately put in a claim there without, as was proved to her beyond all doubt, a shadow of legal right. The officers of the British South African Company and the missionaries on the Nyassa were in a terrible position. The struggle going on there with the Arab slave traders was a fearful one, and gave rise to one of the most heroic defences recorded in our annals—three men defending themselves against a horde of the fiercest Arab traders. Portugal at once took the opportunity to stop the supply of ammunition to beleaguered English subjects until she was pressed by the English Government. The Portuguese haggled for six weeks, and it was with infinite difficulty that at last those men were allowed to have the ammunition to save their lives. Later on the peril became greater, and though every sort of diplomatic communication took place, it took something like three months to get ammunition and guns passed up to those men beleaguered by the Arabs. Then, just at the time when the question of the settlement of the boundaries between the two countries was about to be discussed amicably, it was rumoured that Portugal was going to send an armed expedition into the country which England had declared to be within the sphere of our influence and under our protection—to the Nyassa settlements. However, that seemed to wait for a time, and our Minister at Lisbon opened formal communications with the Minister there as to the adjustment with Portugal of our claims, and as to the intercolonial relations of the two countries. The communications were most conciliatory, and our Minister had long interviews with the Portuguese Foreign Secretary at Lisbon; but in the middle of these supposed friendly negotiations news came that 1,200 armed men had been sent off quite secretly from Quillimane to the very district in which the English missionary and commercial settlements were, which the Prime Minister had stated he could not allow to be approached by Portugal. The Portuguese Minister declined to say where they were going, or what they were going to do, and our Minister refused to continue the negotiations for demarcation, as, he said, they had become a farce. Then in January of the next year, 1889, the position of our fellow-citizens on the lakes was still one of great peril, and a mitrailleuse was much needed, but the transport of weapons were again stopped for a time, and it was only after very serious remonstrances that means of defence were allowed to go on. Then again, notwithstanding the proclamation of British Sovereignty or Protectorate in Mashonaland, news came of inroads by the Portuguese into territory which had been formally declared to be under British protection, and cannon were supplied to the hostile Arab slavers in the disturbed district at a time when they were doing all they could to annihilate our heroic men. It might almost have been supposed that we were at war with Portugal from all those signs of ill-will. The next thing was the arrest and imprisonment of the English Vice Consul at Quillimane, I think, upon some excuse or other, but apparently simply because he asked leave to have arms passed up. It was alleged that he was distributing weapons to the danger of the Portuguese, whereas he was only trying to send up arms to our fellow-countrymen. Then a short time afterwards we find that 1,000 guns and 12,000 lb. of powder were passed up from Quillimane, contrary to the blockade; and then came the more serious advance of Serpa Pinto into the country of the Makololo, over which a British Protectorate had been announced, with something like 6,000 men, a number of guns, and two steamers. Then we find Serpa Pinto doing everything he can to excite a hostile feeling among our faithful allies, the Makololo; he provokes a struggle with them, loss of life ensues, and notwithstanding the most serious warning he remains with his armed band in the country which is under British protection. Next a demand is made that all British subjects must obtain pass-ports, creating a fresh check to all communication between the English commercial and missionary settlements. Shortly after that two Englishmen, Messrs. Colquhoun and Wilkinson, were imprisoned at one of the Portuguese stations, and were only released after the earnest remonstrances of the Prime Minister. Then two British flags were taken from friendly natives and insulted, and an English steamer was stopped and compelled to haul down the British ensign. Then our allies, the Makololo, are attacked again, and at this moment a new Portuguese district is announced as having been formed at Zumbo, one of the places which I have mentioned on the Zambesi, and they have included in that a vast territory which the Prime Minister has declared to be under the sphere of British influence and not under that of Portugal. My Lords, surely you will agree that that is a terrible list of unfriendly acts for a State to commit against its ancient ally. Considering the constant endeavour on the part of Portugal to do what was unfriendly towards England and hostile to English interests, the patience and long-suffering the Prime Minister showed were marvellous, and I think that everybody will admit that my noble Friend could not have waited a day longer before taking action. I venture to press this matter rather strongly on the House, lest the Prime Minister may show an over-tenderness towards Portugal in the final settlement of the matter. There naturally is a chivalrous desire not to diminish the power of an old ally who is not exactly in the same position amongst nations as ourselves; but, after all, is Portugal so badly off for colonies? She already has enormous possessions. Look at her territory extending from the Zambesi, 1,200 miles from side to side. Is it to be supposed that she will become a more prosperous or powerful nation by the addition of these districts in the interior? It is very dubious even from her own point of view. After all, you must look a little at what the antecedents of Portugal has been in colonial matters. We are justified in considering this question, not merely from a British point of view. We have an enormous responsibility towards the native races, and recognising that responsibility we must have regard to the antecedents of Portugal. She has been in possession of these great colonies for several hundred years, and what has been her treatment of the natives? I do not wish to say anything that may seem unfriendly of her; but, in truth, a great deal of the misery of that country has been caused by the Portuguese Government flooding her colonies with convicts unreclaimed, and of the worst kind. They have been scattered broadcast all along that coast, and the result has been the creation of a half-caste population which is the scourge of those districts. Then as to her encouragement of slavery, you have the evidence of Livingstone only 30 years ago, that unfortunately every Governor he had met was engaged in the Slave Trade, up to the Governors General themselves. That was what he said at that time, and towards the end he became even more melancholy on the subject, and said that he had given up all hope of Portugal being of any use to the African races. I wish to give her all credit for wishing to throw off slavery; but when the whole Portuguese population has been imbued with the spirit of slave trading, it is unwise to expect that they will turn round and become civilising agents among the native races, or do them any good. Considering Portugal's antecedents, I doubt greatly whether we should hand over to her more territory than is her right. What progress has she made? Her colonies are the most backward of all the settlements, and I cannot see any sign of impending change. We see by this expedition of Serpa Pinto that when the Portuguese get among the native tribes they are received with eagerness, because the natives can get arms and drink from them free which the English judiciously refuse to let them have. I think that people who thus give arms and drink to the natives are not people to be trusted with enormous territories to which they have no claim. Only recently I find that a certain Ferreio, one of the most brutal of the race I have just now referred to, a man notorious for his cruelty and vices, has been sent to govern a district close to the Makololo territory. It seems as if there was a want of those civilising qualities which would fit them for the great task which they aspire to undertake. Now, my Lords, when we compare the course taken by the Portuguese in Africa with the instructions which Lord Clarendon gave to Livingstone when he sent him out there, telling him how he was to avoid anything like unkindness to the natives, how his whole strength was to be given to raising them in the scale, both from the religious and the social point of view, and to avoid exciting anything like contests or ill-will; when we compare the conduct of the Portuguese with the work of our Church Missions, University Missions, and Scotch Missions, our Buchanans and our African Companies, can we for one moment doubt on which side the happiness of the native races would rest? Every inquiry shows that they desire to become subject to England if to anyone. We sometimes confuse the Arab slave traders with the native populations, although they are quite different, and no doubt those Arabs are no friends of ours; but every testimony shows that the native races are decidedly in favour of being subject to England rather than to Portugal. I would ask your Lordships has this country any right before God or man, either from regard for old associations or for the susceptibilities of European nations, to make agreements by which these vast territories would be intrusted to a Power which, I venture to say, even though it has good intentions, is unfit, as compared with ourselves, to carry forward a great civilising and Christianising Mission in Africa? I thank your Lordships for listening to me so long, and I now beg to ask the question of which I have given notice.

My noble Friend has made a most interesting speech on a subject with which he is well acquainted, and in regard to which long study and deep feeling singularly fit him to speak with authority to your Lordships' House. There is little or nothing in his speech to which I can take exception, and I wish it were in my power to imitate my noble Friend in the fulness of his treatment of the subject or the frankness of his expressions. More than, perhaps, on any previous occasion do I regret that the institutions of this country do not afford an opportunity to those who represent the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government of speaking to the legislative power of the country without at the same time taking into their confidence all other persons in the world. I should be very glad if it were in my power to speak frankly to a Committee on Foreign Relations sitting in secret session, for I feel that I could make a very long speech if I had that opportunity. There is a great deal I should like to say, but your Lordships will sympathise with me if I observe only very modest proportions in the extent of my observations to you to-night. We are in the midst of negotiations—negotiations not only with Portugal, but with other countries—and, of course, any observations which I might make upon this question from almost any point of view could not be without their effect upon the progress of those negotiations. I think, therefore, that I shall best perform my duty and fulfil the wishes of my noble Friend—whilst expressing the deepest sympathy with the feelings to which he has given utterance—if I say that our discussions with Portugal are still going on; that we still decline to recognise as adequate foundation for territorial claim distant historical traditions; that, on the other hand, we have no wish to oppose any obstacle to the exercise on the part of Portugal of the right which we desire to exercise ourselves, namely, to find a fit opening for the energies of our population and the progress of our trade, and still less any obstacle to the development of those philanthropic feelings and the fulfilment of those high duties to which my noble Friend has so eloquently called attention. How soon the negotiations will come to a conclusion it is not in my power to say. I recognise the desirability of early progress; but I also recognise, as your Lordships will also do, the un wisdom of sacrificing any substantial end to mere rapidity of conclusion. There is only one point upon which I wish to speak with somewhat more openness than I have done with regard to this question. My noble Friend made allusion to the Zambesi and the Shiré; and to the action of Portugal in stopping vessels upon that highway. That, I wish to say, is not a matter of negotiation; it is not a matter upon which we will negotiate at all. We consider these rivers to be International highways. We ask that they shall be open, not to ourselves only, but to everybody else; and if anybody hinders the freedom of traffic along those highways, the responsibility must rest with those who do so, and I wish to say that because it must not be supposed that is any part of the negotiations we are carrying on. As to the territorial question, it is one of exceeding difficulty. Feeling is running high in this country just at this moment in one particular direction. I am not sure whether that feeling is always restrained within the limits of wisdom and discretion. I am not sure that people always remember that dominion is not an unmitigated luxury, but that it carries with it duties, burdens, obligations, dangers. My noble Friend eloquently pointed out the want of wisdom of the rulers of Portugal when they wished to stretch their territory from the shore of the Atlantic to the shore of the Indian Ocean, and asked whether that was indeed a measure which would increase the strength or the happiness of Portugal. I would ask my noble Friend, when he is giving his support to what I may call the idea of Cairo to Cape Town, whether some such criticism might not be passed with respect to a Kingdom much more powerful than Portugal, but which yet has a limit to its power. "Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur." In conclusion, I have to say that I hope we shall exact that which is the right of this country, and that which is for its honour and its strength, but I hope we shall not be seduced into undertaking obligations which are beyond our strength to perform consistently with the other duties which we have both at home and in every quarter of the globe.

OPEN SPACES BILL.—(No. 76.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 16th May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—CLERKS OF WORKS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is correct that clerks of works in Ireland are dismissed at the finishing of any contract upon the construction of which they have been employed; and whether their rate of payment is upon the same scale as the corresponding classes in the employment of the English Office of Works, and, if not, by how much, and in what manner is the difference made; and whether it is the intention of the Board to make the same rate of payment to the Irish and English clerks?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am informed that the practices both in England and Ireland is uniform, and that the engagement of a clerk of the works is a matter of contract. The rate of pay varies according to the importance of the work.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that clerks of works are much better paid in England than Ireland?

*MR. JACKSON: I can only say that it depends upon the importance of the work. There are varying rates both in England and Ireland.

DR. TANNER: What is the standard?

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot say that there is any standard. It depends on the class of work, unless a contract has been entered into.

DR. TANNER: The salaries of English clerks of works as set forth in the Estimates are higher than in Ireland, and Irish men come over here to improve their position.

*MR. JACKSON: The emigration from Ireland to England in such cases is, I believe, an usual process.

DR. TANNER: Yes; in consequence of the coercion which exists in Ireland.

CORK TOWN COUNCIL.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Cork Town Council have declined to pay the amount applied for by the Board of Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum, on the ground that their body and the citizens have no direct representation on the Asylum Board; whether he can state what representation on that Board is the Cork Corporation entitled to; and why such representation is denied to the Municipal Authorities in Cork?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The facts are as stated in the first paragraph. Under the recent scheme adopted by the Irish Government, with a view to giving direct representation on District Lunatic Asylum Boards to the several presenting bodies, four representatives were to be chosen by the Lord Lieutenant from nominees of the Cork Corporation. The Corporation, however, nominated for the four places four of their members only, which would remove from the Lord Lieutenant the power of exercising his statutory responsibility for the selection of Governors. This was pointed out to the Corporation, but they declined to send forward any additional names. The Lord Lieutenant then felt obliged to select from the general body of the Corporation four of its members to serve as its representative on the Asylum Board.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In a precisely analogous case in Dublin were not the Corporation allowed to nominate 10 members? Why should there be one rule for Dublin and another for Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is not one rule for Dublin and another for Cork. No additional names have been submitted.

THE SKINNERS' COMPANY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Skinners' Company have sold three-fourths of their property in County Londonderry to their tenants, and have now limited the time when their offer to sell will be withdrawn, owing to the fact that a Syndicate, composed of members of the Skinners' Company and others, have offered to purchase the remainder of the estate as a speculation, and that the Company have agreed to accept 15 years' purchase, while the price they demanded from their tenants was 19 years; if many of the tenants, who have not yet purchased, are precluded from doing so owing to arrears; and if he would consider the advisability of inserting a clause in the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill, giving the tenants the right of pre-emption.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that applications for purchase in respect of 671 tenants on the Skinners' Company's Estate have been lodged with the Commission. In 58 of these cases the advances applied for have been refused, and 48 are still pending. The records of the Commission do not afford any information as to the extent or value of the residue of the estate, nor have they any information as to the Syndicate referred to.

DOCKYARD LABOURERS.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the number of labourers employed at 15s. a week, 16s., 17s., 18s., 19s., 20s., and above 20s., respectively, in each of Her Majesty's Dockyards in England?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The total number of labourers employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards in England at the rates of pay mentioned in the question is 6,454. Of this number 1,037 receive 15s. a week; 517, 16s.; 1,527, 17s.; 881, 18s.; 335, 19s.; 956, 20s.; and 1,201 above 20s. In addition to the men employed at these particular rates, 101 labourers are paid 16s. 6d., and 144, 19s. 6d. a week. When any of these men are employed on task work they get extra money, from 10 to 40 per cent., in addition.

FOREIGN WORKMEN.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if, having regard to the Report of the Sweating Committee, that "Certain trades are affected by the presence of poor Foreigners, for the most part Russian and Polish Jews," he has taken steps for the enforcement of the Alien Act on the routes of their arrival, as recommended by the Select Committee on the Immigration of Foreigners?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I would remind my hon. Friend that the Report of the House of Lords' Sweating Committee only says that certain trades are to some extent affected by foreign immigration, while it speaks well of the immigrants in some respects, and does not make any suggestion to prevent immigration. I may say, however, that some time ago, before the issue of this Report, the necessary steps were taken, under powers given by the Alien Act and in other ways, to procure statistical information with regard to the immigration of foreigners as regards vessels arriving from European ports at the principal ports of the United Kingdom. This was done in pursuance of the recommendations of the Committee on the Immigration of Foreigners. The information is now coming in regularly, and the results will be published in the future Annual Reports of the Department, or more frequently if occasion should require.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Do I understand that the provisions of the Alien Act are carried out wholly or partially under his direction, and if only partially to what extent?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Only to the extent necessary for obtaining information.

SMALL ARMS FOR VOLUNTEERS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is intended at the close of the present year to call in the Snider carbine and issue the Martini-Henry carbine in its place to Artillery Volunteers?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No, Sir. Martini-Henry carbines are not available for this purpose in sufficient numbers at the present time.

SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. ERNEST BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the declaration made by him on 9th November, 1888, that

"The sphere of British influence south of the Zambesi is declared to extend over 'the territories north of the South African Republic and the Bechuanaland Protectorate, south of the Zambesi, east of the 20th degree of east longitude, and west of the Portuguese province of Sofala,'" it is the case that an English Corporation has since acquired from Moremi, the King of the Bamaugwatos, all the mineral rights, together with timber and grazing rights within his country, which country is included in the area thus defined as lying within the sphere of British influence; whether, in the negotiations now pending in Berlin, Sir Percy Anderson has been informed of the existence of this concession; and whether the Government adhere to the above-quoted definition of the sphere of British influence in South Africa?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The description referred to was accurate so far as it went, but the boundaries are necessarily to a great extent still undefined, as the Zambesi and the 20th meridian do not intersect each other. The question of further delimitation is now the subject of negotiation. Her Majesty's Government have been informed that such a concession has been acquired by an English Limited Company, and it is believed that these rights have been acquired subsequently to my statement of November, 1888. This information has been communicated to Her Majesty's Embassy at Berlin.

*MR. E. BECKETT: Are we to understand that there has been no surrender of British territory such as it was defined to be in the answer of the Secretary of State for the Colonies in November, 1888?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Perhaps I may answer that question. It is quite evident that the description in 1888 was not strictly defined to the North or North-West; but what I am in a position to say is this, that should there be any fresh delimitation of territory, any rights acquired by British subjects in such districts would be borne in mind.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL OF TOBERMORY.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that the firm of which the Procurator Fiscal of Tobermory is a member are law agents for several landed proprietors in the district, and are at present acting for two or more of these in civil processes against crofters on their estates; and whether, taking into consideration his answer to the Member for Inverness-shire on the 16th of July last, and his declaration that he approved of the action of the Sheriff of that county in instructing a firm of solicitors, of which the local Procurator Fiscal was a member, that it was undesirable that they should act in such cases, he will take steps to have the same rule adopted in Argyleshire?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I find that the Procurator Fiscal's firm have for many years acted as agents for some proprietors in Mull, and recently appeared for them in applications before the Crofter Commission; but I have no information to show that they are acting in processes against crofters, as is stated in the question, and as was the ground of complaint in the case last year to which the hon. Member refers. I have, however, thought it right to communicate with the Sheriff on the subject.

GRIEVANCES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is any Order or Regulation which prohibits, regulates, or controls the holding of meetings by those employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards, for the purpose of discussing their position and making known their grievances; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of any such Order or Regulation?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Regulations affecting the meeting of employés in the Public Service are issued Departmentally, and must depend upon the conditions and nature of the employment given. In the dockyards only a proportion of those employed are in the permanent service of the country, the remainder are periodically hired. The Admiralty have not hitherto found it necessary to issue any Regulations on the subject.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there is any Order or Regulation which prohibits, regulates, or controls the holding of meetings by those employed in any branch of the Department for the purpose of discussing their position and making known their grievances; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of any such Order or Regulation?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It has never been found necessary to make any Regulations of the kind referred to by the hon. Member. The staff of the Board of Trade, though numerous, is scattered over the whole of the United Kingdom.

POLLUTION OF THE RIVER COLNE.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will inquire into the cause of the poisoning and pollution of the River Colne and its tributaries by the Croxley Paper Mills, near Watford, on Wednesday the 7th May, whereby private property to the value of many hundreds of pounds was destroyed; and whether he has any power to insist upon the provision of necessary apparatus whereby poisonous, noxious, or polluting liquid or matter can be dealt with so as to prevent any such injury or damage for the future; and, if so, whether he will exercise such powers, in the interest of the owners, tenants, and ratepayers of the river and fisheries in the neighbourhood?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Since the notice of this question was given by the hon. Member, I have communicated with the Sanitary Authority of the Watford Union, and I learn from their clerk that no complaint has been made to the Authority as to the occurrence on the 7th May at the Croxley Paper Mills. I am informed, however, by the communications which I have received, that a tank at the mills which was charged with chloride of lime burst, the result being to poison great quantities of fish, and to affect the water for a long distance below the mills. I have no authority to insist upon the provision of necessary apparatus whereby poisonous, noxious, or polluting liquid or matter can be dealt with so as to prevent any such injury or damage for the future. If, as I infer is the case, it is considered that the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act are contravened, the Sanitary Authority are empowered, with the consent of the Local Government Board, to institute proceedings for the enforcement of that Act. If any such consent is applied for, the matter will receive my prompt consideration. In the meantime, I will bring the matter specially under the attention of the Sanitary Authority, and request them to investigate the facts and report the result to the Board.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): May I ask whether a tenant is compelled to give two months' notice before a nuisance can be abated?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board have no authority in the matter, unless the Local Authority propose to institute proceedings under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, and apply to the Board for their consent to the institution of the proceedings. The notice for the abatement of a nuisance rests with the Sanitary Authority of the district.

RECEIPTS FROM STAMPS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he definitely declines to distinguish the Metropolis from the other parts of the United Kingdom in regard to the receipts from stamps (including Probate Duty) and Income Tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, Sir; definitely.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE UNITED STATES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have acquired any recent information as to the results of the control of the drink traffic in the United States; and whether there are any authoritative Reports of recent date which can be presented to Parliament?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : My hon. Friend has not observed a very complete Report on this subject by Mr. Edwards, Her Majesty's Secretary of Legation at Washington, which has been laid before Parliament as No. 154 of the Miscellaneous Foreign Office Reports. This Paper, which has been extensively noticed, both in this country and in the United States, brings down all the information available upon the subject to a recent date.

BEHRINGS SEA FISHERIES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can make any further statement as to the progress of the negotiations for the settlement of the Behrings Sea fishery dispute?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to make any statement on the subject.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) : When will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give information as to the settlement of the Behrings Sea fisheries difficulty?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : It is impossible for me to say when a settlement will be attained, because the negotiations are not closed. I shall be happy to give the information as soon as possible.

MR. S. HILL : May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that to-day's papers announce that Sir John MacDonald is going to make a statement in the Canadian Parliament to-day?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : I do not think that the Premier will be in a position to make any statement as to the final arrangements.

THE LONDON WATER COMPANIES.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the quinquennial re-assessment of property in London, which will come into force in 1891, and will give the Water Companies power to exact an increased charge for their supplies, he can give the House any assurance that he will introduce a Bill during the present Session for the purpose of suspending the powers of the Water Companies to increase their charges for water consequent upon such increase in the assessment, and so prevent such Companies from being in a position to force up the prices at which their undertakings will have to be purchased eventually by the London County Council?

*MR. RITCHIE : I cannot hold out any expectation that the Government will introduce a Bill on the subject.

EXTINCTION OF LICENCES.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the permission proposed to be given to County Councils to borrow three years' contributions to the fund promised out of the additional Spirit Duty towards the extinction of licences involves the continuance of that duty for a definite term of years; and whether there is any precedent for such an imposition of an Excise Duty for years in advance?

MR. GOSCHEN : There are precedents in olden times, and there is nothing contrary to Constitutional practice in the proposals of the Government.

EQUIPMENT OF THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the additional sum now promised to the Volunteer Force for equipment will be given unconditionally, or whether he is considering the expediency of making, at the same time, new regulations to improve the discipline and Military efficiency of the Force?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : There is no present intention by any legislative enactment to insist on increased efficiency in return for the grant now to be made; but I feel certain that the House will support any changes which may, from time to time, be found possible, without pressing too heavily on the Volunteers, in the direction of increased efficiency and of readiness for immediate action whenever required.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

DR. CAMERON : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as stated in a Renter's telegram from St. John's of the 14th instant, that a Joint Committee of both Houses of the Newfoundland Legislature has passed an Address to Her Majesty, protesting against the action of the Imperial Government on the fisheries question; whether Her Majesty's Government have yet been made aware of the terms of the Address referred to; and whether it will be laid upon the Table of this House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have not as yet received information on the subject. There will probably be no objection to laying before the House any such Address when received.

NON-RENEWAL OF LICENCES.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he would add a new Clause to the Local Taxation Duties Bill, declaring that nothing shall be taken to imply that compensation ought to be given upon the non-renewal of a licence?

*MR. RITCHIE: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to wait until the Amendments are put upon the Paper in order to see what the Government propose.

MAGAZINE RIFLES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of magazine rifles have already been manufactured, and how many it is expected will be completed before the end of this year by private manufacturers, and in the Government Factory respectively; what number of sets of the Slade-Wallace equipment have already been manufactured for the Army and Volunteers respectively, and how many will, it is expected, be so completed before the end of the year; whether he will be able to arrive at a decision as to the alleged patents in connection with a new rifle and a new equipment, which have already been so largely manufactured, before the vote for them is taken; and how many of the patents taken out in connection with the magazine rifle stand in the names of persons in Government employment?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not able, consistently with the public interests, to state the numbers made and expected of the magazine rifle; but if my hon. Friend wishes it, I shall be happy to communicate them to him privately. As regards the Slade-Wallace equipment, 19,314 sets have been received, and 60,400 more are expected before the end of the year. These are for the Regular Forces. The Volunteers buy their own. A decision as to the patents affecting the Slade-Wallace equipment will, I hope, be arrived at very shortly. The case of the magazine rifle will take longer, and must be considered by the Ordnance Council. Four patents in connection with the magazine rifle stand in the names of persons in Government employment, but their validity has not at present been recognised.

THE LONDON CORPORATION DESTRUCTOR.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the nuisance (to which his attention was drawn in June last) arising from noisome smoke issuing from the chimney of the "destructor" belonging to the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London, situated at Lett's Wharf, still continues; that it was particularly offensive on the 15th instant; and that complaint has been made to the Lambeth Vestry by Mr. Shield, Police Magistrate; and whether he will take further, and effectual, steps to abate the nuisance?

*MR. RITCHIE: In June of last year a question was asked in the House with reference to an alleged nuisance from noisome smoke issuing from the chimney of the destructor at Lett's Wharf. I communicated at that time with the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London and the Vestry of the Parish of Lambeth on the subject, but the replies which were received did not confirm the allegation that there was any such nuisance. Since then I have received no communication alleging that such a nuisance exists, but I will make further inquiries as to the facts.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I will repeat the question on Thursday.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been directed to the hardship of the smaller class of shopkeepers who reside over their shops, caused by the fact that unless the shop is a separate tenement and separately let the annual value of the shop is reckoned in the amount on which the house is assessed to the Inhabited House Duties; whether this is the rule even if the shop does not communicate directly with the rest of the house, and whether he is willing to consider the propriety of enacting, either in the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill or otherwise, that where a part of any house being one property is occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, whether the part so occupied communicates directly or not with the rest of the house, such part of the house shall not be taken into account in assessing the amount on which the house shall be chargeable with the Inhabited House Duties?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry that I can only give to the hon. Member the same answer I have given to other hon. Members, that I am not prepared to open up any further question as to the House Duty this year.

BENARES.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to his answer of the 12th July, 1889, whether the Secretary of State is now aware that, with respect to the seizure and confiscation of certain property and Trusts Funds belonging to the Temples of Gunnessh, Shiva, and Anpurna, and the Chattras at Benares, on the 19th January, 1858, an official inquiry was ordered by the Government of India on the 10th September, 1888; and that a Report, in reply, was forwarded to the Government of India, on the 14th February, 1889, by the Commissioners of Benares; whether that Report was favourable to the claims of the Trustee of the Temples, for the restitution of part of the property seized, the Commissioner suggesting that the property should be restored to the proper parties, and to the necessity for further investigation as to the other parts of the property; and whether such restoration has taken place, and such further investigation made; and, if not, if he can state the reasons?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): An official inquiry was ordered, and two Reports dated the 14th February and the 13th April, 1889, were made. These Reports were unfavourable to the claim of the Trustees of the Temples, nor did the Commissioner suggest, as alleged, that property should be restored. No restoration has taken place, because the Government of India, after full consideration of the case, have come to the conclusion that the claim now preferred is not only unsupported by any evidence, but is also improbable and inconsistent with the claimants' own conduct.

MR. BRADLAUGH: There appears to have been some misconception in regard to the matter. Will the Secretary of State lay upon the Table the two Reports of February and April, 1889?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes; their will be no objection to lay them on the Table if the hon. Member will move for them.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I will move for them.

DISMISSAL OF SURGEONS ON THE BENGAL ESTABLISHMENT.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State's attention has been drawn to the circumstances under which Kali Krishna Bágchi and two other surgeons on the Bengal Establishment have been dismissed from the Service; whether it is the fact that, in accordance with the rule governing the promotion of assistant surgeons, Kali Krishna Bágchi, after 14 years most satisfactory service, applied for examination at the septennial examination in Calcutta, in May last, and two other assistant surgeons, after a lesser term of service, applied for like examination; such examination took place, and all were declared to have satisfied the examiners; that the Inspector General of Hospitals addressed questions to the principal of the Medical College, and received assurances that every safeguard against foul play had been taken, and the examination conducted under adequate supervision; that, nevertheless, the Inspector General called upon Kali Krishna Bágchi and two others to undergo a supplementary examination prepared by himself; whether this course was in direct contradiction to the Regulations affecting medical examinations in India, the Examining Board alone having power to examine medical officers; whether Kali Krishna Bágchi and two others, having, on the ground that the proceedings were an imputation on their honour, and contrary to the Regulations, refused to submit themselves to the supplementary examination, were summarily dismissed for wilful disobedience of orders; whether the Head of a Department can thus summarily dismiss officers against whom no charges of misconduct are made or inquired into, in view of the fact that the Rules of the Government Service in India state that Indian

"Subordinates are not to be dismissed merely in consequence of unfavourable opinions entertained towards them by their superiors, or for slight reasons, but on proof only of tangible delinquency in such matters as fraud and dishonesty, continued and wilful negligence, and all offences involving worse disgrace;"

and whether he will give instructions that the order for the dismissal of these officers shall be cancelled, and will direct an inquiry to be instituted into the whole circumstances, in which full opportunity will be given to the officers concerned to answer any charges which may have been brought against them?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has no official information as to the allegations contained in the question. If the hon. Member will furnish the Secretary of State with any ground for them, the matter will be referred for inquiry to the Government of India.

HALL-MARKING FOR INDIAN WARES.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any communications have been received from India with reference to the Government proposals to institute a special system of hall-marking for Indian wares; and, if so, whether he will state the nature of such communications?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has referred the proposal of the Government to the Viceroy, but there has not yet been time for a reply.

GOVERNMENT STAMPS FOR INDIA.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the amount annually paid to the Inland Revenue Department, by the India Office for the control of the stamps required by the Government of India; how much of this amount is paid in salaries, and wages, and to whom; and whether any portion of this amount so received for a definite purpose, but unappropriated for that purpose, is treated as a miscellaneous receipt by the Board of Inland Revenue, and paid to the Exchequer as, such, on refunded to the India Office?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the amount paid for the year ending March, 1889, by the Revenue Department for services in India was £3,479 4s. 7d. Of this sum £2,489 4s. 7d. was paid for the wages of the men employed by the Indian Government. The balance of £990 was paid over to the Exchequer as miscellaneous revenue, under a general arrangement, signed by the Treasury in 1886. Of that sum £690 was paid in the shape of salaries to certain officers for the control and inspection of stamps, and the balance was held over for incidental expenditure.

MR. HANBURY: What was the incidental expenditure?

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot say, but I take it that in every Department there is a certain amount of incidental expenditure.

MR. HANBURY: On the Inland Revenue Vote I will call attention to the matter.

EAST AND CENTRAL AFRICA.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): As a matter of urgency, I beg to ask whether there is any truth in the statement, made in the Morning Post of to-day, that the Germans are aiming at the exclusion of British Missions and British commerce from the Kingdom of Uganda; that Cardinal Lavigerie has entered into an agreement with the German East African Company to procure these ends and to cause Uganda to be withdrawn from the scope of the contemplated delimitations of territory in Central Africa; and whether, in view of the expenditure of life, labour, and money there in the cause of civilisation and Christianity, the Foreign Office will do its utmost to protect the interests of Missions and travellers in those parts?

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I ask him to inform the House whether the line of demarcation in 1886 still remains the line between the sphere of British influence and the sphere of German influence in that portion of East Africa? The point I refer to was laid down in a letter of Lord Salisbury's dated July 2, 1887.

*SIR J. FERGUSON: As the newspaper statements in question are calculated to cause apprehension, and as the House does not sit again till Monday, I shall be justified in replying that Her Majesty's Government have no information tending to confirm them. In reply to the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. M. Ferguson), I may say that we know of no action on the part of the German Government or of German Agents calculated to prejudice the rights of British subjects under existing agreements, and that matters hitherto unsettled are being discussed at Berlin in a friendly spirit, so that the important interests involved will not be prejudiced by abstention from discussion at present.

THE DIVISION ON THE LOCAL TAXATION BILL.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish to draw the Speaker's attention to the fact that in the Division on the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of the House this morning, the Ayes are stated to be 339 and the Noes 266, thus giving a majority of 73 for the Second Reading. As the votes were given it appears that the Members voting for the Second Reading were 338 and those against 268, thus giving a majority of only 70. I wish to ask whether the mistake will be set right?

*MR. SPEAKER: I have no doubt that any mistake will be put right.

*MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's): It very often happens that the figures are not quite correct at first, but the mistake is set right the next day. I believe that there has been a mistake made in the numbers, the hon. Member for Walsall (Sir C. Forster) not having gone through the Lobby, and another Member not being counted. The correction will appear in the usual course.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SIR WILFRID LAWSON.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I wish, Sir, with the permission of the House, to make a personal explanation. The leader of the House in his speech last night gave the impression that on a certain occasion in this House I had been a supporter of compensation. I have referred to Hansard, and I would like to read to the House the words I used on March 13, 1877 (the occasion referred to by the right hon. Gentleman), with reference to the Gothenburg Resolution of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). I spoke as follows:—

"My hon. Friend talks about compensation. His Resolution is very well drawn, and he says he would give 'fair compensation.' So would I. I do not want to do anything unfair. Let anybody show that he is entitled to compensation, and there is no one in the House who would be more ready to vote for it than I am. But I tell you what I think—this is merely my opinion. I think that where a man has made a bargain with the public, and has paid money for the power of selling drink up to the 10th of October, on which day his licence ends, it is quite fair that if you want him to give up before that date you should pay him something. But after that I would not give him one penny of compensation. People talk about compensation, but I should like to see any first-class lawyer stand up in this House and pledge his reputation to the statement that a publican has any right to compensation after his licence has run out. He would never be listened to again and his authority would be gone if he dared to say anything of the kind."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should like to ask the hon. Baronet one question. Did he not vote for the Resolution I read to the House last night?

SIR W. LAWSON: I am not charging the right hon. Gentleman with doing anything unfair. I certainly voted for the Resolution, but at the same time I made the statement I have read to the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Captain Selwyn, for four weeks, on account of ill-health.—(Mr. Akers Douglas.)

MOTIONS.

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sexton, Bill to amend the Law relating to Local Courts of Bankruptcy in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sexton, Sir James Corry, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. M'Cartan, and Mr. Clancy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 280.]

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chance, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Registration of Parliamentary voters in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chance, Mr. T. M. Healy, and Mr. Maurice Healy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 281.]

TRUST INVESTMENT ACT (1889) AMENDMENT
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Oldroyd, Bill to amend "The Trust Investment Act, 1889," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Oldroyd, Mr. George Curzon, Mr. Gully, Sir Matthew White Ridley, and Mr. Rowntree.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 282.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL.—(No. 231.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Postponed Clause 4.

*(250.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to move, in postponed Clause No. 4, page 2, line 9, after "ninety," to insert "until the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one." The object of the Amendment is to provide that the new tax to be placed upon spirits should only be imposed for a period of 12 months. By Clause 2 of the Bill the Tea Duty is only imposed for a period of 12 months, and by Clause 22 the Income Tax also is only imposed for one year. I presume the Committee are aware of the reasons why the taxation of the year is made annual and not permanent. It involves a Constitutional principle. The present mode of dealing with our Customs and Inland Revenue is by an annual Bill, that practice having been settled in consequence of the dispute between the two Houses when the Paper Duty was repealed. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put the new duty on the same footing as the Tea Duty and the Income Tax, on the ground that by so doing he will not interfere with the annual control of the House of Commons over the taxation of the year. I am aware that a considerable portion of the Revenue is of a permanent character. There are a large number of taxes which form part of our regular fiscal system which are not voted annually, but this House has always reserved to itself the control over a certain portion of the annual supply in order to secure its control over the annual expenditure. That this is the Constitutional practice is shown by what was said by Mr.

Disraeli in 1860, who, referring to Lord Palmerston's acknowledgment of the importance and absolute necessity of the House of Commons exercising a due and effective control over the annual taxation of the country, said that there was not only Constitutional Liberals, but commercial Liberals—the Constitutional Liberals were desirous of retaining the control over the annual Revenue of the country, whereas the commercial Liberals wished to exercise such a pressure upon the Minister of the day, that for commercial purposes the control of the House over its annual taxation was lost. Now, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, if anything, is a Constitutional Liberal. I think he will not repudiate that title, and I appeal to him to maintain the control of this House over the taxation of the country. The question underlying this point is the exclusive jurisdiction of the House over the annual taxation of the country. The result of this Bill will be to give to the House of Lords a co-ordinate jurisdiction with the House of Commons over taxation, and against that I wish to protest. Lord J. Russell, in the same Debate, said that if the House of Lords was to be admitted to partnership with the House of Commons the finances of the country might be thrown into utter confusion, and he added that the effect of making a proposed tax a permanent addition to the taxation of the country was that without the concurrence of the House of Lords you could neither deal with the tax which was to be imposed nor with the application of it. In this way the House of Commons would altogether lose its control over the taxation of the country, because no alteration could be effected without legislation, to which the House of Lords must be a party. The other night the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in speaking upon this subject, alluded to the old custom of one of the Money Bills not being passed until a late period of the Session, in order that the House of Commons might keep its control. Now we have the whole taxation put into one Bill, and at present we have only two great annual taxes, namely, the Tea Duty and the Income Tax, and this year we are going materially to reduce the Tea Duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the tipplers are to relieve the consumers of tea, but we are going to sacrifice £1,500,000 of the Tea Duty. What the Amendment proposes is that the sum of £1,300,000, which is what the Chancellor of the Exchequer called the tipplers' relief to the consumers of tea, should be put in the same position, in no better and no worse position than the duty on tea. It ought to be an annual tax voted by the House; it ought to be subject to the control of the House, and in that way the House would maintain its exclusive jurisdiction over taxation. That is the Constitutional aspect, but there is also a practical, financial aspect of the matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer invites us to make a great financial experiment, and he assumes that an increase of the Spirit Duties is certain to be followed by a corresponding increase of revenue; but he has adduced no facts in support of that assumption; and all the evidence goes to show that there is a certain high-water mark beyond which increase of duties produces illicit distillation, and the revenue suffers. I do not say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is wrong; but, at any rate, it is only an experimental view, and he has no authority for the position he has taken. All the authorities go the other way. In 1819 the duties on spirits reached 11s. 8½d., which was the highest point they ever reached. And what followed? The revenue, instead of increasing, diminished. In 1823 Mr. Huskisson took the matter in hand. He reduced the Scotch Duty from 6s. 2d. to 2s. 5d., the Irish Duty from 5s. 7d. to 2s. 5d., and the English Duty from 11s. 8½d. to 7s. The revenue immediately increased. In 1860 the Spirit Duties reached 10s., at which point they have practically remained ever since. But in the interval between 1825, when Mr. Huskisson dealt with the matter, and 1860, when the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian placed the taxation on its present level, the result of the increase of the Spirit Duty, as shown in the valuable work on Finance by my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar (Mr. S. Buxton), was a falling off of the revenue. In 1858, instead of the £500,000 expected, only £70,000 was received; and in 1860, instead of an additional £600,000 from British spirits, there was an actual diminution of revenue to the extent of £550,000. It was not until four years later that the Chancellor of the Exchequer succeeded in raising the additional amount of revenue he had calculated upon in 1860. I do not say that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer is not right in anticipating the large sum he has mentioned; but on Constitutional, as well as on financial, grounds I maintain that the tax should be limited to one year. A third peculiarity of the present proposal is that it is a tax for a new purpose, and not for the National Expenditure of the year. There has been no estimate laid before the House showing that the Imperial taxation requires it. There is reason to complain of the delay in furnishing the House with information bearing upon this point; and the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was obliged to speak the other night without having seen a Return which had been distributed that morning. How much money in aid up to the present time has been paid to the Local Authorities? What has been the result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals of 1838 and 1889?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I stated it in the Budget speech.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Only the sum then paid. Before the House is asked to increase the subventions which were given two years back we are entitled to know what amount these subventions have reached and how they have been apportioned between the counties and the boroughs. I raise for the moment no question of the goodness or badness of the tax or of the justice or injustice of the appropriation; but the whole scheme is a huge experiment, and, therefore, I move my Amendment limiting the tax to 12 months.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after the word "ninety," to insert the words "until the first day of April one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one."

—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(3.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the Committee are extremely indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). I greatly regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to accept the offer made to him last night to take these postponed clauses out of the Bill and put them in the Bill which is to follow. The House is asked to enter upon an entirely novel course, and nothing is known of how the taxes proposed will be administered, or, so far as Ireland is concerned, whether Local Government will ever be established there at all. It is monstrous to ask Irish Members to vote an additional tax on spirits—one of the principal commodities of Ireland—when it is impossible to say whether any of it will ever be devoted to the extinction of public houses. The House is asked to vote the tax for good or bad, once and for all, and without any possibility of annual revision. The Government may be driven out of Office before they pass the Local Government Bill for Ireland, or they may change their minds about the introduction of such a measure at all. Nevertheless, this tax will have been voted beyond review or recall. The well-known liberal views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer about the extension of Local Government to Ireland may be smothered by his own Cabinet; yet he asks us to vote this Bill on the faith of getting Local Government for Ireland. He asks us to give a blank cheque to Lord Salisbury in the shape of an additional sixpence on Irish whisky. Good and generous and democratic as the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman may be, it must be remembered that he has a Cabinet acting with him who may out-vote him, and there may be no extinction of public houses in Ireland at all. As a matter of fact, we are discussing this measure handcuffed and with our tongues tied. English Members have less ground for complaint. They have already got their Local Government, whereas the Irish people may have neither the one nor the other. They may never get Local Government, but, at the same time, they will have to pay this tax. Is it unreasonable, then, to ask that next year we should have an opportunity of again criticising the proposals of the Government? I certainly cannot see what object the Government propose to gain by refusing to have a review of the matter next year. I object in the strongest way not only to the proposals of the Government, but to the mode in which they are carrying them out. I dispute their good intentions, and challenge their bona fides. With regard to the question of taxation, which is one of the fundamental questions with which Members of Parliament have to deal, we ought to have an opportunity of re-considering our position and the circumstances of the country in the same way as in the case of other matters, for which we annually pass Continuance Bills. I do not know what argument the Government can allege on this one point unless it be the old argument that we must have confidence in the Government, which simply amounts to this: "Open your mouth and shut your eyes and see what the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give you." I am glad to notice that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone has at last taken his proper place in this House [the hon. Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) was at this moment sitting on one of the Ministerial Benches], but I think that even he will agree with me in asking that the Government should afford us next year some means of reviewing their fiscal policy with regard to Ireland. It has already been stated that shortly after the great war the English people had to pay the enormous duty of 11s. 8d. per gallon on spirits. That is the highest fiscal tax ever imposed on this country, and I am glad to say we never had it to pay in Ireland; but now the Government are seeking to impose upon us, not for Imperial, but for local purposes, the heaviest tax ever placed upon what is the chief article of Irish manufacture. If the Government had imported this proposal into a Local Government Bill there might have been some reason in it; but as it is, we have no guarantee as to what will be done with the money, and next year, in all probability, we shall be in exactly the same position as we are now. The money will be gone, our whisky will still be heavily taxed, we shall still be without a Local Government Board, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer will still be Chancellor of the Exchequer, which practically will be the one point the Government will have attained.

*(3.35.) SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): My objection to the proposal of the Government is that they put upon an article, which is one of the chief products of Irish manufacture, a tax which is perfectly monstrous. This is a subject about which I know something—I have felt much interest in it for many years, and I have more than once shown that during the last 37 years the tax on proof spirits has been advanced in Ireland from 2s. 8d. to 10s. a gallon, while the Englishman pays on his own national beverage the very disproportionate tax of 1s. 10d. on its alcoholic equivalent in the vehicle of beer.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that the Amendment before the Committee is a proposal to limit the tax to the year, whereas the hon. Gentleman is arguing that it should be done away with altogether.

*SIR J. M'KENNA: I bow, Sir, with all due respect to your ruling; but I think that in supporting an Amendment which proposes to limit the tax to one year it is not going beyond the question to urge facts which favour the limitation, although they may show that it ought not to be imposed at all. I think that that point is capable of appreciation even by the meanest intellect. I do not think that anyone will be deceived by the proposal of the Government, which simply means that Ireland shall pay, in addition to the present exorbitant duty, another 6d. for the so-called benevolent objects the Government have put forward.

(3.38.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I quite agree with the contention of my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), who has objected to the imposition of this tax for an indefinite period. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has raised a question of great Constitutional importance, and it is one on which we are all anxious to hear the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My hon. Friend the Member for Longford has truly said we have no guarantee that the money to be raised by the Bill will be applied to any of the local purposes to which we are told it will be devoted. On the contrary, I think we have every guarantee that it will not be devoted to those local objects. Therefore, I say, we are right in resisting the imposition of this tax for a longer period of 12 months. In 12 months the Government will surely be enabled to see what will be the effect of the new taxation on beer and spirits.

As my hon. Friend has put it we are asked to impose this increased taxation with our eyes blindfolded. Perhaps I may be allowed to amend the old saw he has just quoted by putting it in this form—"Shut your eyes, open your purse, and see how we will spend it." As it is, we are in a condition of absolute uncertainty as to how this proposal will operate; and, under these circumstances, I think we are entitled to a clear explanation from the Government of the reasons why this new taxation is to be imposed. Why cannot the Government accept the Amendment limiting the tax to a period of 12 months, when, if it be found to work well, it might, as my hon. and learned Friend suggests, be carried on by means of Continuance Bills. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be wise in accepting the proposed limitation.

*(3.43.) MR. GOSCHEN: In reply to the observations of the hon. Member who has just spoken I would point out that he and other hon. Members are in error in thinking that in voting a tax like that now proposed they will thereby be precluded from re-opening the question at any future time. There is scarcely a tax, whatever its nature may be, that escapes attack, and with regard to which Motions are not brought forward for its repeal. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, in bringing forward his Amendment, argued the question on Constitutional grounds, financial grounds, and experimental grounds. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that it was un-Constitutional to vote taxes for a longer period than one year, and that we are departing from Constitutional practice in the proposal now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman went back to the Debates of 1860 in order to justify his Constitutional objection; but he did not quote anything that has occurred since that date in support of his contention. The right hon. Gentleman will find in all these cases that the taxes have been voted in precisely the same manner as this is proposed. I am very much mistaken if my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, when he imposed a Spirit Duty, limited it to one year. That has never been the practice since the year 1860; and, so far as I have known, with the exception of the Estate Duty last year they have always been proposed precisely in the manner in which we propose to vote it this year. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fowler) wishes the old portion of the tax (10s.) to be in the ordinary form, but the 6d. over that 10s. is to be in the new form. It must be obvious that the right hon. Gentleman is forcing the doctrine of 1860 to a remarkable extent in considering in dealing with this particular tax we should be retaining the power and influence of the House of Commons over the general taxation of the country. The right hon. Gentleman did not argue it from the point of view of a particular application. He laid it down as a Constitutional duty that, having parted with a million and a half of Tea Duty, the House of Commons was to put its hand on a similar amount in order to be master of the fiscal position of the country. I think he will see that though a Constitutional it was an entirely fallacious argument. With regard to the financial effect of my proposals, I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that if there is one means more than another which would frustrate the expectations of the Government as to the amount to be realised from the tax it would be to treat it as an avowedly experimental tax. Surely the right hon. Gentleman has been long enough at the Treasury to know that if you want a tax to yield a smaller amount in a given year than it otherwise would yield you have only to hold out to the trade that it is highly likely to be reviewed again next year. We do not wish, even if we could, to deprive the House of Commons of any kind of control over this tax at all. It will be in the power of the House to vote against this tax next year. We cannot treat it as an experimental tax. Hon. Members, if they read the history of Parliament, will know that it is in the power of the House either to repeal or to diminish the tax. The whole point is that if you leave it to be supposed that a particular tax will be reviewed next year, you leave the whole trade in a state of anxiety and perturbation. Under these circumstances, I regret to say that the Government cannot accept the Amendment put forward by the right hon. Gentleman. We cannot admit his Constitutional arguments, and, as regards his financial arguments, we should be bringing about the very results which, from one point of view, he has deprecated, namely, that we should lessen the yield of the tax.

(3.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Sir, I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should object to the proposal of my right hon. Friend. Why does he propose to make this tax for a year only? That need not disturb the equanimity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his friends. He will always get the Solicitor General and the Law Officers of the Crown to advise him that a tax for the year is only a tax for the year. Or, again, that if you grant a licence for a year, and a year only, that is a licence for ever, and it cannot be allowed to drop without full compensation. Moreover, Sir Algernon West will go on collecting the tax as if it was a perpetual tax, because the doctrine of the Government is that to grant a licence for a single year—and why not a tax for a single year?—is a grant for ever. What Parliament says on the subject is immaterial. That is the view of the persons who administer the tax. The House of Commons may say the tax is for one year, but the Inland Revenue will go on, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will say, I am entitled to compensation, and that compensation will be the continuance of the tax for ever. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will have the tax, no matter what limitation is placed on the tax by Parliament. If it is agreeable to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer need trouble himself about the Statutory limitations. With regard to this tax, we are not allowed to state the reason why we vote it. That is a great difficulty. It is a difficulty which was felt in the ancient Roman processions, where certain busts were more conspicuous in consequence of their absence. And the objections to the way in which this tax is to be appropriated are more conspicuous in consequence of the ruling by which we are not permitted even to allude to them. But we cannot forget this duty is proposed for a particular purpose—a purpose of which I entirely disapprove, and which I shall oppose by every means in my power. The object for which this tax is imposed might be in itself an experiment. I will make the fictitious suggestion that a tax of this kind might be appropriated to some Local Body, who must use it for a particular purpose. For that reason I should think it would be highly desirable that the House should have an opportunity of considering whether it would perpetuate that tax. And when we talk of limiting the taxes, remember what has been done with reference to other questions, both by this House and the other House of Parliament. Remember that the House of Lords passed the Ballot Act only for a limited time in order to retain the right of review of the question at some future period. If it is conceivable that this tax is to be appropriated under any circumstances to some experimental purposes, it is highly proper that the tax should be made for a limited period and not for ever. The right hon. Gentleman has rejected the Constitutional argument. I do not see that it ought to be lightly rejected, because, after all, what is the theory of having an annual tax as well as taxes which are passed for ever? It is that the House shall compel the Government to give a certain amount of money every year over which the House of Commons keeps control. Why should you diminish that fund? If you are depleting it in one direction you should fill it up in another. The taxes which up to this time have been kept in our hands, for the purpose of maintaining the control of the House of Commons, are diminishing in proportion to the whole Revenue of the country. I cannot see on what possible ground this objection can be sustained to limiting this tax. Sir, I shall certainly vote for this Amendment on that ground, and upon the ground also that I entirely disapprove of the objects to which this tax is to be applied. Of course, we shall have an opportunity of voting on the amount of the tax. Those who approve of portions of the tax must vote for its diminution by an amount which would cover the part to which they object. Though we are precluded from discussing the objects to which the tax is to be applied, I, for one, shall take advantage of every opportunity of resisting a tax which I believe is to be devoted to purposes of which I disapprove.

we are because the Government in this Bill have mixed up two things which ought to be separate, and I must say the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton is one which merits somewhat better and fuller treatment than it received at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. To some extent I agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. So far as the Constitutional question is concerned, involving the power of the House of Lords, I think we need not trouble ourselves about it, because, although the House of Lords are obstructive in many matters they are hardly likely in the future to tax the country, or prevent a tax being taken off; but I think there is great force in the remark of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton that this House ought to have every year the opportunity of voting a very considerable amount of the public taxation, in order, if necessary, to curtail the expenditure for which the taxation is voted. Unless there is this annual opportunity the House will have very little means of discussing the taxation of the country, except on occasions when a considerable number of alterations are made, as is the case this year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said this is an absurd Amendment, as it only proposes to make annual a small proportion of the whole taxation; but I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he himself has made this small proportion a special tax. It is because he has put it on a special ground, and applied it to a certain special purpose, to which many of us on this side of the House strongly object, that we think it right and fair that that small proportion of the taxation of the country should be put on a special basis and made an annual tax. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman's argument that the whole of the great trade affected and the Revenue derived from it would be disturbed by this small proportion of the taxation being voted annually has much foundation in fact. I doubt if this taxation will be permanent whatever it is applied to, although when the Chancellor of the Exchequer says there is nothing to prevent the subject being raised every year, and a decision being taken as to whether the tax should continue, I would reply that, as everybody knows, it is idle for a private Member to attempt to interfere with the taxation of the nation, except on the Budget Bill. Only once or twice in the whole history of this House has such an attempt been successful. Should a private Member raise a discussion on the subject of taxation before the Budget he would be told that it was premature to go into such matters, and the Government would decline debate, and should he wait until after the Budget he would be told: "Oh! you are too late, as the Government have decided upon their financial policy for the year." We object to the proposal to make this particular taxation permanent. I, for one, do not object to increased duties on spirits and beer, but I do object to the way in which the tax has been mixed up with a lot of other subjects. We object to the allocation of the tax, and we say that as it is thoroughly an experimental matter we are entitled to ask that, instead of its being made a permanent part of our fiscal system, and of our local finance, it should be voted annually, so as to give the House an opportunity of revising it, and—if it feels that this very wrong system of mixing up local and Imperial taxation should be put an end to—of abolishing it without having to introduce a special Bill.

(4.6.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: Considering that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is probably the ablest Gentleman who sits on the Conservative side, I am surprised at the reply he has given. He said, "I admit your whole case." ["No, no."] Well, I am putting it in my own way. He said, "I admit your whole case; but you have a remedy, for next year you can bring in a Bill to repeal the section." This is his argument. I admit you have this grievance; I admit we never intend to give Ireland Local Government, and that you will never have a chance of extinguishing public-house licences in Ireland; but you will be able to revise this tax by bringing in a repeal clause." Is that the policy pursued by the Tory Party themselves? Why, when the Leaseholders' Clauses were going through Parliament they limited them to two years. They did not say: "We will give the leaseholders this right for ever, but if we find there is reason for it

we will bring in a repeal clause next year." And when the Labourers' Act was going through the House of Lords why did they limit it to three years? Why did they put 10 years in the Ballot Bill? Why did they not rely upon repeal clauses? Because they wished to have a more effectual instrument, and yet the Government ask us to relinquish that instrument—the principal instrument of the Tory Party. That is the way in which the House of Lords endeavours to bring reactionary pressure to bear upon the House of Commons. It arranges to bring these matters under discussion mechanically, by the procession of the equinoxes and annual meetings of Parliament. That is the Tory plan. It was you who invented it. You are the patentee of it—the right hon. Gentleman opposite is the successor in title to the patent rights of it, and yet, what does he offer us? Not the benefit of his own patent, but he says "You must take the initiative." We may do that—we may propose a repealing clause, and in will walk the First Lord of the Treasury to move this Closure—by the way, I am glad the right hon. Gentlemen is absent for a moment, for we can feel safe and know that we can speak a sentence without the Closure. To tell us that we can bring in a repealing clause next year is unworthy of the genius of the right hon. Gentleman, and the fact of his using such an argument shows that he has no argument whatever to bring forward. Let us have an answer to our case. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given us none. The way to deal with our case is not to say "I admit all you say, but you have your repealing clause." Will the Government give us some guarantee that this money will be expended in Ireland in the same way that it is to be expended in England and Scotland? We know how it is to be spent in England and Scotland, and can talk about it, but so far as Ireland is concerned, a padlock is to be put on a considerable portion of it. Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a statement on the subject? He is now by himself on the Treasury Bench, uncontrolled by any other Members of the Cabinet, and now, as a Liberal Unionist, he can express his mind on the question of Local Government for Ireland without Conservative discount. We would accept a statement from him conveying the ordinary information that Englishmen and Scotchmen expect to get when a proposal as important as this is before the House.

(4.14.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): It would be difficult to exaggerate the inconvenience of the proposal the Government are making in asking the Committee to pass this tax. In 1888, when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was making his proposal to relieve the county rates at the cost of the Imperial Exchequer, he said—

"I ought to add that I propose to introduce the horse tax and the wheel tax in a separate Bill, because they do not really affect the Imperial Budget at all."

That is the course which commended itself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888, and I venture to submit to the Committee that it is the course he ought to adopt on the present occasion. We are asked to grant an increase of 6d. in the Customs Duty on spirits, and, personally, as an Irish Member I should have no objection to the tax if the money were required for a good purpose. I should not care if the duty on foreign spirits were increased 6s. or 7s., but I object to the clause which would increase the tax on home spirits, and I think it a most extraordinary thing to make the Committee vote a tax in an Imperial Budget which is not to be used for Imperial purposes.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment before the Committee is an Amendment limiting the tax for one year, and the observations of the hon. Member are hardly germane to that or to the subject of the clause.

MR. DILLON: I will postpone my observations until the other clause is before the Committee.

(4.16.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): It is immaterial to me, as representing a constituency in this House, whether the tax on spirits is 6d., 6s., or £6, but I do strongly object to the proposal of the Government, on certain grounds, and, therefore, I heartily support the Amendment. In my opinion all taxation ought to be limited to one year—that is to say, we should not be put to the necessity of bringing in repeal clauses, but power should always be reserved to the representatives of the people to continue the taxes, which is a more simple and easy process. The Income Tax was originally a temporary expedient, but it has been continued for so many years that now it has come to be regarded altogether as a permanent form of taxation. It has been impossible to get rid of the tax, despite this power of moving repeal clauses, and this shows how ridiculous it is to suppose that if this extra 6d. on spirits is once granted it will ever be got rid of. But on broad Constitutional grounds we have a right to oppose this proposal on account of the way in which it is put before us. Our tongues are tied as to the object to which it is intended to devote the tax; although everybody knows what that object is. The manner in which the question is submitted to the House is a specimen of political dodgery which I hope we may never be doomed to witness in this House again. There was nothing said in the Bill we passed last night as to the form of this taxation. There is nothing whatever said in this Bill as to the licences, and it is very well understood that a portion, at any rate, of the taxation with which we are now dealing is intended to be applied in extinction of licences. This crooked method of dealing with the taxation of the country is, I may say, characteristic of the crooked behaviour of the Government in everything they have undertaken. The Government insist on making this a permanent tax. They seem to consider that they have a permanent tenure of that Bench. I think that the result of the elections which will shortly take place, will disabuse them of that idea, and that their successors in Office will rapidly put an end to whatever element of permanence there may be in taxation of this kind. We have heard of consumptive patients being endowed with a longing for, and a belief in, the extension of life, and the consumptive occupants of the Treasury Bench seem to be possessed of a similar insane hope that their lives may be indefinitely prolonged. I support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, because it seems to me to be the best expedient we can adopt for staving off what we regard as a grave evil. I object to the proposal of the Government on another ground. As they are going to impose this taxation on the people of Ireland without granting them that redress in the form of local institutions which they have every right to demand, and which we hope ere long to be able to grant them, it is all humbug for us to talk about "freely and voluntarily" resolving to give these supplies. If they are given at all, they are wrung from us. I see, Mr. Courtney, you are shaking your head, and, as I do not wish to put you to the trouble of rising, I will postpone the further observations I have to make on this portion of the subject until we come to discuss the Preamble. As there will be other opportunities of expressing ourselves on this political scheme of ducks and drakes, which is so characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I will only say, in the words of the Anti-Jacobin's Friend of Humanity to the needy knife grinder: "I give thee sixpence? No, I'll see thee damned first."

(4.25.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): My right hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) asks that this tax should only be imposed for one year. If his proposition be rejected, and the tax be imposed by Act of Parliament, we, as the guardians of the public purse, entirely part with our right to say when it is to cease. An Act of Parliament must receive the assent of the House of Lords. At the next General Election, every man in England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, may be opposed to this tax, with the exception of 600 hereditary legislators; there may be a majority in this House against the tax, and yet it will continue unless the House of Lords agrees to its discontinuance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says there is already a tax of 10s. per gallon on whisky, and that he is only applying to the extra 6d. the system which is adopted in regard to the 10s. I am only sorry that that system has been applied to the 10s.; but, if we have not taken care of the pounds, there is no reason why we should not take care of the pence. The question is, "Are we to part with the control of this tax, or not?" I say our duty to our constituents obliges us to decline to part with it, and I hope we shall this evening establish a precedent for annual taxes being only imposed annually.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the Government will not give us a reply—

Mr. Conybeare

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have no wish to be discourteous to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I could not enter into the hon. Member's arguments without transgressing the ruling of the Chair. The hon. and learned Member will have further opportunities of discussing the application of this measure to Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When?

*MR. GOSCHEN: When we come to the other Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is not in the other Bill. There is no provision whatever in regard to Irish licences in the other Bill.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But Irish licences are not the only things in point. There are other provisions respecting Ireland in the other Bill. The Government will consider the suggestion, with every desire to accept it, that Corporations in Ireland should deal with licences in the same manner as Local Authorities deal with them in England.

(4.30.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not quite correctly stated what was proposed as to the increase of the duties in 1885. In the case of the Beer Duty, an appeal was made to me only to enact the increase for one year, and I complied with that request. I do hope that, after the strong appeal which has been made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and other Members, the Government will allow this provision to be only for one year. That will be very much more in accordance with precedent than the proposal of the Government.

(4.33.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I think that the attitude of the Government, having regard to the history of this question, is a particularly mean one. I exempt the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) personally from this censure, but I do not exempt several of his leading Colleagues, and especially not the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour). In 1885 the leading Ministers canvassed us personally for our votes in the Lobbies of this House on a question precisely similar to this. It was a proposal by the then Liberal Government to increase the Spirit Duties, and we were canvassed for our votes against that Government on the ground that this was an unjust proposal to Ireland. Now that the present Government have got into Office, as a consequence of our assistance, they propose to inflict precisely the same injustice. There is a well recognised custom that one Government is bound by the acts of its predecessors; but it seems to be true that no obligation of honour is incumbent upon an English Government in its dealings with Ireland and in its conversations with Irish Members. We are told that some day or other this money will be handed over to the Irish Local Boards, which are to be established, I suppose, when pigs begin to fly. I have been hearing of the imminence of the establishment of the Irish Local Government for the last 15 years, and it has not come any nearer. I do not believe—although it may seem like a bull—that it is as near to-day, as far as the action of the House goes, as it was 15 years ago. I do not believe an Imperial Government is ever destined to pass a Local Government Bill for Ireland. You came into Office in 1885 upon the leading cry of the establishment of Irish Local Government, and after more than three years of Office the subject is still relegated to the dim and distant future. What guarantee have we got that just as the pledged word of leading Cabinet Ministers, given to us in 1885, that the increase of the Spirit Duty in Ireland was an injustice, has been broken to-day, the word of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when the time comes for the redemption of his promise to the House, will not be broken by his successor? We have no guarantee, and it would be absurd for us to rely on the lasting character and binding force of any statements made by any English Minister with regard to Irish Members beyond the day after to-morrow.

*MR. GOSCHEN: To what promise does the hon. Member allude?

MR. PARNELL: I allude to the declaration which a Cabinet Minister—a gentleman who now sits beside the right hon. Gentleman—made to us in 1885, as a consideration for our votes, that the increase of the Spirit Duty was a gross injustice to Ireland. The same right hon. Gentleman is now going to support this injustice to Ireland. This money is going to be passed to what is called an account. There are many purposes in Ireland to which this money might be devoted, purposes of great utility, and for the benefit of the people, purposes which would not excite any controversy in the House. The amount paid per head by the Irish people vastly exceeds the amount paid per head by Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen; and we, the poor country, are not to be allowed to have the immediate benefit of the taxation. We are told it will be given to us some time or other, when Local Government Boards are established in Ireland. The imposition of extra taxation on whisky or spirits in Ireland is a fraud upon the tax-paying portion of the community. The plea that it is going to promote temperance is absurd. I am convinced that one of the great causes of drunkenness in Ireland, leading to crime and disaster in that country, is the excessive tax upon alcohol. The necessity arises, as a consequence of its high price, to dilute it with foreign spirit of a most pernicious and maddening character.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! I must point out to the hon. Member that the question now before the Committee is the limitation of the taxation to one year. The hon. Member's observations are directed against the clause as a whole.

MR. PARNELL: I understand perfectly that I have probably exceeded the limits of proper criticism upon this particular Amendment, and I will not continue that line of argument, though I am sure you will pardon me if I point out that, after all, the matter is a question of degree. I will only add that I think we have established a strong claim for the consideration of this Amendment, and that when the time comes to discuss Amendments following this one, more immediately applying to Ireland, I hope we shall have some more satisfactory declaration from Her Majesty's Government than we have had up to the present.

(4.45.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman has made certain observations that did not strike me as being particularly relevant, but directed personally against myself. He said a Cabinet Minister—

MR. PARNELL: I did not allude to the right hon. Gentleman as being that Cabinet Minister. I alluded to the right hon. Gentleman as being one of those who took part in the combination with us to throw out the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! It is very irregular to enter into this discussion.

(4.46.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has, I admit with considerable courtesy, answered one point I made as to the allocation of the money, but he has not dealt with another. As I understand your ruling, Sir, we were debarred from discussing the allocation of this money on the last Amendment on the ground that the matter is dealt with in a separate Bill. I understand that ruling as regards England and Scotland; but, as regards Ireland, I submit the ruling cannot apply, because Ireland is not within the licensing scope of the Bill. The Government say that if we allow the Bill to pass they will not allocate the money as regards so much as can be spent by the 11 great Corporations — Dublin, Belfast, Limerick, Galway, Wexford, Cork, Waterford, Derry, and others. Are you going to divide the money into two chests, a chest for the towns and a chest for the country? We must press on the Government the reasonableness of the suggestion which I made to them yesterday in all good faith. This Budget Bill is non-contentious, except so far as the Whisky Duty is concerned; and I suggest that you should take out of this Bill the foreign and exotic clauses, and put them in the Probate Duty Bill, which we can discuss. I trust the Government will relieve us from the extraordinary embarrassment in which we now find ourselves. We are told that, as regards particular Corporations in Ireland, the money is not to be allocated. How soon is the money to be unlocked with regard to the country? When are our people to get the benefit of the money? I urge the Government, who are so anxious about Constitutional ways, about following the ways of our forefathers and our grandmothers, to relieve us of the embarrassment by cutting the four clauses in question out of this Bill.

*(4.52.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Let me remind the Committee that machinery does not exist in Ireland for administering the money in the same way as in England. There are only three possible alternatives open to us. We may say that the money is not to accumulate, and that Ireland is not to have it at all. We may say that it shall accumulate until County Councils are established in Ireland. Or we may say that the money shall be spent by the existing authorities. Through the mouth of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Government have expressed their readiness, if hon. Members opposite press for it, to take advantage of the existing machinery in Ireland, so far as the Municipalities are concerned. Do hon. Gentlemen wish us to go further, and to hand over the money to the Grand Juries or to the Poor Law Authorities?

(4.54.) THE CHAIRMAN: I had better point out how the matter stands as a point of order. In this Bill there is a section for the imposition of a tax. There is a subsequent clause which divides the proceeds of the tax between England, Scotland, and Ireland in certain proportions. In another Bill provisions are made for the distribution and application of the money so divided. On this Bill it is competent to discuss the propriety of the imposition of the tax, and the equity of the division of the tax between England, Scotland, and Ireland. On the other Bill it is competent to discuss the particular purposes and objects to which the money so distributed is to be applied. And I would point out to hon. Members that if the clauses of this Bill were transferred to the other Bill, so as to make one Bill, it would be improper, on the clauses now under discussion, to anticipate what would be the result of the clauses subsequently to be discussed, namely, the clauses relating to special objects to which ultimately the money is to be applied.

(4.56.) MR. DILLON: After the Chairman's ruling, I ask the Government whether it would not be better to withdraw these clauses from the Budget Bill? Is it not competent for the House, when called upon to vote a tax, to debate the propriety of voting the tax at all? How is it possible to discuss the advisability of raising an additional tax if hon. Members are debarred from considering how the tax is to be spent? The uncertainty of the proper administration of the tax is one of the main considerations connected with it. The Government will prevent a great waste of time by withdrawing the clauses from the Budget Bill, as the ruling of the Chairman has clearly recommended.

tion we have taken up. Our condition is being reduced to one of practical absurdity. The Government wish to pass their Budget Bill, and if they withdraw from it these clauses they can get the Bill passed into law before the Whitsuntide Recess. But if they persist in bringing into one Bill what belongs to another there will be found means, notwithstanding, by which the House will be able to ascertain the object of this imposition.

*(4.59.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not notice that portion of the Chairman's ruling which stated that even if these clauses had been transferred to the other Bill it would have been impossible on these clauses to debate the purposes to which the money was to be devoted. Nothing is more plain, from the ruling which has been given, than that the same difficulty would have arisen even had the clauses been included in the other Bill. The prospect held out to us is conveyed in a threat that, unless we fall in with the suggestion which we have three or four times refused, we shall not get the Bill passed before Whitsuntide. We have expressed our opinion, but the right hon. Gentleman returns to the charge. We do not see our way to change our proposals, and when the right hon. Gentleman reminds me of what happened two years ago, I would point out this further distinction, that this additional £d. belongs to the tax upon spirits as a whole; it is essentially a Customs and Inland Revenue Tax, it naturally takes its place in this Bill, and falls within the Customs and Inland Revenue regulations for administrative purposes, it is altogether different from the Horse Tax.

(5.0.) MR. T. M. HEALY: What the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton said had reference to the effect of your ruling, Sir: If these clauses were transferred to a separate Bill, then long before we reached them the whole question would be discussed, the principle decided, and the clauses would be readily disposed of. This is really a matter of public convenience upon which the First Lord is not usually unreasonable. If he takes the course we suggest, it is obvious that when the clauses are reached in another Bill, the whole financial question will have been discussed, and to raise the discussion again would be flogging a dead horse. As it is now, we are naturally bubbling over with indignation which cannot find vent in discussion. We can only ramble round the subject, and such is the imperfect character of the human mind, we are tempted to hit a head wherever we see it. We object to have excluded from our consideration the object of this money, whereas if we could discuss and settle that the rest follows as mere matter of detail. Having conceded so much we may well ask the Government to go a little farther. A week ago they agreed to the reasonable suggestion to postpone the clauses until after the Second Reading of the other Bill; what difficulty is there now in postponing them until the Committee stage is passed? It will not relax the grasp of the Government on the principle of the Bill; no one will regard this concession as a victory for the Temperance Party. We are anxious to treat the matter regularly. I trust the Government will see their way to accept the suggestion put forward in no desire to hinder or embarrass them, but simply because of the intolerable position in which we find ourselves, which is both novel and inconvenient. There is a branch of the embarrassment of our position in the remarks of the Chief Secretary. He puts to us alternatives, that we shall give this money to the existing Borough Authorities, and let the amount for the County Authorities be suspended, or that it should be handed to existing authorities, Poor Law Guardians and Grand Juries. Well, of course, he was not serious in suggesting that we should accept the Grand Juries. Take the Grand Jury for the County of Dublin, and contrast it with the Corporation in the City of Dublin, which a Committee sitting upstairs commends for its moderation and efficiency. Would it be tolerable that simply crossing the bridge we should pass from the jurisdiction of the Corporation to that of the Conservative gentlemen who represent the County Grand Jury? Before we can address ourselves to the suggestion as to Boards of Guardians, we must have a little time for consideration. The Government are putting the cart before the horse; first, they are asking us to vote the money, and then they are going to say who it shall be voted to. It is a friendly and non-partisan suggestion that the Government should first decide upon the body to whom this fund should be entrusted, and then equip them with the financial means for discharging the duty imposed upon them. Unyoke this financial horse from its present unnatural position, and let your team proceed in proper Parliamentary fashion. We shall then get through this Committee this evening. Those who pay the piper should call the tune, but you call upon us to vote the money not having a voice in its disposal. Have the Government no plan in regard to Ireland? We do not know whether they look to Boards of Guardians or Grand Juries as the authorities.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite mistaken; the plan of the Government is perfectly definite, and if it is to be modified, it is in deference to the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But we have expressed no opinion, we have no opportunity to open our mouths. I have carefully guarded myself from expressing any opinion except as against Grand Juries. And yet, we have the right hon. Gentleman saying that, owing to an accident, he is unable to put before us the scheme of the Government Bill. Now, he says it is modified in deference to our opinion. You have had long experience, Sir, as Chairman; but I am sure you have never known such a "kettle of fish" as this. I appeal to the First Lord, who is always so anxious for the business of the House and the interest of the country, to get up and say he will accept this reasonable and business-like suggestion.

*(5.10.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I answer the appeal by reminding the hon. Gentleman and the Committee that last week an appeal was made to the Government to postpone these clauses until the Second Reading of the other Bill. We thought that the appeal was a reasonable one, and we conceded it. At the time, however, I expressed the view that by conceding it there was an implied understanding that no obstruction should be placed in the way of the Bill. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said that so far as he was concerned he would be no party to what might properly be called obstruction. Well, I do not know how that phrase might be interpreted; but, for myself, I hold it to be an engagement on the part of hon. Members opposite when they asked for the postponement of these clauses that they should afterwards be considered as part of the financial proposals of the Government, when a particular period had been reached. We have reached the appointed period; the decision of the House has been given upon the other Bill. These clauses cannot now be treated in the way proposed without serious inconvenience. Taxes are being levied, and legislative sanction must be obtained. The principle of the proposals of the Government having been affirmed, we must now ask the House to pass the clauses as they stand.

(5.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I must distinctly disclaim the existence of any such implied understanding as the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to. The right hon. Member for Newcastle clearly stated that no such understanding would be given. After the Government had agreed to postpone the clauses he intimated that they would be resisted by all means in their power, and I urged the Government to transfer them to another Bill. I remember perfectly the phrase I used. I said, if you do not "the wheels of your Budget Bill will drag heavily." Not only was no such understanding accepted, but it was distinctly repudiated, and I gave distinct warning against keeping these clauses in the Budget Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I spoke of what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend spoke before and not after the circumstances to which I have alluded, because it was in answer to what the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord said at the end of the evening, which was a distinct invitation to us to give a pledge. No such invitation was extended to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, who said no more than he would not offer unreasonable opposition to these clauses. Well, the question is whether this opposition is reasonable or not. In my opinion the opposition offered is perfectly reasonable. What is the course the Government are taking? In his Budget speech the right hon. Gentleman spoke of this tax as a separate and distinct local Budget. He severed the one from the other, and the natural consequence is that there should be a separate Bill dealing with local as distinguished from Imperial taxation. The right hon. Gentleman has himself set an example by the manner in which, two years ago, he dealt with a local taxation proposal. Therefore it is perfectly reasonable that we should ask the observance of this principle. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord says the principle was decided last night. What principle? Questions are raised that had no decision last night. The Irish Members have raised, or wish to raise, questions which could not have been raised on the Second Reading, and which have not been settled by that Division. We are asked to vote something like £1,500,000, without being allowed to open our mouths as to the manner in which the money is to be applied. The House of Commons would be unworthy of all its predecessors if it allowed itself to be forced into such a position. The House of Commons has never allowed itself to be so fettered. You may talk of obstruction if you like, but depend upon it people inside and outside will thoroughly understand the grounds we take. We take our stand on this—that the Government are engineering their Bill so as to prevent the objects of the tax from being discussed—engineering it cleverly, ingeniously, and cunningly, and gagging those who wish to discuss the Bill. While they are trying to smuggle this Bill through, they put the muzzle on every man who desires to discuss the tax. We shall resist the Government to the best of our ability. That is a plain and distinct issue. You may denounce us for obstruction if you like; you are perfectly welcome, but if we can help it, the Government shall not get £1,500,000 while they are manœuvring to prevent the tax being discussed. You may use the Closure if you like. Yes, use it to take the taxpayers' money. If that does not condemn you and the Closure, I do not know what will. I invite you to put the Closure on this tax; it will be the first time it has been used for such a purpose, and I am perfectly willing to take the judgment of the country on the proceeding. Our course is perfectly clear. We shall either discuss this tax or oppose it. If we hear from the Chair that we cannot discuss it, then we must use every means to prevent it passing into law.

*(5.25.) MR. GOSCHEN: Allusion has been made to what happened when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who is not now in his place, unfortunately appealed to us to postpone these clauses until after the decision of the House on the Second Reading of the Local Taxation Bill. The spirit of the arrangement made with the Member for Mid Lothian was, that if we postponed these clauses till after the other Bill had been read a second time, then the clauses would be proceeded with. ["No, no."] I am not talking of Gentlemen below the Gangway, but of the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who I should suppose would be bound by the spirit of that engagement. If it had been on the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian that, after the passing of the Second Reading of the other Bill, he would oppose the discussion of these clauses, he would have told us so in advance. In the first place, having postponed the clauses until the decision or principle has been given by the House, now you ask us to transfer these clauses to another Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said so at the time.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Not then, but after the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had left the House. I remember perfectly well the remarks made by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Newcastle when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was no longer in his place. I admit that an uncomfortable feeling was awakened by the language used, but I think the right hon. Gentleman would have been more candid if he had intended, after we had made our concession, to prevent discussion upon these clauses.

SIR W. HARCOURT: All we ask is to discuss them.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot see how that is, when we are asked to withdraw them. We are trying in this matter to carry out our engagements, into which we were led by the Member for Mid Lothian, who induced us to withdraw the clauses at the time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby says the House is for the first time asked to vote taxes without knowing to what purpose they are to be applied. But two years ago, in a Bill which handed over a portion of the Probate Duties, we had a precedent for what is now being done.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But you propose a new tax.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That does not touch the principle. The principle is the application of money raised by the Budget Bill to purposes which are not mentioned in the Budget Bill. That is the principle on which we are proceeding, and the precedent I have mentioned shows that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt) is wrong in saying that there is any Constitutional innovation in our present proceeding. I hope, looking at what has occurred, the Committee will not take the extreme course to which the right hon. Gentleman invites hon. Members. I think we have carried out our part of the bargain. It is said a gag has been applied, but, at all events, it has not been very effective, for one way and another there has been a considerable amount of discussion. The object in view in the postponement of the clauses was that we might settle in the first instance whether the proposal is a reasonable one. The principle has been accepted, and now I hope it may proceed in the manner we were encouraged to do after the Second Reading of the Bill.

(5.30.) MR. PARNELL: Whatever force there might have been in the contention of the right hon. Gentleman that hopes were held out from the Front Opposition Bench that these clauses would be proceeded with after the Second Reading of the other Bill, that force has been entirely destroyed by the declaration which the right hon. Gentleman and the Chief Secretary have made to-day with regard to the application of a part of this money to Irish purposes. What was our position with regard to these Resolutions? Up to the date of these declarations we have been forbidden to discuss these Resolutions with regard to their application to Ireland at all, either on the present Bill or on the previous Bill, the Second Reading of which was passed last night. As a matter of fact, no Irish Member spoke in the discussion of last night; we should have been most properly and justly ruled out of order if we had introduced Irish grievances in the discussion of last night, because the Bill did not relate to Ireland so far as this particular branch of the subject is concerned, namely, the granting of this money to the Local Authority to be hereafter established for the purpose of buying out certain publicans. To-day the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleague the Chief Secretary have said they will endeavour to devise some plan by which the money reserved hereafter for Ireland may be immediately spent. Now, again, we are in the same predicament; we cannot discuss the question of the application of this money for Irish purposes on these clauses; neither can we discuss it upon the other Bill, as there will be nothing in it when it comes on. Surely common sense should suggest to the Government the proper course to pursue in view of their own declarations.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but he is entirely mistaken. From the beginning the Government have said that the plan embodied in the Bill, which does refer to Ireland, was that the money should accumulate until it could be handed over to Local Authorities.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When and where was that said?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An appeal was made to the Government to modify that plan in favour of existing Municipal Authorities, and, in order to meet what the Chancellor of the Exchequer believed was the wish of hon. Gentlemen opposite, the right hon. Gentleman said he would consider that appeal in a favourable spirit.

MR. PARNELL: Surely the right hon. Gentleman must see that, having made that proposal, not out of regard for our desires, but out of regard for the wishes and feelings of the Orange publicans of Belfast—

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Entirely in deference to hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. PARNELL: The right hon. Gentleman must surely see it is abso-

Intely necessary that, before we go on with the discussion on the allocation of this money under the present clauses, we should know what is to be done with the money, and we should see the clauses of the Government.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We do not need any new clauses. You show us your proposals.

MR. PARNELL: That is a fresh proposition altogether. If I were in the enjoyment of a salary of £4,500 a year as an Irish Minister there might be some reason for such an appeal as has been addressed to me; but it is rather too much for the right hon. Gentleman to put upon me, as a private Member of the House, the onus of preparing a plan for the Government, in order to extricate the Government from the difficulty they have brought upon themselves. We are in this position: The right hon. Gentleman tells us he desires to meet the feeling of the Committee that Ireland should be placed in the same position as England so far as he reasonably can; and then the right hon. Gentleman asks me to prepare a plan. It is the duty of the Government to submit a plan, to reduce it to clauses, and to place it upon the Notice Paper along with the other Amendments. When the House of Commons is in possession of this information we may reasonably be called upon to proceed with the discussion of the clauses now under consideration. Until this has been done I submit that common sense, expediency, economy of public time, and Constitutional practice demand the withdrawal of the clauses.

(5.37.) SIR W. HARCOURT: As a matter of personal explanation, I desire to meet the charge of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in the absence of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, I have gone contrary to the speech of that right hon. Gentleman in the former Debate, and have broken the pledge that he gave. I should like to read what happened from the Official Report. I said in Committee on Thursday, the 8th instant, that I was glad to hear so conciliatory a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who—

“Would best facilitate the passing of the Bill if he withdrew from it the Compensation Clauses and put them in the other Bill, to which they properly belonged. The reason for putting all the taxes into one Bill only applied to taxation for Imperial needs.”

I added—

“In this instance you are raising a tax for local purposes, and surely the more logical and sensible course is to raise your tax in the Bill which appropriates it. If you do that you will get your Budget Bill through without delay, because it will not be tied up with the compensation controversy.”

I was followed by the First Lord of the Treasury, who said he would be very glad to meet the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, but the Government must adhere to the plan they had adopted. He added, however, that they were prepared to postpone the consideration of the clauses until after the Second Reading of the Bill which appropriated the money, and he hoped that proposal would recommend itself, because after the question had been fully discussed on the Second Reading hon. Members could not wish to raise the same discussion immediately afterwards. Here is the answer of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian—

“I am totally at a loss to understand why these clauses should be included in the Tax Bill. I cannot understand why they should not be included in a separate Bill. Still, I thankfully accept the postponement of the clauses. I certainly shall be no party to any merely obstructive dealing in any stage of business. The separation of the clauses would, I think, be the best solution.”

Then, at the end of the evening, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh quoted what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in 1888, when he proposed “to introduce the Horse Tax and Wheel Tax in a separate Bill, as they did not affect the Imperial Budget at all,” and suggested the adoption of a similar course now. Thereupon the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that to follow the course suggested would necessitate the moving of a fresh Resolution, a First and Second Reading, and a Committee, and wishing to do business as shortly as possible, the Government thought they were pursuing the best course. Thereupon I said—

“If the Government take the course which my right hon. Friend suggests they may pass their Budget Bill to-morrow. On the other hand, if these matters of compensation, which are hotly contested, are introduced, the Government cannot complain if the wheels drag heavily. It is impossible, if they keep the postponed clauses in the Bill, to avoid delay, because the proposals are regarded with great anxiety in the country, and must necessarily lead to prolonged discussion.”

I venture to say that this is entirely in accordance with what the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said earlier in the evening. That, at any rate, is my opinion. I cannot see any inconsistency between the course I have taken and that laid down by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. Is it fair to state, is there any foundation for stating, that the Government had no distinct notice that if these clauses remained in the Bill they would be discussed at full length, and that it would lead to delay, because these proposals are regarded with anxiety in the country. I should be extremely sorry to believe that I lay justly under the imputation of having misled either the Government or the country. I again urge the Government to remove these clauses in another Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must once more point out to the Committee that the Amendment before it is the limitation of the tax to one year.

*(5.44.) Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I only wish to say I object to the manner in which the hon. Member for Cork has spoken of the "Orange publicans." Two-thirds of the publicans of Belfast are Roman Catholics. Rev. P. Convery swore, before the Sunday Closing Committee, that the trade of a publican was the only one in Belfast open to Roman Catholics.

Mr. PARNELL: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I did use the words improperly; but I corrected myself, perhaps not audibly enough, by substituting the Orange Corporation of Belfast.

(5.45.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: Would it be in order, if the Amendment were withdrawn, to move again the postponement of the clauses?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how they could be postponed again. They are the only clauses now remaining.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: There is another clause to be proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt in that case the clauses might be postponed until after the consideration of the new clause.

Sir W. Harcourt

(5.46.) Mr. STOREY (Sunderland): I should like to take the ruling of the Chair on a point of order. On Thursday last the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, referring to what I had said, remarked—

"The contention of my hon. Friend is that the House ought to be allowed to sift, and discuss, and consider the purposes of a tax before they voted."

What I want to know, on the point of order, is, whether we are now to understand, after the Second Reading of the other Bill, that we are in exactly the same position as on Thursday. Are we bound to vote this tax without being able, in the words of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, to sift, and discuss, and consider the purposes of the tax?

THE CHAIRMAN: In the meanwhile there has been a discussion on the Motion for Second Reading. I am not responsible for the limited form which that discussion took, but in that discussion these subjects could have been discussed. I am bound to point out what seems to be imperfectly appreciated, that if these clauses were transferred to the other Bill the discussion would be of the same character. There would be a discussion on one clause on the imposition of the tax, another on the clause for the distribution of the tax between England, Scotland, and Ireland, and a third on the manner in which the tax is to be allocated to the Local Authorities.

(5.47.) Mr. W. HARCOURT: Would it not be in order to move the further postponement of these clauses until Committee on the other Bill. If the House were satisfied, in that Committee, with the arrangement for dealing with these taxes, they might be willing then to vote this tax. This would be the wiser course to take.

(5.48.) THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how the clauses could be postponed; but, of course, it would be competent to move to report Progress, and for the House afterwards to decline to resume consideration of the clauses until a future time.

*(5.49.) Mr. H. H. FOWLER: If these clauses were transferred to the other Bill, would they not be in the nature of new clauses, and consequently have to be postponed until after the other clauses?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so.

(5.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again, and I do so on these grounds: that for the first time we have to-day been informed by the Government as to what their intentions are in regard to Ireland. Yesterday we were unable to discuss the case as it affected Ireland. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that if any Irishman had attempted to discuss the question of the extinction of licences by means of money to be raised under this Bill he would have been ruled out of order.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; the only question which would not have been relevant was that of the non-granting of new licences.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I entirely dispute that proposition. Hon. Members opposite may interrupt me by—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! order! The hon. Member will address himself to the Chair. He will be protected from improper interruption.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We now hear for the first time that the money is to be handed over to the Corporations. What Corporations? Those of Derry and Belfast, on which there is such a high franchise as to exclude all Catholics, and yet the trade is mainly in the hands of Catholics. If it is good to extinguish licences in Ireland we must know who is going to do it. The right hon. Gentleman said a moment or two ago that an appeal was made to him for this concession from these Benches. I reply that no appeal was made by us to the right hon. Gentleman. We asked a question. I know that a bargain has been struck with Sam Black, the Orange Town Clerk of Belfast—

*MR. W. JOHNSTON: He is not an Orangeman at all.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the hon. Gentleman thinks that the word Orangeman conveys an offensive imputation I will withdraw it. We know that the bargain has been struck with Mr. Sam Black, and that he came over here from Belfast at the behest of the Corporation, and was introduced by the Member for Mid Armagh to the Government; and I challenge the Government to answer this, whether they, behind the backs of 86 Irish Members—they, the heroes of the Spirit Resolution of 1885, who ejected the Liberal Government because of the Whisky Tax—whether they have not made a compact to deal with this extra 6d. behind the backs of the Irish Members with Sam Black and the Member for Mid Armagh? The right hon. Gentleman says that an appeal was made to him. What fools we should be to appeal to him! What appeal of ours was ever heeded by the right hon. Gentleman? We should as soon think of appealing to the stones in Westminster Hall. The right hon. Gentleman says there has been an appeal made to him, and that he will give the Corporations these powers. I should like to know what Corporations these are, under what franchise they are elected, and by what means this franchise is to be exercised? The 86 Irish Representatives are asked to vote for a tax on the principal commodity produced in Belfast and Dublin without knowing in the least degree by what legerdemain the money is to be spent. We do not know whether Sam Black is to have it, or who is going to have it; and, under these circumstances, the only thing I am able to discuss is the Motion to report Progress. I certainly think no Motion to report Progress was ever made with more justification. Ireland has been treated with chicane in this business. The Irish Representatives have been deceived, and kept absolutely in a state of ignorance as to what is the intention of the Government, and now the Irish Secretary said, "Oh, if you want a Bill you must draw it up yourselves." I do not get £4,500 a year and coals. The other day I drafted a Bill to supplement the laches of the Government—a Bill to suspend the issue of new licences in Ireland, and last night the Chief Secretary told me I had done a needless thing; that I had done a work of supererogation. Yet now he complains that my hon. Friend the Member for Cork has not done a similar thing! I feel unable to address myself to this question, and I respectfully move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

(5.56.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the hon. and learned Gentleman has made the conduct of the Irish Government the excuse for his very extraordinary Motion, and as on this rather slender foundation he has raised a vast superstructure of accusation, it would perhaps be as well for me to make the position of the Government clear. The hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong in every particular statement of fact which he has made to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Even in the statement that I introduced a Bill?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There was that one exception, truly. The hon. and learned Gentleman stated; in the first place, that Ireland was not included in the Bill read a second time yesterday. For every purpose connected with the Bill under discussion Ireland was included. The sub-section reads—

"That the sum of £40,000 shall be assigned to Ireland for the extinction of licences as may be hereafter provided by any Act relating to Local Government in Ireland."

MR. PARNELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman read the corresponding English section?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is sufficient to say that my assertion directly traverses the assertion of the hon. Member. The second contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman was even more extraordinary. He imagined that in consequence of some mysterious compact with the hon. Member for Mid Armagh and a certain Mr. Samuel Black who, I understand from his speech, is the Town Clerk of Belfast, the Government base the concession which has been made to the appeals from the Irish Bench. Twice the hon. and learned Member for Longford has asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government will not give the management of the money to Municipal Authorities where they already exist. The Government, though they prefer their Bill as it is, have declared that, for the sake of peace and quietness, they will not object to such a proposal if it were pressed. Now, it seems that this proposal, which was accepted for the sake of peace, is to be turned into an instrument of obstruction by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The statement that this concession has anything to do with a compact, direct or indirect, implied or expressed, with the hon. Member for Armagh or the Town Clerk of Belfast is entirely and totally without a shadow of foundation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it too.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*MR. GOSCHEN: I never heard before of the existence of such a person as Mr. Samuel Black.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did Sir James Corry see him?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Under the Black flag.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There has been no compact whatever. The position of the Government is perfectly clear. The Government are now asked to draft new clauses, but we think the Bill best as it stands. If hon. Members choose to put down clauses embodying their views, the Government will, as they always do, give them their best consideration. I have shown that there is no foundation for the accusations of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I trust, therefore, that the Motion will be withdrawn.

(6.0.) MR. G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I feel it my duty to support the Motion that Progress be reported, because that is the only method known to the House and is certainly the most convenient method by which the clauses might be transferred from the present Bill. The matter is one of very great importance, and though I frankly own I do not understand all the ins and outs of the Irish matter, I think I do thoroughly understand the Scotch part of the question. There has not been a single argument advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or by any one who has yet spoken, to show that it is convenient or necessary to enforce the clauses of this Bill, instead of putting them into a Bill containing the services for which these subsidies are asked. The right hon. Gentleman gave no single reason; all he alleged was precedent, and I deny that the precedent he cited is applicable here. I candidly admit that I have forgotten the argument he used, because I could not understand it. The precedent, however, was important. It was the case of the English and Scotch Local Government Bill, and the allocation for local purposes made thereby; but that precedent does not hold in the least, because on that occasion the allotments made for local purposes were to carry out certain well-known and old established and universally agreed on services, such as the administration of the police, as well as of medical and pauper matters; whereas in this case we are going to have certain perfectly new forms of expenditure to which many of us are strongly opposed. In order not to take up the time of the House, I will confine myself to the Scotch question, and on that I will say that to at least three-fourths of the proposals we, the Scotch Members, are greatly opposed. The small amount given for licences, for education fees, and for police superannuation we were able to some extent to discuss the other night, but the other matters we were unable to discuss at all. The Scotch Members endeavoured to get a word of assurance from the leader of the House before the Bill passed its Second Reading, but that word they were not able to obtain. Therefore, we Scotch Members are in this position, that we are asked to pass a new tax for the purpose of its being applied to objects which are likewise new, and to many of which we strongly object. We say we ought to have these objects settled before the tax is voted. For my part, I object on Constitutional grounds to our voting a new tax for purposes which are dubious and not universally agreed upon beforehand; but it is much worse when that tax is to be voted in one Bill, and the purposes for which it is to be imposed are to be described and arranged in another. It is for the purpose of enabling the Government to meet what is evidently the unanimous wish on this side of the House, and what I feel to be a perfectly honest and sincere wish not to treat it as a Party Question, that we support the Motion for Progress.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(6.8.) MR. PARNELL: The right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary was entirely inaccurate in the representations he made as to our views in regard to this question. We did not state, and certainly I did not state, as he has represented, that Ireland was not included in the Bill. What I said was that it was impossible to discuss last night or on any other night, on the Second Reading stage of the Bill, the application of the money to Ireland for the extinction of licences, and the reading of the two sections of the Bill shows this clearly. The section affecting England provides that the sum of £350,000 is to be applied to such extinctions; but with regard to Ireland we could not discuss the manner in which the licences are to be extinguished, because no method is proposed in the Bill with regard to Ireland. Neither did I assert that there had been any compact between the Government and the Mayor of Belfast. My assertion was distinct and clear. After the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had taken credit for having yielded to the views of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) in the proposals he had made as to Irish Corporations, I stated that the right hon. Gentleman had held an interview with the Mayor of Belfast.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is quite untrue; I consulted no one.

MR. PARNELL: I am glad to hear it; but all I can say is, that the organ of the right hon. Gentleman, the Belfast News Letter, must be a liar, because it definitely stated that Mr. Black had an interview with the right hon. Gentleman, and that he came over from Belfast to London for that purpose. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman does not shake his head at that statement.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never read the Letter in my life.

MR. PARNELL: This is not a question of the right hon. Gentleman having read the Belfast News Letter.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out that this discussion is not regular.

MR. PARNELL: Then, Sir, I shall leave that part of the question, and I will say that our position is this—that this proposal having been made by the Government to deal with the mode of applying money for the extinction of licences we ought to have before us en bloc the method under which the Government propose to carry out that extinction. It is not reasonable to try and put us off with the vague statements of the right hon. Gentleman. He says he will consider how the Poor Law Boards may expend this money; but such a proposal requires clauses in an Act of Parliament.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have told the House most distinctly that we mean to submit the Bill in its present shape, and that if hon. Members from Ireland bring forward Amendments we will consider them.

MR. PARNELL: But the Bill has already been brought in and read a first and second time; and now, when we approach the Committee stage, it is not reasonable for the right hon. Gentleman to put us off and say that if we choose to put down Amendments he will consider them. It is not reasonable that he should ask us to depart from the Constitutional practice, that the application of money voted by the House should first be settled by Act of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman proposes not only to ask the House to vote the money, but also to pass the Budget Bill in its third and last stage, taking everything else on trust. We are to leave it to the right hon. Gentleman to consider what Amendments we may draw up, without the slightest shadow of a notion as to whether they will be accepted. That, I say, is not the proper way of dealing with this question, and can hardly be the way in which the right hon. Gentleman can hope to facilitate the passing of the Bill. I submit that we, the Irish Members, have a serious grievance as to the conduct of the Government in this matter. The only reasonable course to take is the Constitutional practice which has been suggested by the Chairman of Committees, namely, that these clauses should be postponed to enable the Government to bring them forward in the form desired by hon. Members on this side of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman impugned my accuracy a short time ago. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Sir J. Corry) is in his place, but I will challenge him to deny that he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer arranged this matter within the last few days; or, if the contrary is stated, the hon. Member should explain how the extraordinary circumstances happened that in the Government organ in the North of Ireland, the Belfast News Letter, these statements were made, and the matter explained. Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an interview with Sir James Corry?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. M. HEALY: I see the Attorney General for Ireland in his place; did the interview take place with him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): No.

THE CHAIRMAN: This has very little relevance to the Motion before the House.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I think the Committee has a right to ask that a Bill affecting Ireland should be treated with the same common-sense as is applied to English and Scotch measures.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question is, that I report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I am sorry to intervene; but after what has been stated by the Government this evening, it is imperative that we should be enabled to consider the important proposal that has been made. It has been suggested by the Government that the administration of the money shall be placed in the hands of the Municipal Bodies. A few days ago I met a man from Belfast who is connected with the liquor trade, and he suggested that the Local Bodies now in existence might be interested in the application of the fund. I had the Bill in my hand, and I told him that we had already been considering that matter, and, for my own part, I rejected that proposition, because I thought it would be wrong to place such powers in the hands of the restricted Corporations of Belfast or of Dublin, which are largely composed of friends of the publicans. Well, Sir, I met that man a day or two afterwards, and he told me he had been speaking to a gentleman—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I cannot see how that is relevant to the question before the Committee.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: What I have to say in justification of my speaking on this occasion is, that I think we ought to have time to consider these proposals, and that is the reason why we urge that you, Sir, should report Progress.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY: The reason for reporting Progress is that the whole tone and tenour of the Bill has been altered by what the Chief Secretary has stated. The Bill says that until such Act as is referred to has been passed the money shall be invested and accumulated, and, by the admission of the right hon. Gentleman, the whole object of the measure is to be reversed. The question is not how the money should be spent, but whether it should be spent at all; and the Chief Secretary has offered that it shall be spent by the Boards of Guardians, the Corporations, and the Grand Juries.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said nothing of the kind.

(6.30.) MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 265; Noes 186.—(Div. List, No. 87.)

Question put accordingly.

(6.40.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 189; Noes 263.—(Div. List, No. 88.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Whereupon, MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed "That the Original Question be now put."

Original Question put accordingly, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 183; Noes 263.—(Div. List, No. 89.)

It being after Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House at Nine of the clock.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EVENING SITTING.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE LATE SIR WILLIAM PALLISER.

(9.0.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the services rendered by the late Sir W. Palliser to the country and to the economies and increased efficiency which have resulted to the nation from the use of his inventions. There is some difficulty in introducing questions of this kind, but after all, the House of Commons is a most satisfactory tribunal to deal with them. If one brings a case like this before a Court of Law he will be asked for documentary proof, and if you bring it before the Government officials they will only be too glad not to give justice. If you bring it before Ministers it is better, but they are afraid of exceeding their powers. But the House of Commons is a fair tribunal. I admit that the representatives of Sir W. Palliser have no legal claim, but I think they have a strong moral claim upon the consideration of the country. Although by his inventions Sir W. Palliser has already saved the country something like £6,500,000, his family are now destitute. The history of Sir W. Palliser's inventions commenced with the first introduction of the armour plating of ships. The first incident in that naval revolution was when a French gunboat received the fire of the batteries at Sebastopol unscathed. Peace was signed almost immediately afterwards, but the French had learnt a lesson which resulted in the building of La Gloire. The exploits of the Merrimac and the Monitor, iron-clads, in the American Civil War, also attracted attention to this subject. About this time the Warrior was built, and the Times published an article in which the Warrior was referred to as the one efficient vessel in our Fleet. Her armour could only be penetrated by steel shot, which would do little execution when they got inside. Sir W. Palliser invented a method of cooling cast-iron shot, which enabled him to send those projectiles through a target made in imitation of the side of the Warrior. This was quite a revolution, and his particular claim upon the country in respect of that invention is the saving in money which it effected. Steel shot cost about £100 a ton, while cast-iron shot cost only about £14 10s. The shot and shell of Sir W. Palliser were a great benefit to the country, as the first Naval Power of the world—England—could not afford to have an impenetrable hostile iron-clad going about; and this invention saved her from that calamity. I consider that in respect of that invention alone Sir W. Palliser has already saved the country £5,500,000. But his claims are not based on that alone. At that time the country was changing from cast-iron guns to wrought-iron guns on the Armstrong principle. There was an immense stock of guns in the country which seemed to be absolutely useless. Sir W. Palliser invented a plan of converting these guns by putting a wrought-iron tube into them. This tube was rifled, and a 32-pounder smooth bore gun was then converted into a rifled 64-pounder, which was altogether a much more formidable weapon. That was done to 1,982 guns. These weapons are well-known to the Volunteers, and I believed that more firing goes on from Palliser guns in this country at the present time than from any other. The Palliser gun up to the present day has always proved to be a good and efficient gun, and is now very largely used, and a great economy has thus resulted to the nation. Another of Sir W. Palliser's inventions was a screw shank. The First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton), in answer to a question I put to him in this House, stated that the invention was not valuable without some improvement. I hold a letter in my hand signed by Mr. Charles Abel, of the eminent firm of engineers, and stating that he considers the bolts now used in the Navy are strictly in accordance with Sir W. Palliser's patent, that some change has been made in them, but that they are essentially his invention. Another point is with regard to the Palliser bolt. We all know that the armour question is one of the very greatest importance at the present moment. Nearly every fighting ship must have armour of some kind; it may be differently applied in different ships; in some cases the armour covers the vitals of the ship, while in other cases there is a belt, but it is used in practically every fighting ship. But what is the use of armour if it falls off? The Americans formerly did not attempt to pierce armour-plates, but their idea was to deliver a heavy blow at a low velocity, and so rack the armour-plates that they would be disturbed and possibly break up. Now, what prevents armour-plates from falling off is the use of a great number of bolts. Sir W. Palliser made a remarkably simple invention with regard to these bolts. Every bolt is screwed more or less into the armour, and Sir W. Palliser's invention was in connection with the screw, thereby increasing the strength of the bolt, which formerly had been weakened by the screw being cut into it. The bolts which are now used to hold on the armour-plates of ships are practically the bolts invented by Sir W. Palliser, though some changes may have been made in the arrangement of armour. I believe that instead of being driven the whole way through the bolts are only driven half-way, but that does not mean that they are not the same bolts. The Government have in no way whatever paid for the bolt. They contend that they have paid something for the shot and shell, and my contention is that the sum is inadequate. They acknowledge that they have taken possession of the bolt, and it is hardly contended that they have paid anything for the gun. Sir W. Palliser was not a very business-like man, and, being extraordinarily patriotic, he did not attempt to launch his inventions in foreign countries. With regard to the financial part of the question, I have some memoranda which were prepared by Sir W. Palliser himself. He states the price of steel shot at £100 a ton. Three years ago the Secretary of State for War said the price of forged steel shot was £150 a ton. One of the managers of the manufactory where the shells are made, in his evidence before the Committee, gave the price of cast steel shells at from £58 to £75 a ton. On the whole, I do not think I shall be guilty of any exaggeration at putting the price of forged shells at £100 a ton. The price of Sir W. Palliser's is about £15 a ton. The figures given before Lord Morley's Committee were £16 a ton for small shell and about £11 for large shell. Making as careful an estimate as I can of the amount of Palliser shot manufactured, the invention must have saved the country an expenditure of £5,600,000, and I do not think that it is possible to vary that calculation by more than a few hundreds. I do not contend that the Palliser shot and shell are equal to forged steel, but there is no proof that the cast steel shell is better than the Palliser shell. I know we are making Palliser shells quite equal to the partially forged steel shells. All steel shells are, of course, partially-forged; there is that distinction between cast-iron and cast steel. But, allowing that the Palliser shells are not quite so good as forged steel shells, there are second-class places in first-class fortifications, and there are second-class fortifications for which the Palliser shells are quite good enough. In breech-loading guns the saving effected by Sir W. Palliser's invention has not been so large, according to War Office Returns. Sir W. Palliser only converted the smaller guns; but it is no exaggeration to say that his work saved an expenditure of £500,000. As to the bolts, there is no question that Sir W. Palliser received nothing for this invention, and there is no question but they have been largely used. This much we gather from actual knowledge, and from questions asked and answered in the House. Ministers have, to a certain extent, accepted these claims; but they always say that the House of Commons would not pass a Vote of this kind; but it is my belief that the House of Commons will be quite ready to do justice in a matter of this kind if only the Government will vouch for the reasonableness of the claim. On good authority I understand that Sir W. Palliser spent several thousands on his own experiments. It has been represented to me that his losses on this account may be put in the two items of £8,259 and £369. Of the latter amount I know nothing; but some 20 years ago I happened to meet Sir W. Palliser coming from Woolwich, and in conversation, in answer to my question, he said he had spent £8,259. But, of course, the figures are capable of proof, and there has been correspondence on the subject. I asked the head of the gun factory at Woolwich as to the truth of the statement, and he admitted it, the only excuse he could make being that Sir W. Palliser had pushed his experiments too far. Well, of course an inventor must make blunders; it is in the nature of things; there would be an end of invention if all an inventor's plans could be mathematically demonstrated. He received some £10,000 or £12,000, and I do not hesitate to say that not only was the amount inadequate to compensate him for his labours or reward him for his inventions, but he suffered a pecuniary loss. Sir W. Palliser gave up his whole life to these experiments; to these he sacrificed his prospects in a military career. He made a little money through Sir W. Armstrong, who adopted some of his inventions and made use of them in trade with China and South American States. Had Sir W. Palliser gone abroad and pushed his inventions, he might have made his fortune, but he did not do so. Perhaps, in not so doing, he showed he was not a business man; but it was repugnant to his feelings, and though he was wrong, from his own financial point of view, his patriotism has been a great gain to this country, for the Palliser shot and shell have been confined to England. I think the fact that he did not push his inventions abroad ought to strongly support the claim now made on behalf of his family. I am not going to hold up Sir W. Palliser as an all-round paragon; I allow he was not a business man; but he had a great inventive genius, and certainly in his case it was connected with plenty of painstaking. The little money he made he invested in house property, but his speculation turned out a failure shortly before his death, and he whose inventions have been the cause of saving £5,500,000 to his country left absolutely nothing for his family. I want to be very clear and distinct. I have a letter here; it is not a letter I would like to read to the House, but I will place it at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It is written by the brother on behalf of the rest of the family, in reference to the resources of the family. I know so late as last night, a gentleman of considerable position in this House, accepted the statement that the son of Sir W. Palliser inherited a considerable sum; but I say it can be shown that he has inherited nothing but his father's name and a share in the legacy which his father has left the country. The combination of business faculties with inventive genius, such as we can associate with the names of Armstrong, Whitworth, and Krupp, is rare. Sir W. Palliser was a great inventor only. I move my Resolution, and support it on these grounds. I say here is the case of a man who devoted himself to developing the defensive resources of the country, and undoubtedly added immensely to the strength of our Fleet and our coast defences. His inventions have stood the test of 25 years.

You allotted him a sum of £12,000, and it was inadequate for the services rendered. We still profit by his services, and his family are nearly destitute. I know that a compassionate allowance is made, and I have not said a word against Ministers, who I know are bound by precedent. But the House of Commons is not fettered, it is capable of generous instincts. Unofficially I understand that it is proposed to continue the allowance of £300 a year to the family after the death of Lady Palliser, but that is nothing like sufficient, and my Resolution proposes that the country should make provision for the daughters. There is a son, who I hope inherits part of his father's genius, and who will fight his own way. There is something near a precedent, though I say we are entitled to set a precedent, and I do not think we shall regret setting up an inducement if it results in men bringing about savings of £5,500,000 in national expenditure. But, for a precedent, I may remind the House that 10 years ago Sir James Anstruther succeeded in inducing the House of Commons to acknowledge the inadequacy of the compensation to Lord Cochrane, and to assent to the payment of a salary due 50 years ago. I now leave the case in the hands of the House to say if they are content that the country should continue to benefit by the father's services and leave the family destitute.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "This House recommends that some provision should be made for the daughters of Sir William Palliser,"—(Colonel Nolan),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed be left out stand part of the Question."

(9.50.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): In rising to second the Motion I may say that I had a long personal acquaintance with Sir William Palliser from the time he joined the Service in 1855. I was with him when he carried out his first experiment with a gun. A general officer and staff were on the ground to witness the experiment, but at the last moment the gun capsized, and, fortunately or unfortunately, the general officer was not able to stay until the gun was righted. When the gun was actually fired it burst. Sir W. Palliser came to his knowledge of the subjects he had to do with by hard work and the exercise of great intelligence. I know that he devoted his whole life to his work, and was perfectly absorbed in his inventions. The invention of "chilled" shot effected an enormous economy in the national expenditure. It is often said in such cases as these that if one man had not made the invention another man would; but to this I reply by anticipation nothing is more simple than the invention of yesterday, nothing more difficult than the invention of tomorrow. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway has explained the financial value of Sir W. Palliser's inventions in guns and projectiles. The invention in respect to guns had a special value in point of time—it came when we did not know what to do and were waiting for something better. I know the great attention Sir W. Palliser gave to the subject. I happened to meet him once as he was returning from the Staff College, where he had been consulting the mathematical professor in reference to the internal lining for guns which, substituted for the external coating—which was the system at the time—has been of great advantage to the nation. Sir W. Palliser's inventions have stood the test of long experience, but they were not rewarded. In a letter dated January 27, 1869, Sir W. Palliser said—

Colonel Nolan

"Nothing but absolute necessity would induce me to accept so small a reward, founded, as I believe it to be, on a misapprehension of the facts."

So far as I have been able to gather, Sir W. Palliser never received anything for his invention of armour bolts. Financial speculations in which he engaged, with the object, I believe, of reviving an ancient baronetcy in his family, turned out unsuccessful. He was deriving considerable sums from royalties on raw material supplied to Foreign Governments by Sir William Armstrong, but the Government opposed the renewal of his patents, and this affected him very seriously, though I may say it in no way affected the State, and did not come within those considerations which induce the objections to prolongations of patents generally. It, however, had a serious effect upon Sir W. Palliser's income. The net amount he received from the Government was £10,378; against that total of £10,378 an amount of £13,622 was expended for experiments, and this is established by the vouchers in existence and admitted by the Government in 1869. The inventions of Sir W. Palliser have stood the test of time, they have effected great economies, or they have prevented increased expenditure: they are still being used, and no other military inventions have effected anything approaching the economies these inventions have secured. The whole country gains large sums annually through these inventions; but the family of the inventor is absolutely unprovided for, except as regards the compassionate allowance from Her Majesty, made on the recommendation of the First Lord. But the life of Lady Palliser is, I am sorry to say, precarious, and with her loss the family will be left absolutely unprovided for. Contrast the amount of reward received by Sir W. Palliser for the inventions of a lifetime with the large sum paid for the invention of a "range finder," which depends on the clearness of the atmosphere. It will be a disgrace if we allow the country to profit largely through the genius of this officer and do not do something to provide for his daughters.

(10.1.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I rise to support this Motion, not because it is an ordinary case in which an inventor has rendered service to his country, but because it is a very exceptional and remarkable case. I do not think that the value of Sir William Palliser's inventions can be properly or fully estimated by reference to the public savings that he has effected; and if we went simply on that principle the House might some day be asked to vote a good deal of money for my family for inventions for which I have received no consideration. But what should be borne in mind is that every one of these inventions was not the mere accidental expedient of the moment, but the result of a highly-cultivated and mathematically-trained mind and a sound scientific judgment being brought to bear upon the requirements of the nation, and the application of these exceptional gifts supplied a great public want at a critical time, when the want was most felt. That is true of every one of Sir William Palliser's inventions. I remember very well with what anxiety every one associated with the Army and Navy viewed the change in the nature of ordnance and saw cast-iron ordnance brought into disrepute. It is a common thing to value highly only that which is new; but I think that that is a great talent which devises means for turning stores of existing material, which threaten to become obsolete, into instruments fit for the necessities of the time; and this Sir William Palliser did in utilising the condemned cast-iron ordnance of the country. This invention could not have been produced by any one of the uninstructed or untrained men who were eager to perform services in respect of that ordnance; it could only have been produced by a man with special knowledge and ability for dealing with the problem. Then there is the interesting invention in connection with projectiles. Owing to the long-continued contest between ordnance and armour, there has been no period within the last 25 years when the country could afford to neglect any improvement, either in guns or armour. For my part, I have always attached equal value to Sir William Palliser's inventions, whether they related to guns or projectiles, to matters having reference to the purposes of offence, or to those having reference to defensive armaments. I hardly think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Resolution has done justice to the third and greatest invention of Sir William Palliser, namely, that of the armour bolts. At the time that invention was produced we were almost in a state of panic with regard to the means of keeping the armour in an efficient condition under an attack of hostile ordnance. Then it was that Sir William Palliser came to our relief with an invention which provided a security against the armour-plates positively falling off the sides of a ship under the stress of action. It is only fair to say that there was a very high money value in this invention, and it came particularly under my notice. There were at the time of its completion many Admiralty officials and powerful Committees, composed of eminent men, dealing with the armour-plate question. Great activity was shown, but none suggested the invention, which it was left to Sir William Palliser to bring forward as the result of years of scientific investigation and the most elaborate mathematical calculation. When the invention came to be tried it was found to be of great value; and, without wishing to reproach anybody, I wish to say I entirely sympathise with the moderate language used by my hon. and gallant Friend as to the action of the Government. I must say that, for a man not employed by the Government for the purpose of producing such an invention with regard to the armour-plates, for it to be adopted by the country at once, and continually up to the present time, and for neither the inventor nor his relatives to receive the slightest public advantage from the invention, is a state of things which the House would not willingly agree to. I do not think I should have said anything about this case if it had been one of any ordinary inventor. It is often true the invention of yesterday is easy, while that of tomorrow is difficult. But there is another consideration which must be taken into account ordinarily in dealing with the claims of inventors, and that is that, to a very large extent, inventions are in the air, that they are produced by several persons at about the same time, and that it often happens that the inventor who sets up enormous claims only happens to be the man who thought of it yesterday, while 50 thought of it to-day. Perhaps the House would hardly be prepared to go as far as I should in that respect. But it has been my lot to witness the production of an invention in several different quarters at almost identically the same time. But this is not a case of that kind. This is not a case that can be depreciated, because everyone of Sir William Palliser's inventions was the result of the application of his talent and labours to the needs of the time, and not the result of accident. For these reasons, I think the House might favourably consider the very moderate proposal laid before it without setting up any bad precedent for the future.

(10.15.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I wish to say a few words as a naval officer. The benefit of Sir William Palliser's inventions has, undoubtedly, been far greater to the Navy than to the Army. No one who knows anything of shipbuilding can deny what has just fallen from the hon. Member for Cardiff with regard to the invention of armour bolts. That invention has rendered it possible that the ironclads which are now being built could be undertaken without the invention no one can say that we could have gone on building these vessels. As to the Palliser shot and gun, which are so largely used, only to-day a Naval gunnery officer of great experience told me that he considered the country must have saved millions by that invention, and that the Palliser shot and gun were still the most economical as well as among the most effective weapons in use. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway occupied half his speech in trying to show that Sir William Palliser had made no considerable sum of money by his inventions. But I think the House has a right to take it for granted that Sir W. Palliser did not make any money out of his inventions, from the simple fact that the Government have given his widow £300 a year. I presume that before granting that allowance they satisfied themselves that Sir William had not died a rich man, and had not been able to make adequate provision for his family. What is it the House is now asked to do? The custodians of the Public Purse are asked to do what, I feel sure, the House and the whole country always wish them to do, namely, to reward those who have done great and signal service to their country. I feel equally sure that the British taxpayer would be the last person in the world to wish the reproach to be truthfully used of this country, that she is in the habit of forgetting those who, by the use of their ability, their bravery, their time, and their talents, have conferred upon her benefits by which millions are saved, and the greatest possible advantage gained to the nation.

(10.19.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall; Camborne): I should like to say a word or two in support of this Motion, and to explain the reasons why I intend to support it, because I am not anxious on ordinary occasions to vote money by way of pensions, or in any way to place further burdens on the taxpayers of this country. I think this is a case particularly deserving the attention and favour of the House. I do not propose o deal with it from a technical point of view, or to approach the merely personal aspects of the question; but I shall take my stand on the broad and general principle that it has been too much the habit of the Government in this country to neglect and, in some cases, to treat with extreme unfairness those who make these great inventions. I need not stay now to call attention to any particular case, but I hope we may be said to be turning over a new leaf in this respect. No doubt a Session or two ago a large sum—£100,000—was voted to the inventor of some new engine of war—I think it was the case of the Brennan torpedo—but I believe that was an exceptional case. In the course of my reading I have constantly come across cases in which men who have given this country the benefit of great inventions have received no adequate payment for the services rendered. I am not bringing this charge against any Government in particular; it has, unfortunately, been a characteristic of English Governments that they have been stingy in this respect. I hope we shall put an end to that state of things, because the effect is to discourage inventors and compel them to take service under Foreign Governments. That, surely, is not the best policy to pursue. It is neither the most economical, the wisest, or the most patriotic. Now, we know that Sir William Palliser was so patriotic as not to take his great inventions to foreign countries; he gave this country the benefit of all of them. I, therefore, consider that the House is bound to recognise the services of Sir W. Palliser, and to see that his family are not left in the condition the House is now led to believe they are in. We know that the ancient Greeks had a special system of providing for those who rendered great services to their country. But we, unfortunately, do nothing of the kind, and now we hear of men in humble life who wear the Victoria Cross, and men who are survivors of the Balaclava Charge, spending their last days on earth in a workhouse. That surely is not the way to treat those who have bravely and nobly served the country. Before I sit down I should like to fortify the position I have taken up by pointing out that in the past the Government have made special provision for the families of men who have rendered notable service to the country. In 1854 the three Misses Tucker were granted a pension in consideration of their late father's services as Surveyor to the Navy for 18 years; two years later the three daughters of Mr. Bayly, of the War Office, were awarded a pension in consideration of their father's long and meritorious services; grants have also since been made to Miss Ford in 1861; to Miss Lizzie Vincent; to the daughters of Sir John Burgoyne (who occupied the position of Constable of the Tower); and to General Chesney for his exploration in the Euphrates Valley. We have pensions granted to ladies, the living descendants of men of long ago. It can hardly be suggested that the daughters of Sir William Palliser are not entitled to consideration at our hands. A pension is granted to Prince Lucien Buonaparte for his literary services, but those services were done to the world, not to Englishmen. I believe in Cornwall he put up a memorial to Peggy (somebody or other, the last woman who spoke in the Cornish dialect. I am not aware that his explorations in the field of philology have given him any real claim upon the English Civil List, but rather on his own people. Then I find a notable pension to Mr. K. Thompson for his services to the Royal Family, but it seems to me that personal services might well entitle him to a pension out of the Privy Purse, and not the Civil List. But if a man is entitled to a pension on such grounds, then a fortiori, Sir William Palliser is entitled to consideration at our hands. I can only hope we shall hear no discordant note from those Benches opposite, though I do not think we need fear it, because there is so much support from both sides of the House, and the onus and burden of the responsibility of granting a pension will rest, not upon a part, but the whole House.

(10.33.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): Sir, I thought this case of Sir William Palliser was a very hard one, and that it was, in point of fact, the case of an officer who had rendered distinguished services to his country, and whose services had not been recognised. But I must confess, since I have listened to the discussion, that opinion has been very considerably shaken. The hon. Member (Mr. Conybeare) has gone extensively into the Civil List with a view to find cases which would show that the services of Sir William Palliser had been overlooked. I shall not go into the cases which he quoted, but he may rest assured that they all come strictly within the Act under which Civil Service Pensions are granted. In that Act services to the Sovereign are distinctly mentioned. The hon. Member seems not to be aware that on this very Civil List there are two pensions to the family of Sir William Palliser ["How much?"] £300 a year—as large a pension as there is on the Civil List, with three or four exceptions. There are pensions on the Civil List which I am not going to defend. I think the distribution of the Civil List has often been open to grave and grievous criticism—in fact, I would go so far as to say that it is not properly distributed. But under the present Government there has not been the misapplication of a single shilling on the Civil List, on which the family of Sir W. Palliser are fairly represented. There appear two pensions granted to the family of Sir W. Palliser, amounting together to £300. Very few pensions on the Civil List are for larger sums. Then Sir W. Palliser has received himself £24,000 from the Government, and a sum of £20,000 was paid to him by Sir W. Armstrong for his inventions. These are not mean sums. If the descendants of the inventor of the spinning jenny had been brought into the Lobby to appeal to hon. Members' sympathies, would they have been given anything? Has the inventor of the spinning jenny, or of any other wonderful invention benefiting commerce, ever received a single shilling from the country? No, those inventors have been left to languish in poverty and neglect. Their names will not be found in the Civil List. Had the Government been niggardly in its recognition of Sir W. Palliser's services, something might have been said for this additional demand, but it has not been niggardly. £24,000 is a large sum to give for the improvements which Sir W. Palliser introduced. We are asked to provide some indefinite sum out of some unnamed fund for the benefit of a family that is undoubtedly deserving of sympathy and respect, but not more so than many another family now in the direst depths of poverty and misery. Out of what fund does the hon. and gallant Member propose that this money should come? We have all heard lately distressing stories about the gallant men who fought at Balaclava, and the Secretary of State for War has stated that he has no fund at his disposal for their relief. It is evident that if once the State were to relieve these gallant fellows the matter could not end there, for how are we to draw a line between the men who fought at Balaclava and those who fought and bled at Lucknow and Delhi and throughout the Indian Mutiny? But if the Secretary of State for War has not the means of relieving the grievous necessities of these heroic men, how can it be expected that he should provide a large sum of money for the family of Sir W. Palliser? The hon. and gallant Member has calculated the debt which, he said, the country owes to the family by the saving on the shot and shell introduced by Sir W. Palliser. But when is the calculation to end? I presume that the saving will go on, and if the application be granted I suppose that in ten years' time another application will be made to the country on behalf of the family. The hon. Member for Cardiff has fairly enough represented that an application in progress of time would come from his family, but I hope it will be many years before that application is made. Is there to be no limit? Is this House the proper tribunal to decide upon those inventions, or to vote away public money in ignorance to a large extent of their value and of the extent to which future applications will be made? I am quite aware that, surrounded as we are by representatives of the Services, the voice of a civilian will be "as the voice of one crying in the wilderness." But I do not think the country will approve, with a pension list which already exceeds £7,000,000, of our voting another pension of considerable amount. Coming down to the House this evening I read a paragraph in an evening paper to the effect that considerable influence had been brought to bear on us here. I read that it was an unique incident. I have seen a good deal of lobbying in other countries. [Cheers from below the Gangway.]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must appeal to hon. Members not to continue these constant interruptions of the hon. Member.

MR. JENNINGS: The fact that Sir William Palliser was an Irishman may account for these constant interruptions. Hon. Gentlemen opposite really do carry their patriotism a little too far, if that is the explanation. However, there is this paragraph in the evening paper. It says that a considerable amount of Lobbying went on, and that the names of Members who promised to vote for the Motion were put down in a book. I say that is a very improper way of bringing influence to bear, and when money is to be voted away, although I hope it will not be permitted to damage the case which has been presented, still, I sincerely trust it will not help it. I am perfectly convinced that the country would not approve an extension of the pension list, or our voting blindly and recklessly another grant of money. Sir, I shall vote against the Amendment.

(10.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Sir, the hon. Member who has just sat down is a journalist, yet actually being a journalist, he asks this House to believe everything that appears in an evening paper. The hon. Gentleman says that there was a considerable amount of Lobbying, and it seems to me that he is anxious to pose as a species of Scipio Africanus. Now, about this Lobbying by my hon. and gallant Friend who had this Motion before the House this evening. Everybody knows that when an hon. Member has a private Motion on at 9 o'clock on a Friday night, it is not always easy to get a House. My hon. Friend went about asking his friends, apparently with some success, to be good enough to come here and to make a House, and to hear the arguments which he was prepared to advance in regard to this matter. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jennings) asks where the money is to come from. Where? If it does not come from the Civil Pension List, it will come from the Supplementary Estimates. Instead of a pension, you will give a lump sum, the amount of which my hon. and gallant Friend left to the Government. This is a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence. I do not think we ought to import any specious sentiment into the matter. To say that because there are other families living in misery, we ought not, therefore, to give the daughters of this inventor some adequate recognition of their father's services to the country, is very poor logic. The hon. Gentleman also said that Sir William Palliser received adequate reward for his inventions, and he says that if we are to consider the amount of saving which those inventions have effected the country, we shall have some one else, ten years hence, asking for more. There would be some point in this if we based our calculation of what should be granted on the amount saved. But we do not. We only ask that a reasonable amount should be given to the children of Sir W. Palliser. The saving may have been £3,000,000 or £12,000,000, or £1,000,000, I will not discuss the point. I will assume, for the purpose of my argument, it is £1,000,000. What has he received? He has received the sum of £24,000, but of that he expended in these inventions £13,171, so that he only received £10,378. Considering the disparity between the saving effected, the grant made, and the pension given, I do not think Sir W. Palliser's services have been adequately rewarded. It is said that Radicals are niggardly in the matter of public expenditure. I have always protested against this. We do not want money to be illegitimately or improperly spent. When a fair case is made out, we are as ready to take a generous view of the matter as any Member in any part of the House. We do not trouble ourselves about Lobbying. We are asked to come down and hear the case, and we are not, of course, actuated by anything but a fair and honest belief, on our part that the country has benefited very largely by these inventions. If this gentleman had sold them to some private firm, he would have been able to have left his family much more money than he did, but he preferred to deal with the Government, and the Government ought to deal fairly and generously by his family.

*(10.55.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Sir, the hon. Member who has just sat down terminated his speech with an appeal which every Member of the House must have regarded with great satisfaction. Nobody can doubt that in matters of this kind, where the power of the State is on one side, and the weakness of the individual on the other, it is extremely necessary that the House should see that justice is done. This is not a case in which we need fear the House of Commons will not do justice. Sir W. Palliser was enormously respected, and until almost recently one of our Colleagues in this House, well-known to many of us, and his inventions have achieved an almost world-wide reputation. A great deal of public sympathy has been evoked in the matter, and the subject has been constantly brought before the Departments. Successive Secretaries of State, First Lords of the Admiralty, and Chancellors of the Exchequer have been involved in the decision of it. The contention of the Government is that it is necessary to shut out our personal sympathies, which are naturally on the side of a man who has done good service to his country, in order that we may do justice between him and others who may have equally well-founded claims. Looking at it from that point of view, it is very difficult to see the great injustice which it is suggested has been done to Sir W. Palliser.

Hon. Members seem to forget when they speak of Sir W. Palliser as a man who has given his lifetime to inventions, and who might have dealt with foreign Governments and private firms, that he was an officer in the Army, holding Her Majesty's commission, from the beginning to the end of the inventions. Lieutenant Palliser, as he was then, joined the Army in 1855. He went on half-pay in 1864 at his own desire, and remained on half-pay up till 1871. In June, 1867, having perfected his inventions of chilled projectiles, he received £15,000. In February, 1869, he received £7,500 for his plans for converting cast-iron guns. In 1871, and before he left the Army, he received £1,500 for improvements in artillery, and those payments were treated, not merely by the Department, but by Sir W. Palliser himself, as a final settlement of his claim. In subsequent communications, Sir W. Palliser acknowledged frankly that although he had not had the intrinsic value of his inventions given him, still the account was finally closed between him and the War Department. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway said that out of these sums Sir W. Palliser only received £12,000 altogether. For my own part, I am not in a position, and I do not think that any Member of the House is in a position, to establish exactly what sum Sir W. Palliser spent on his inventions. Those are always difficult questions, but one thing we do know is, that those hon. Members who have spoken and have assumed that the Government had a monopoly of the inventions, are in error. There are two fallacies underlying this. In the first place, it is not germane to the case of 1890 to compare the sums which would be given now by foreign Governments with those which would have been given 23 years ago. But there is another fallacy in this, because the Government did not buy from Sir W. Palliser a monopoly. He received from Sir W. Armstrong alone over £20,000 during the same period, and, therefore, even taking the computation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who brought forward this case with so much moderation, Sir W. Palliser received for his inventions in the course of four or five years between £30,000 and £40,000. It has been urged that this is not a large sum as compared with what has been received by some inventors. I am not going to trouble the House with a comparison which would probably be inaccurate, and would certainly be unconvincing, but I should like to say that it is an error to suppose that the War Office are responsible for the check which occurred to Sir W. Palliser's profits, when the question of the patents being renewed was brought before the Privy Council. The War Office made no objection to the prolongation of the patents in 1876, but stipulated that, as they had paid £15,000 for their share in that particular invention, the Government rights should be reserved, and that they should not be forced to pay a royalty. The Privy Council considered the case in all its bearings, and came to the conclusion that the profits made by Sir W. Palliser, amounting, as they knew, to some £20,000 from private sources alone, represented a fair consideration for the patent, and they refused the application altogether. But I put it most strongly to the House that we—the present War Office—are not responsible for that decision. The Government were anxious to protect themselves, of course, but would have welcomed any concession made to Sir W. Palliser. The hon. and gallant Member also called attention to the treatment of Sir W. Palliser by the Admiralty with reference to the bolts for armour plates. I will leave it to the First Lord of the Admiralty to explain to the House the exact difference in these armour bolts, which prevents the patent being as valuable now as it was in the first instance, but I should like to refer the House to the fact that in 1874 Sir W. Palliser wrote to the Admiralty and asked for an acknowledgment of his services with respect to these armour bolts, his method of testing material by tension, and chilled projectiles. In his letter he said—

“I beg respectfully to state that, should my request be granted, I should not raise any claim of a pecuniary nature for the use of my patent bolts nor on any other account.”

I maintain that these words should be taken by the House, as they were taken by the Government, to be a formal renunciation on the part of Sir W. Palliser to any further royalties, subject to the condition that the Government should acknowledge the benefit of his invention, which was patented, and which he was at liberty to offer to any Foreign Power. Now, I am not here to contend that the sums paid to Sir W. Palliser are to be taken as a full equivalent of the whole gain which the Government may have obtained; but I do contend that the Government made their bargain at the time, and that that bargain was accepted by Sir W. Palliser for his services as an inventor alone.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I would ask if there is not a letter of Sir W. Palliser's extant in which he says—[Cries of “Order!”]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can use that argument in Debate.

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member will have an opportunity of correcting me later on if I say anything which does not accord with his view of the facts. But I would put it to the House that the Government have not been niggardly in endeavouring to show their recognition of Sir W. Palliser's services to the Empire. Hon. Members will not expect me to put any pecuniary value upon the honours which were conferred upon Sir W. Palliser; but we all know that he received the Cross of the Bath, and in 1872 was raised to the honour of knighthood. Those honours will be admitted by every one to be a token of the value of his inventions and a recognition of his public services. Hon. Members have somewhat disregarded what has been done since the death of Sir W. Palliser. When the hon. Member for Stockport spoke there was a laugh among hon. Members opposite at the mention of the sum of £300 a year having been granted to Lady Palliser and her children. We must all regret that after considerable sums passed through the hands of Sir W. Palliser he was not in a position to make provision for his family. I believe that Sir William Palliser invested a considerable amount of money in freehold securities, which, as he died intestate, passed to his only son.

COLONEL NOLAN: They were absolutely valueless.

*MR. BRODRICK: At all events, whatever its value, the freehold property of Sir W. Palliser descended to his eldest son, to the exclusion of the widow and her daughters. I should like the House to consider the relative value of the pensions which it is in the power of the Government to give. No doubt £300 may seem to many to be a low sum. In the case of the £250 pension awarded to Prince Lucien Bonaparte there were exceptional circumstances, which were explained to the apparent satisfaction of the House by the leader of the Opposition. A pension of £300 is higher than that which can be awarded to the widow of any General Officer, whatever his distinction, even if he happens to have fallen on the field of battle and in the service of his country. No higher pension could be given to the widow of, say, Lord Napier of Magdala, and therefore it cannot be said that the widow of Sir W. Palliser suffers by comparison with other cases. Great stress has been laid on the sums said to have been saved by Sir W. Palliser's inventions; but the estimate of over £5,500,000 is based upon an assumption of the present cost of steel projectiles, which cannot be admitted. It must also be said, on the other hand, that if we had not had the benefit of Sir W. Palliser's inventions, we should have saved some of the money that has been expended in availing ourselves of them, and which in the absence of such inventions we should not have been called upon to spend. ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] Well, you cannot calculate it both ways at the same time. We have benefited by steam and railways, and in estimating that benefit we do not usually take account of the alternative expenditure that would have been incurred in attempting to carry on our traffic at the same speed as by train by means of horses. You cannot take the comparison both ways. While Sir W. Palliser's inventions were of public service at the time, still we should simply have had to content ourselves with a less perfect service, not have had to spend so much money in their absence as the hon. and gallant Member estimates. I will only put one other consideration before the House. No subject has occupied the serious attention of the Government more than this, even during the present Session. It has been brought forward in the most influential manner from time to time. I will not allude to the points raised by the hon. Member for Stockport, an attempt to destroy which was made by the hon. Member for Northampton by a relation of circumstances which, I venture to say, was altogether incomplete. I venture to say that the statement of the hon. Member might with truth have been extended. Nothing that sentiment could do has been wanting. If instead of Sir W. Palliser being an officer of distinction he had been a private soldier, or if instead of being a Member of Parliament he had been a mechanic, no one would say that the case has not been sufficiently recognised by what has been done by the Government, supplemented as it has been by sums paid by private firms. I do not for a moment suggest that the hon. Member for Galway would have done less for a man of low estate; but, still, the social position of a distinguished officer and Member of Parliament does make an appeal to sympathies which might not have been touched in other cases. The Government desire to do full justice in the matter, and in the event of the death of the widow will be glad to consider the position and claims of the daughters; but they consider that everything has been done which they are justified in doing up to the present time; and they therefore hope that the Motion will not be pressed to a Division, but that it will be recognised that the Government have acted with justice and liberality, but also with that equality which they are bound to observe in dealing with claims upon the public purse.

(11.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I have considerable sympathy with the attitude adopted by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings), and deprecate any attempt to put undue pressure on the House. I must say, however, that my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan) would have been the last man to have taken part in any such attempt. The only request made to me was that I should come down and help to make a House. I declined in any way to engage to support his Motion. I came down in order to assist in getting the matter legitimately discussed. Having heard it discussed I will venture to say a few words on it. Every Member must in the course of his experience have had brought under his attention the claims of neglected individuals. As an Irishman I shall never forget the action taken by the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton) on a private petition I presented to him with regard to an unfortunate coast-guardman who had exhausted himself in the service of the State, and whose children were in a destitute condition. The First Lord of the Admiralty, having no public funds on which he could draw to meet the case, was so good as to send me a cheque on his private account. I could not help feeling that the noble Lord was an Irishman, and that I was another. Now, Sir, I have heard the statement of my hon. and gallant Friend, and the statement made on behalf of the Government. I may mention that Sir W. Palliser was an Irish landlord, who could not in any way claim sympathy from those who speak on behalf of the tenants, being separated from us by gulfs as far as social relations are concerned. But when a case is made we cannot shut our eyes or ears to it.

My hon. and gallant Friend says the inventions of Sir W. Palliser have saved the State some £5,000,000 of money. ["No."] Well, the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Mr. Brodrick) did not dispute that. I am willing to take the saving at £1,000,000. If he saved the State that amount his family have claims upon our consideration. The claims of individuals do not, as a rule, fare well in this House, not because the House is unwilling to do justice, but for various reasons. I remember when Frank Power was killed with Gordon in Khar-toum we had to keep the House sitting till 4 o'clock in the morning to get his sisters £150 a year. They had no claim on us. On the contrary, Frank Power's brother is at this moment helping the hon. Member for Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) to exterminate the tenants in the South of Ireland. It is very much of a lottery whether these private claims are well treated in this House or not. It may be difficult, in the first place, to get someone to understand the case, and then there is the difficulty of getting someone to take it up, and the further difficulty of obtaining a day for its discussion. The present Pension List is ridiculous. I believe that £50 a year is paid to one gentleman, whom I knew myself to be the chief Fenian poet in the days of insurrection in Ireland. I am sure I hope he enjoys his £50. I quite agree that there may be hundreds of deserving cases that have not been dealt with, but that is no reason why we should not deal properly with any case that is brought before us. The hon. Gentleman opposite says Sir W. Palliser was loaded with honours. What were the loads? He got a knighthood. Well, you get a knighthood for winning a borough. [An hon. MEMBER: Or losing one like Lewis.] I do not desire to introduce anything of a controversial character into this Debate. It is clear that Sir W. Palliser saved the State a large amount. He has left a considerable family. I am glad to hear that the Treasury have promised a certain amount. I think the Treasury should act handsomely in such a matter. I entirely repudiate the idea that anyone on this side of the House is supporting the claims of these ladies because they are Irish ladies, and I think that Irish

Members are as fit and competent to deal with a question of this kind as any gentleman born within sound of Bow Bells. I think that something more ought to be done for Sir W. Palliser's family than is now being done or intended to be done.

*(11.29.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I wish to state the nature of the transactions between Sir W. Palliser and the Admiralty. The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down made an allusion personal to myself, and I may, perhaps, be permitted to refer to it as showing that we sometimes oppose grants of public money not out of niggardliness of spirit, but because we feel, as guardians of the public purse, it is necessary for us to be less charitable in public than in private life. I happened to be a personal friend of the late Sir W. Palliser, and had the honour of belonging to the regiment to which he for some time belonged. Therefore, all my predilections and personal sympathies would be in favour of this claim. But upon consideration of the facts of the case I find myself unable to support it. It seems to be assumed that Sir W. Palliser was for the last 22 years of his life in the Public Service on full pay. This was not the fact. For nine years of that time he was on full pay as an officer, and while on full pay he took out two patents for inventions. When his regiment was ordered to India he made an application to be allowed, on special terms, to retire on half-pay, and from that period—it was in 1864—up to the time of his death he devoted his time to inventions, mainly on commercial lines. He did not give the whole of his time to the State. His transactions with the State were of two kinds. So far as his chilled projectiles were concerned the State gave him a lump sum in full discharge, and as regarded the bolts, he took out a patent, and during the whole time the patent was in existence the Government paid the royalties. The House will observe what an unfair position the Government are placed in with regard to the matter. On the one hand, if a lump sum is paid to an officer for the use of his invention, it is asserted that he is inadequately remunerated, and, on the other hand, if the commercial mode of transaction is adopted and a royalty is paid, it is stated that the State does not pay for the invention at all. The patent for the bolts, which were of great use, ran from 1862 to 1876, and two years before it terminated Sir W. Palliser wrote a letter to the Admiralty, stating that if they would give him a testimonial pointing out the value of his services—

"I will not raise any claim of a pecuniary nature for the use of my patent bolts, nor on any other account."

A letter was written to him to that effect, and these are the facts of the case so far as the Admiralty are concerned. Sir W. Palliser was a man of most prepossessing manners; and I think must have been liked by all who knew him. He was a Member of this House. However, I hope the House will not, for these reasons, treat the case as an exceptional one. I would ask whether the House desires us to treat the inventions of any humble dockyard man on a different principle from that of Sir W. Palliser? Various inventions, some of them of a very ingenious character, are frequently brought to the notice of the Government, but I do not know of any inventor who has received greater consideration than Sir W. Palliser. I am certain that if any man in a lower position in the employment of the State were to die and his wife obtained a pension, no Department of the State would make provision for the children when the pension terminated. If what I say be in accordance with the invariable rule, ought we to make an exception in the case of an individual who happens to be a Member of this House? I venture very respectfully to say that it would not, in my opinion, be wise for the House to assent to the form of recommendation which has been placed before it, because the public will not fail to draw a contrast between the treatment of this case and that of inventors generally.

*(11.36.) SIR W. BARTHELOT (Sussex, N.W.): This question has been very ably

dealt with from both points of view; but I think justice has hardly been done to those who have advocated the claims of Sir William Palliser, because one or two points made by them have not been noticed. Looking at what Sir W. Palliser received, and the benefits his inventions conferred on the country, and, bearing in mind also the money he spent in perfecting his inventions, it can hardly be said that he was adequately remunerated. The expenses which he had necessarily to incur in order to carry out the inventions ought to be taken into account when the sums paid to him are mentioned. If, therefore, you deduct £13,621 for expenses, you find he absolutely received from the Government £10,328. The Financial Secretary to the War Department (Mr. Brodrick) made very little of the conversion of the old iron guns into rifled guns. I undertake to say that at that particular time there was nothing of greater importance to this country than the increase of the number of rifled guns, and, but for this invention, other guns would have cost the nation a very much larger sum of money. By means of the invention guns which were lying idle and useless in the dockyards were converted to very good purposes. As to a royalty having been paid by the Government for the bolts, I have just been shown a letter in which Sir W. Palliser denies that any royalty was given him for the bolts, and this can be confirmed by one who was nearly connected with him. I should, therefore, like to be informed of the amount of the royalties alleged to have been paid to the deceased officer. In my opinion, Sir W. Palliser, the value of whose inventions to the country is not disputed, was not adequately remunerated by the State for the services he rendered. It is nothing to the purpose to say that had he lived at the present time he would have received much larger sums; but if of any value it is an argument in favour of increasing the payment now.

The position of the case is this: Sir W. Palliser received a certain sum of money from the Government, and he might have received large sums elsewhere. There is now nothing left for his children. They are very young, and there is no money to educate them with. My hon. Friend thinks there is something still due to him from the Government. Assuredly, if Sir W. Palliser is entitled to receive anything more, his family has a right to know that they will receive it; because it may be said by a future Treasury, "If anything ought to be done, it ought to have been done before." I appeal to the Government not to put the House to the trouble of a Division, but to say that they will give a fair and reasonable sum for the education of the children, and after the death of Lady Palliser will continue the grant to the children.

*(11.43.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I desire to say a few words in support of the appeal just made to the Government. I know how difficult it is for the House of Commons to decide how a variety of claims shall be dealt with, but I have had brought before me during the last three or four years circumstances connected with the work of Sir W. Palliser, and I venture to say that in regard to the good he has done the country he has not been sufficiently remunerated. If that is the general feeling the Government ought to meet the views of the House of Commons. I happen to know that Sir W. Palliser's daughters have been left in a very poor position, and that one of them shows signs of considerable ability, which might be developed if there were means to give her a suitable training. It is not for one invention, but for several, that Sir W. Palliser's family have claims on the country. Therefore, the case is one in which further generosity could fitly be exercised. If something is not done in this case no claim can be successfully made upon the House of Commons again. This is a good case. The feeling of the House is in favour of something being done, and I hope the Government will give effect to that feeling.

*(11.46.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government feel a great deal of sympathy for the very generous aspirations of many of my hon. Friends and of Gentlemen opposite in this case. The hon. Gentleman opposite has appealed to the Government to show their sympathy. I think the Government have already done so. In 1877 the late Lord Iddesleigh obtained a grant for Lady Palliser of £150 a year, and I myself obtained a grant of £150 more, making altogether £300 a year. But the Government are now asked to propose to the House of Commons to give a grant of thousands in consideration of services which, in the language of the gallant officer himself, have been amply rewarded. A Memorandum has been alluded to. That Memorandum must not be held up to the House or the Government to reverse or to alter the character of the discharge which has been given. If the Government are not to regard transactions of this kind as final they will be exposed to all manner of claims. It is, of course, a very agreeable thing to be liberal, but to be liberal in the sense of giving away that which is expressly barred is a responsibility which I cannot undertake. In 1869 Sir W. Palliser wrote to the Under Secretary of State as follows:—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th inst., enclosing an order for £7,500, which sum I accept in full discharge of my claim upon the War Office for the system of converting cast iron guns."

That letter is dated 21 years ago, and now a claim is set up, not only with respect to these guns, but for other transactions not with the Government of the present day, but with the Government which existed in 1868. Reference has been made to the Judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock. He decided that the invention was a meritorious one, and that it was impossible to say how much had been expended by Sir W. Palliser on his patents. He further went on to say that Sir W. Palliser had received £20,000 for his invention by the Government, and that he had also received large remuneration from Sir W. Armstrong in respect of royalties. It is to be deeply regretted that Sir W. Palliser should have made no provision for his family; but I ask the House whether it is a wise course, out of sympathy alone, to go behind transactions of 20 years ago and make a grant of money which has been held not to be due by the officers of successive Governments acting in the simple discharge of their duty. Moreover, the grants which have been made out of Her Majesty's bounty on the recommendation of the Government exceed the pension which the widow of a Flag Officer of the highest rank is entitled to receive under the Regulations of the Service. Under these circumstances, I trust the House will not agree to the Motion.

(11.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am bound to say I feel it my duty to support the First Lord of the Treasury in the position he has taken up. Nothing is easier and more agreeable than to be sympathetic, generous, and liberal with other people's money, but it should be recollected that we are dealing with the money of the nation. We have to consider whether, in acceding to this Motion, we should be acting upon a rule which we can apply to others under all circumstances. Otherwise we should be properly condemned for having established a sort of privilege or favour in one particular case. Sir W. Palliser was a man of distinguished ability, but he received very large rewards from the State, with which he declared himself to be satisfied. It would be unsafe, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, for any Government to disregard that acquittance. Besides that, it appears that Sir W. Palliser has derived what everyone must consider a very considerable sum on his own private account. It is to be regretted that he has left his family unprovided for; but in dealing with other persons the absence of that provision cannot be taken as a ground for replacing it with public money. Moreover, it is not denied that the benevolence which has been granted to Lady Palliser is at least as great as has ever been accorded to anyone under similar circumstances. I think nothing could be more dangerous than to encourage Motions of this kind in favour of individual interests, and if a Division takes place I shall certainly vote against the Motion.

*(11.59.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to add one word. I ought to have said that, having regard to the circumstances under which the children of Lady Palliser are now placed, I shall deem it my duty to endeavour to secure that the pension of £300 a year which Lady Palliser now receives shall be continued to her children in the unfortunate event of her death.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland Division): I think we are all thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for the concession he has made. I object to the manner in which this case has been met. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby says it is wrong to be generous with other people's money; but I think we may ask the State to be honest and just in its dealings with its servants who have served the State well; it is no question of generosity. The First Lord of the Treasury says that £300 a year is more than would be received by the family of a General Officer who had passed his life in the Service; but has a General Officer ever saved the country £5,000,000? I have listened to the whole Debate, but no answer has been given to this part of the argument of my hon. and gallant Friend. It is said that present claims are at least five times too high, and still large claims on the State are left unrecognised. I was sorry the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) used the argument he did. I belong to the same profession as the hon. Gentleman, but I think it would be very unfair to hold reasonable claims urged in this House prejudiced by what may have appeared in the newspapers. Every case should be judged upon its own merits, and so we on this side support the claim. We have no feeling in the matter. Sir W. Palliser was politically an opponent of ours, and I suppose his family have inherited the political traditions. Comment has been made upon the fact that Sir William Palliser left no provision for his family, and the inference has been drawn that he was a man of extravagant habits. Nothing could be further from the truth. The reason why his family were left unprovided for was that he made speculations in house property which did not turn out successfully. A further reason was that his mind was so preoccupied in scientific pursuits that he was unable to pay sufficient attention to the material interests of himself and family, like many another man from whose services the country at large has benefited.

(12.2.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): As to what the First Lord of the Treasury said just now, I would observe that though Sir William Palliser is dead his inventions still live, and we are still deriving advantage from them. Quite recently the manufacture was being carried on at Woolwich. I feel very strongly the position in which Sir W. Palliser's family is placed. At this time money is particularly required for education, and year by year the country is saving immense sums of money beyond anything that was anticipated when the inventions were submitted to the Government. Strong supporter of the Government as I am when I think they are in the right, I must, if there is a Division, support this Motion.

*(12.3.) SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I will only detain the House for a moment, but I cannot but protest against the mean and shabby character of the speeches with which the First Lord and the right hon. Member for Derby have opposed this Motion. I am quite sure the First Lord would never apply such principles to his transactions in the Strand. The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that if an employer does not treat members of his staff with a generous measure of justice he cannot keep a good staff together. The lesson he teaches the House he would not apply to his own affairs. Here is a man who has done the State a noble service, and in his unselfish efforts his family have suffered, and is the justice of the case met by the miserable pittance the right hon. Gentleman offers? I am not an Irishman; I am an Englishman—perhaps I should be better if I were an Irishman and a little more generous; but I have 30,000 people engaged in industrial employment to deal with, and I tell the right hon. Gentleman that I would not demean myself, I would not injure the sentiment that should exist between employer and employed by dealing with a question of this kind in the manner of the right hon. Gentleman. I was attracted to this discussion because I knew the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway had, year after year, urged this House to adopt the system of breech-loading to our guns, and in vain. Yet, at last, that system has been adopted after enormous waste. I respect such a representative, and I felt sure he would urge the just claims of a man who did his best to arrest the miserable dry rot of the Service, and to give us improved defences; and though he may fail of success to-night, in my judgment he has done good service. If you are to have good employés you must not talk about justice and generosity in the tone of official utterances we have heard from both sides to-night. Is it just to requite the services of a man who has saved you millions by inventions you are using to-day by giving £6 a week towards the expenses of his wife and family? Is there any hon. Member present who will say he thinks that is a just way of dealing with this matter? I will be no party to such a settlement. I will tell you what I will do. I make this offer to the right hon. Gentlemen the First Lord of the Treasury and the Member for Derby, if they will join with me I will add to this miserable £300 a year my share to make £300 a year more.

(12.9.) SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I will only make a suggestion which may prevent a Division, which, I think, we are all desirous to avoid. There is not, I think, any great division of opinion on the merits of the case, for there is no question of the advantage the country has derived from the inventions. Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury allow me to make an appeal to him to carry his own suggestion a little further and to make at once an additional allowance of £150 a year to the children of Sir William Palliser, an additional income being more needed now to meet educational requirements than it will be hereafter. In the unfortunate event of the death of Lady Palliser, the sum of £300 might be reverted to. This is not inconsistent with the view of the right hon. Gentleman, and will meet the present necessities of the young ladies immediately concerned.

(12.10.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 85.—(Div. List, No. 90.)

Main question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich), who had a Notice on the Paper: "To call attention to the low wages paid to labourers in the Government Establishments; and to move, That a Committee of this House be appointed to inquire and report thereon, and the market rate of wages for similar labour in private firms," rose—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Motion is withdrawn.

COLONEL HUGHES: My Motion, Sir, is now withdrawn.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Motion to which the hon. and gallant Member has given notice of Amendment has been withdrawn.

Committee upon Monday next.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION
(RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 211.)
Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(12.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to put a question, Sir, on a point of order. I am not contesting this Bill; but to-day, Sir, while you were in the Chair in Committee on another Bill, this Bill stood as second Order, and the question I have to put is on a matter of regularity. The Evening Sitting is well understood to be devoted to discussions raised by private Members on Bills or Motions as they stand on the Notice Paper. But we find that the order of business has been completely changed, and the Government Orders have been plumped down in front of the private Bills. Now, considering the few opportunities private Members have, I think we may well protest against the little salvage of time that remains between this and 1 o'clock being appropriated by the Government.

(12.21.) THE CHAIRMAN: Friday is a Government night, subject to the obligation of putting down Supply as the first Order, and the arrangement for the evening is subject to alterations consequent on the Morning Sitting.

(12.21.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Does that not involve the obligation that the Government are to proceed with the Motion for Supply, and that when the Motions hon. Members desire to raise are exhausted, they should take Supply? Instead of this, the Government propose to appropriate the time to these Bills. I must say, speaking with all submission, that this is an irregular and unusual proceeding. Why was Supply withdrawn? Are not the Government anxious to proceed with Supply?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Clause 1.

(12.22.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to move, Sir, that you do now report Progress. I have been a close observer of procedure for some years, and I have never known a transaction of the nature we have just met with. When a Division has been taken on the first Amendment to a Motion for Supply, it is usual for the Member having the next notice to proceed with the matter he desires to raise on the Main Question, and which he is entitled to discuss.

THE CHAIRMAN: In Committee on this Bill the hon. Member cannot discuss what may have happened in the House on a Motion for going into Committee on Supply.

MR. SEXTON: I merely wish to make my protest against the manoeuvre which has been practised: Supply being withdrawn before any Member could rise, and before we were aware of what was proceeding.

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member is entitled to move to report Progress, but he cannot now enter into what happened before I was in the Chair. I am quite unconscious of what happened in the House, and the hon. Member cannot discuss that now.

MR. SEXTON : On the ground that by the proceeding which has been adopted we have been deprived of our Constitutional right to raise grievances on the Motion of Supply, I move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(12.25.) COLONEL HUGHES : I support the Motion for reporting Progress. I appreciate the kindness of those who consider I had a right to proceed with the Motion I have upon the Paper. I was waiting to be called, but I understand that the original Motion to which my Motion was an Amendment, was withdrawn, and I was, therefore, precluded from moving my Motion. I can only think that was a slight upon myself, because it was done without a word of explanation.

THE CHAIRMAN : Order, order! I must point out again, as I have already pointed out to the hon. Member for West Belfast, it is incompetent for hon. Members on this Motion to discuss what happened when Mr. Speaker was in the Chair.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I am sorry to find so serious a misapprehension prevails in certain quarters of the House as to the course which has been pursued. It was in perfect accordance with the rules of the House, and there was no intention of taking any advantage of my hon. and gallant Friend. I may, perhaps, be allowed to make this explanation to remove misapprehension. The hon. and gallant Member could not have made his Motion under any circumstances, because the question that Mr. Speaker should leave the Chair was carried by the Division which took place.

MR. SEXTON : But he might have discussed it. He might have made his speech.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : No doubt the hon. and gallant Gentleman might have made his speech, but he could not have made his Motion. I understand the hon. and gallant Member desired to do more than make a speech.

COLONEL HUGHES : No.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : The course taken was precisely that which has over and over again been taken under similar circumstances. All I can say now is that if hon. Members do not desire to make Progress, I have no objection to this Motion being carried, and then I will move the Adjournment of the House forthwith.

(12.28.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I want the First Lord to understand the real circumstances of the case in connection with to-night's Sitting. In the course of the last few days we were asked by a Conservative Whip whether there might not be a count-out taken this evening, and in the face of that—

THE CHAIRMAN : Order, order!

(12.28.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR : I simply wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman in reference to Order No. 35 (School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill). It has been several times before the House. Are the Government prepared to accept the Second Reading and refer the Bill to a Select Committee? I am only raising the question in the interest of the hon. Baronet (Sir Richard Temple), to whom I have promised support.

(12.29.) MR. T. M. HEALY : The First Lord has suggested a course which is somewhat inconvenient. It is far better to run through the Orders than to have them deferred in a batch. It is far better to let the day's work be done in the day. There is no advantage in a sudden Motion for Adjournment.

*(12.29.) MR. W. H. SMITH : On the whole, I think it is better to move the Adjournment, seeing there is no disposition to make progress with business we have before us.

(12.29.) MR. CONYBEARE: It is not that we object to making progress; we object to the shabby dodge the Government have resorted to.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

(12.31.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am not going to oppose the Motion, but I call on the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham to witness, that I have done my best to help him to get forward with the Bill in which School Board teachers are interested, and which I believe the Government are in favour of. I undertook to assist the hon. Baronet in facilitating the progress of the measure, and if I have failed it is not from any want of zeal on my part.

*(12.31.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I thank the hon. Gentleman for his assistance, and I hope that on some other occasion our joint efforts may be more successful.

(12.32.) MR. T. M. HEALY: We cannot pass this Motion without a protest against the deliberate attempt of the First Lord of the Treasury to fasten upon us responsibility for it. The right hon. Gentleman says he makes the Motion because he understands there is a desire on our part not to go on with business. So far is that from the fact that we have made an offer to the Government to proceed with non-contentious business. Among this there are the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Pleuropneumonia Bill, a Government measure they profess to be anxious to get on with, the East India (Civil Servants) Committee, the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, and there is the Statute Law Revision Bill, all Government Orders, which they might have proceeded with, but for reasons of their own, perhaps to furnish an election cry, the Government have deliberately refused the proposal to go through the Orders, and they make this sudden Motion. We take note of their action. I suppose they have some motive in it, possibly it foreshadows an early dissolution, and an appeal to the country on the question of obstruction. If it does, I can tell the Government that they have attempted a bad piece of tactics. We made the offer to proceed with business in the usual way, and it was deliberately refused.

(12.33.) MR. SEXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman is unwilling to do more, perhaps he will tell us what he proposes to take between now and the adjournment for the holidays?

*(12.33.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The desire of the Government is to pass the Budget Bill before the holidays, and to that end we propose to proceed with it day by day. In answer to the remark of the hon. Member for Longford I may point out that we did desire to proceed with a Bill that was practically uncontested, and were met with a Motion to report Progress. I yielded to that rather than subject the Committee to a protracted discussion, and had no alternative.

*(12.34.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I feel it my duty to make a protest against the course the Government have pursued, and, for my part, I am disposed to divide against the Motion now submitted to us, as a protest against the treatment meted out to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes). If the Government did not care to utilise the three-quarters of an hour left after the Division surely they might have allowed the hon. Member the opportunity of discussing the important Motion standing in his name. It seems to me that when questions are attempted to be raised here vitally affecting the interests of thousands of our skilled artisans and labourers—I have noticed it on other occasions when efforts have been made to discuss these grievances—by some ingenious process the Motion is invariably shunted. Many of us remained in the House to-night for the purpose of supporting the hon.

Member on a question which, in my view, is a far more serious one than that upon which to-night we have wasted several hours' discussion. But, whatever view may be taken of its importance, we had the reasonable hope and expectation that it would be discussed. The Government have acted in a most disingenuous manner towards thousands of men whose complaints the hon. Member for Woolwich was to unfold to-night. If I get any assistance I shall register my protest by taking a Division.

(12.36.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I rose just now to make a similar protest, and I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's remarks. It was known that many of us were waiting here to take part in the very important discussion we expected. The importance of the subject has been indicated by the questions which, from time to time, have been asked, and to a very large number of the artisan class it is of serious interest. Though, by the Rules of the House, the Motion could not technically have been made, yet in three-quarters of an hour we could have ventilated the grievances complained of, and could have extracted from the Ministerial Bench some statement as to the action the Government are prepared to take. It is not a question necessary to divide upon; it is for the Government to say if they will assent to a Committee, and then we shall know what course to take in and out of the House. Instead of this, we have, if the expression is not un-Parliamentary, been jockeyed out of the Debate. I lodge my emphatic protest against this, and, if my hon. Friend divides, I will with pleasure act as Teller with him. Then, on another question. We have tried to get the School Board Superannuation Bill through the House, and, as the hon. Member for the Scotland Division has said, it would have been possible to have taken the Second Reading to-night. We all know the deep interest taken in this measure by school teachers throughout the country, and the Second Reading might have been taken; but simply because the Government did not happen to have their way with the First Order the right hon. Gentleman turns round in dudgeon and says, there shall be no progress with anything else. I denounce this obstructive policy on the part of the Government.

(12.40.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I hope a Division will be taken as a protest against these tactics. We are frequently blamed for what is called wasting time, but here we are anxious and eager to do business, anxious to advance a Bill a stage, but because, for reasons that seem good to themselves, Members objected to proceeding with business unexpectedly brought on, the First Lord, in a fit of temper, makes this sudden Motion for adjournment. I think we certainly ought to divide against the Motion.

*(12.41.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have but a single observation to make in reference to the School Board Superannuation Bill, and that is that I and others deeply interested in the work of voluntary schools should have opposed the Bill in the strongest manner possible, and the Second Reading could not have passed to-night. More than that, we have had support in our opposition from that quarter of the House from which we now hear of support to the Bill. It is a fact that hon. Members on the other side have on previous occasions raised objection to the Bill, and I have no doubt they will do the same on future occasions. It is, therefore, unfair to say that the action of the Government has in any way prevented the passing of the Bill.

(12.42.) MR. H. J. WILSON (Holmfirth): It is a fact that should not pass without comment that the Government can find day after day for the purpose of providing compensation for publicans, and yet they are unwilling to afford 40 minutes for the consideration of the grievances of a body of public servants, whom the hon. and gallant Member for Woolwich represents. While they are prepared to spend millions in the one case—for though not now, millions are ultimately involved—they will not hear the grievances, or alleged grievances, to which the hon. Member desired to draw attention. I sincerely hope the protest will be carried to Division.

(12.43.) COLONEL HUGHES: I have no wish at all to provoke a fierce contention. I certainly was under the impression that it was competent for me, at least, to speak to the Motion of which I had given notice. Perhaps, Sir, you will be good enough to say whether I understand the point rightly. Is it the case that it was not possible for me, after the Division on the Motion for going into Supply, to even speak upon the second Motion? [Cries of "No."] Could I not even speak to my Motion unless the Government set up Supply a second time? [Cries of "No."] If that is the rule I must bow to it; but if I am incorrect it seems to me that somehow, in a manner I do not understand, I have lost a right I thought I possessed and should not have lost. Perhaps, Sir, I may have a word of explanation?

*(12.44.) MR. SPEAKER: There was no need for the Government to set up Supply again for the purpose of enabling the hon. and gallant Member to speak; the Motion for Supply was still before the House after the Division. After the result of the Division was declared a Member of the Government rose at the Table and said, "Supply withdrawn, Supply Monday," and this I repeated from the Chair. I was not bound to call upon the hon. and gallant Gentleman, seeing that his Motion would be an Amendment to the Motion that I leave the Chair. The hon. and gallant Gentleman did not rise when, in a loud voice, I said, "Motion withdrawn, Supply Monday." This was what passed, and when the hon. and gallant Gentleman rose and said, "My Motion is not withdrawn," I said the Motion on which the hon. and gallant Member's notice gave him the right to speak was withdrawn. With the withdrawal of the Motion his right disappeared.

*(12.45.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, E.): One question, Sir, I beg to put to you. Would it not be more convenient that the question for the withdrawal of the Motion for Supply should be put from the Chair in the same manner as ordinary questions upon which there is right of discussion? Probably in such a case no misunderstanding would have arisen. The hon. and gallant Member did not rise quickly enough, being under the impression that he would be called; and so the Motion for Supply was withdrawn apparently without objection. If, Sir, you could adopt the practice followed in the ordinary course of putting the Question "That the Motion be withdrawn," no such difficulty could arise.

*(12.45.) MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet will observe that I said "Motion withdrawn, Supply Monday." It was competent for any hon. Member to question that. I could not put the Question in any other way.

*(12.46.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): May I ask you, Sir, would it not have been competent for the hon. Member to have made his speech on the Motion for withdrawal of Supply?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member being under the impression that I would call upon him did not rise. But I was not bound to call upon him, though I expected him to rise; but, when the Motion for withdrawal came, I was under the impression that the whole thing had been arranged.

(12.47.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I must say I think the Government have acted with very little consideration for one of their own supporters. They knew the hon. and gallant Gentleman had the notice on the Paper, and they should have known the importance of the subject. I do not say what line I may have taken on the case put forward; but I do say it is a gross injustice towards a great body of men outside, as well as to those who had been waiting here through the evening, to refuse to have the case heard, and it is but scant courtesy to one of their own supporters.

(12.48.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR rising was met with cries of "spoken."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to order, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman has already spoken. If he asks the indulgence of the House I apprehend there will be no objection to his speaking again, but he has no right to speak again.

*MR. SPEAKER: Only by the indulgence of the House can a Member speak the second time. [Cries of "Ask indulgence."]

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite willing to ask the indulgence of the House; but I think, Sir, you will allow that when I rose just now it was to ask your opinion on a point of order, and by doing this I am not aware that I exhausted my right of speaking. But I have no wish to insist on the right I think I possess, and I will ask the indulgence of hon. Gentlemen if they will listen to a word or two. We are attacked for a want of generosity towards those whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman so ably represents. But, in the first place, the Government have acted strictly in accordance with the usual practice; and, secondly, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman had thoroughly understood the procedure usual on these occasions, and had risen immediately after the Division had been declared, he would probably have been called upon, and he would have had the opportunity of making the statement he desires to make. He could have laid the case of the workmen in the Government establishments before the House, but he could not have made his Motion or have taken a Division. All that the hon. and gallant Gentleman could have done under any circumstances was to make his speech, and he had the opportunity under the ordinary Rules of the House had he risen. The Government strictly followed the ordinary procedure on Friday nights, and nothing that was done was intended to prevent, or could have prevented, the hon. and gallant Gentleman making that statement to which we should all have listened with great interest.

(12.50.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.):

It seems to me the Government did not follow the usual course, but a very unusual course. What occurred? The hon. Member for Woolwich did rise to address the House as soon as the opportunity offered; but a Member of the Government, availing himself of his nearer proximity to the Table, took a course utterly without parallel in my recollection of proceedings on Friday nights. The Government, knowing there was a Member behind them who had an important Motion to bring forward—and I may mention a very embarrassing Motion, indeed, for the Government—a very important matter for consideration, and knowing that he would make his statement, without taking the trouble to look round to see whether the hon. Member was prepared to rise or not, sidled up to the Table and requested the withdrawal of the original Motion for Supply before the hon. Member or anyone else was aware of what was being done. The fact is, both the hon. Member and those of us on this side, who I may perhaps say are more up to the tricks and dodges of debate than the hon. and gallant Gentleman is, were taken by surprise by the rapid manoeuvre executed by the Government, and before we had time to appreciate the situation the right of the hon. Member for Woolwich was gone. All that I can say is, that if the Government had practised such a trick upon a Member of our Party they would hear a great deal more of it than perhaps they may from their own supporters. I am sure the Government would not dream of attempting such a trick against one of their opponents. All I can say is, during the time I have been in the House, and I have been a close observer of proceedings, I have never seen such a thing done before.

(12.54.) Mr. MAC NEILL rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(12.54.) MR. CHARLES DARLING (Deptford): It was my desire to second the Motion standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich, and, for my own part, I do not think—and I do not think that my hon. Friend believes either—that any kind of trick has been practised against us. It is perfectly obvious that if my hon. Friend had understood what the hon. Member calls the dodges of this House, as well as hon. Members do who have made them the subject of study and practice, he might, without being called upon, and after the Government had made the Motion for withdrawal, have done exactly what he could have done before. [Cries of "No!" and "Divide!"] It will be easier to divide if I am allowed to proceed without interruption. It is perfectly obvious my hon. Friend might have made the speech he intended to make, and others interested in the subject might have followed him; but, after all, the time at our disposal was only that between 12.15 and 1 o'clock, and, I must say, I think that those who have complained that we did not proceed with the subject at 12.15 are far more anxious to make out a grievance against the Government than to have an adequate and effective discussion of the subject itself. We desired to go to a Division, but we could not have done so. ["Yes."] We could not have done so. I prefer the opinion of the Speaker to that of any hon. Member. We could not have gone to a Division. [Cries of "Agreed."] No, we are not agreed yet. What my hon. Friend and I, with others who support him, desire if we do not get the inquiry for which we ask is that we should be able to take a Division on the subject.

(12.58.) Mr. R. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*MR. SPEAKER: I have not thought it right to put the Question. The Motion before the House is the Adjournment; and in two minutes I shall, in accordance with the Rules of the House, leave the Chair, and, therefore, I do not think I am called upon to put the House to the trouble of a Division.

MR. SEXTON: On a point of order, Sir, I would ask you whether, if the hon. Member for Woolwich had spoken after the Division, he could not have divided the House on the Main Question, that you do leave the Chair?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; the hon. Member could have challenged a Division on the Motion that I now leave the Chair, but not on his own Motion.

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): May I ask you, Sir, if any Member had objected to the withdrawal of Supply could the Motion have been withdrawn without discussion?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Motion could not have been withdrawn under those circumstances. As I have already explained, I put the Question "Motion withdrawn," "Supply Monday." These were the words that passed my lips.

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT AUDITS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I have given private notice to my noble Friend the noble Earl who represents the Local Government Board of a question of considerable importance to County Councils, which I desire to ask. It relates to the audit under the Local Government Act of 1888. I understand that some of the auditors consider they ought to audit sums of money which have been paid by Quarter Sessions after the appointed day for current expenditure, which were due under their order, before the County Councils came into existence. Those amounts in some counties reach a very considerable sum, but whether the amount be considerable or not, it will involve considerable trouble on those who have to deal with the accounts. So far as I understand it, there is a clause in the Act which enables Magistrates after the appointed day to pay sums of this sort. The clause which I understand the auditors rely upon seems to me only to refer to mortgages and liabilities of that kind which are handed over to the County Councils; but what will possibly occur is this, that the auditors may insist upon auditing those sums paid by the Quarter Sessions, and, as it appears to me, for no purpose whatever. If every one of those charges should be incorrect the auditor could not surcharge the Magistrate, and he certainly could not surcharge the County Council. I should like, therefore, to know from my noble Friend what view the Local Government Board take of this matter. It is a matter which affects a very considerable number of County Councils. I will, therefore, ask my noble Friend whether the auditors appointed under the Local Government Act, 1888, will audit payments made after the appointed day by the Justices of Quarter Sessions for expenditure incurred before their jurisdiction over county fiscal business ceased?

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: The question which the noble Earl has put to me is one, no doubt, of great importance to County Councils at this moment, and I hope the answer I have to give him will put the matter in a clear and intelligible light. The Local Government Board considers that all payments which were made from the county treasuries after the 1st April, 1889, although they may have been made under orders of Justices in Quarter Sessions, are subject to audit by the County District Auditors. Section 64 of the Act of 1888 provides that after the appointed day, that is, the 1st April, 1889, all property and monies belonging to Quarter Sessions of a county shall be vested in the County Councils, and the monies in the hands of the County Treasurer who, up to that time, was an officer of Quarter Sessions, but who after the 1st April, 1889, became an officer of the County Council, therefore became the property of the County Council on that day. From that date the County Treasurer became under Section 118 (13) of the Act an officer of the County Council. As regards audit, it is expressly provided by Section 71 (3) of the Act that the accounts of the County Treasurer shall be subject to audit by the District Auditor appointed by the Local Government Board. If in any case the accounts of the payments which are referred to in the question have not been included in the accounts of the County Councils, it will not be necessary that those accounts should be rewritten. The requirements of the Statute will be regarded by the Local Government Board as satisfied if a supplemental or separate account is furnished in respect of the payments made by the treasurer after the appointed day under orders of Quarter Sessions. No doubt under Section 106 (7) of the Act the Quarter Sessions are empowered to make after the appointed day orders for the ordinary quarterly payments; but as those payments will be made out of monies which have become vested in the County Council and by the County Treasury who has become an officer of the County Council, it appears to the Local Government Board that these payments, like all other payments made by the County Treasurer after the appointed day, should be included in the accounts submitted for audit. I will add that the Local Government Board, whilst it must insist upon an efficient audit, is anxious to cause as little trouble as possible to County Councils.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Earl has not answered that part of my noble Friend's question as to the power of the County Councils, because neither of the bodies appears to be responsible to the auditor.

*EARL SPENCER: What is the use of his auditing if he cannot surcharge anybody?

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: It may be assumed that the accounts are correct, as they have been passed by the Quarter Sessions. It would be inconvenient, however, if sums of money which have been paid by the County Councils under orders of the Quarter Sessions could not be audited, as the payments have been made out of monies of the County Council, whose accounts must, according to Statute, be audited.

SOCIALISTIC LEGISLATION.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I have on two previous occasions ventured to bring before your Lordships the subject which stands in my name on the Paper. I did so in 1885, and again in 1887, and I had hoped to do so again at the close of last Session, but illness prevented my being able to be present in your Lordships' House. On the last occasion my audience consisted of seven Peers, and I am not quite certain that they all sat out my speech. This time there is a goodly array of your Lordships present, which I attribute to the fact that Socialism is yearly acquiring greater importance. It is a subject which cannot be blinked, but which must be boldly looked in the face. But I am not sure, as regards the speaker, who has to bring this question forward, that it would not have been better for him that he should have the chance of boring seven rather than seventy of your Lordships. But I ask your Lordships' patience, as, without entering into some details, it is impossible to give your Lordships a fair summary of the Socialistic situation. On the last occasion I divided my subject into the Socialism of the streets, the Socialism of the schools or of the philosophers who wrote on the question, and the Socialism of the Senate, or legislative action. I propose to adhere to the same division, only inverting the order, the Socialism of the streets having of late acquired much more importance than it had when I first brought the subject forward. My Lords, I propose, then, first to call your attention to the most prominent of what I venture to call the Socialistic measures which have been either passed or brought into one or other of the Houses of Parliament. The first question, I have no doubt, which your Lordships will ask is, What is a Socialistic measure? ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Marquess cheers, but I will state that at once. The last time I spoke on this subject I defined Socialistic legislation to be "legislative curtailment of liberty and legislative confiscation of property for the benefit of the politician." But on this occasion I will apply a test to Bills which I think my noble Friends on my right cannot possibly object to. I hold all measures to be Socialistic which, up to a certain date, about 20 or 25 years ago, were held by the old Liberal Party, and by the political economists of those days, to be outside the province of Parliament. At that time the object of Parliament was to free men from restrictions and to take away whatever inequalities they considered to exist in legislation, so that men might be free and unfettered to run the race of life. At that time, down to 1860, so successful had Parliament been in freeing men by legislation that a well-known Liberal writer, Mr. Bagehot, said that there would soon be nothing left for Parliament to do. But, my Lords, this was in pre-Gladstonian days; since then a new spirit has arisen, for since 1870 all the endeavours of Parliament have been directed to undo the work of previous Legislatures, and again impose restrictions. Land was, no doubt, the first subject of retrograde legislation, under the Irish Act of 1870. But since then every great interest in turn—houses, ships, railways—in short, all the great interests in the State, have been, more or less, the objects of attack and of grandmotherly legislation. I rejoice at that, and on this ground, that when the property of the Irish landlords was shamefully confiscated the other great interests stood calmly by and allowed this legislation to take place. It was as if they said to themselves, “Let the galled jade (land) wince, our withers are unwrung.” But they are no longer unwrung, and other interests now see the danger that hangs over them, for they are all, more or less, the subject of attack, and they find that they must combine, irrespective of Party, to resist the State Regulator and robber. My Lords, I have used a strong term, but I think the legislation that has been passed justifies it, and, indeed, to call a spade a spade is about the only satisfaction that is left to us. But while saying this, I wish to guard myself upon one point. I should like to express the sympathy I honestly feel for the poor. I do not believe there are any of your Lordships who have keener sympathy than myself with the trials of the poor, and the load that lies on the shoulders of labour, or who would more gladly lighten the toils of the worker and relieve him, if possible, of the burden he has to bear. But I do not think the best way to do that is by false economies; and the worst method of all is to shake confidence in the security of property—the soul of success and prosperity in a mercantile community—by confiscating the property of one set of people for the supposed benefit of another. There is, moreover, a vital point which should not be forgotten in considering these questions, and in taking what is called the harsh political-economy view of these measures. It should be remembered that we have had in this country—I do not know whether it exists in America, I know it does not exist in France, Belgium, or Germany—a Poor Law since the time of Elizabeth, under which property to the uttermost farthing can be rated, if need be, for the benefit of the poor. Now, my Lords, having prefaced this much, I turn to the Acts and Bills which, within the last few years, have come before Parliament. I hold in my hand a list of those measures; and I am sorry to say that when you look over them you will find they are not all Liberal and Radical measures, but that the Conservatives have their fair share of them. Your Lordships will recollect the definition I have given of what I consider to be Socialistic measures, namely, measures which in the days of genuine true Liberalism would have been considered outside the province of Parliament. During the five years from 1885 to 1889 inclusive, 318 Bills of the character to which I refer were brought in, and 40 became Acts of Parliament. In 1888 there were 89 Bills of that character brought in, and eight became Acts. Of those 89 Bills, 51 were brought in by Liberals and Nationalists, and three of them were carried; 38 were brought in by Conservative Unionists, and five became Acts. In 1889 there were 67 Bills brought in, of which 10 became Acts; of those the Liberals and Nationalists brought in 35 Bills, and carried three as Acts, and 32 were brought in by Conservative Unionists, of which seven were carried. Now, my Lords, what is the character of all this legislation? It is to substitute State-help for self-help, to regulate and control men in their dealings one with another with regard to land or anything else. The State now forbids contracts, breaks contracts, makes contracts. The whole tendency is to substitute the State or the Municipality for the free action of the individual. I have said that land was the first subject of attack. I need not trouble your Lordships with many instances of that; I will simply state generally that measures affecting land are, in the main, for the purpose of putting the State or the tenants practically, more or less, in the position of the landlords, and to give them, more or less, control of the landlords' estates. Of the Acts passed in 1888 there were a Law of Distress Amendment Act as regards lands and houses, a measure for the preferential payment of wages, a Public Health Amendment Act, by which, without compensation, when landlords exercised their right of reserving land for building upon at any future time, they were deprived of it as regarded any gardens which they had temporarily set aside for that purpose. The tendency to State interference is seen in every direction ; land, capital and labour, railways and canals, trade and commerce, education, shipping, have been dealt with very freely in the same way. There has been a Government Bill dealing with technical education and providing for the addition of a technical workshop to every elementary school. But just listen for a moment, my Lords, to the sort of grandmotherly legislation we have had with regard to merchant ships. The Merchant Shipping Act of 1888 empowers the President of the Board of Trade to enforce various regulations upon the owners of sea-going ships by the imposition of £100 fine. Those are regulations affecting the quality and description of boats, life-rafts, life-jackets, and life-buoys to be carried, as to the method of using life-boats, and providing oil in stormy weather. Inspectors are appointed to see to those things. Under the head of trades and manufactures I find that the Employers' Liability Act has been extended, so that men shall not contract themselves out of the Act. There you have interference with contracts. In 1889 we had a very remarkable Bill brought in by the Conservatives, referring to cotton-cloth factories. It is to enable State Inspectors to regulate, under heavy fines, the amount of artificial moisture to be permitted in the atmosphere of the factories ; to prevent the temperature being raised above 70 degrees ; to ensure the placing in such factories, and keeping in working order, two standard wet and dry thermometers ; that the readings shall be recorded daily between certain hours, and that they shall be kept in a properly glazed frame ; and there are other provisions with regard to the inhalation of dust and the humidity of the air. That, my Lords, seems to me to be a stretch of even grandmotherly legislation. Then with regard to the Government Bill dealing with technical education—by which, as I understand, it is to be in the power of Local Bodies to establish technical schools, and to attach workshops to almost every school—I should like to ask what was the Kensington Museum established for ? What are the schools of art throughout the country in connection with it for but for this purpose ? And I believe they have worked very successfully. But, after all, it has not been by technical workshops, provided out of public funds, that England has obtained her supremacy in the manufacturing world. Lord Armstrong has condemned this system of public technical education, and he has written most ably against it. Further, there has sprung up of late a system of what are called "Home-Art Industries," originated, I believe, by my noble Friend, Earl Brownlow. It is spreading in all parts of the country, and I know it has succeeded admirably well in my own district. Most excellent work is being done in that way entirely voluntarily, without any demands being made upon the rates for establishing technical workshops, and simply, as many excellent things have grown up in this country, by the voluntary action of people who are free, enterprising, and independent. I venture, therefore, to say, my Lords, that these technical schools are neither necessary nor desirable. Let me now turn for a moment to the Bills which have been brought in within the last two years. I will only take a few of them. One measure which was to have come before the other House of Parliament, and which may, perhaps, some day reach your Lordships' House, is called the Access to Mountains Bill, which will empower people to go for scientific or artistic purposes everywhere except where there may be enclosures or plantations. That is really a measure to permit the public generally to roam at large. I am speaking in the presence of Scotchmen and Yorkshiremen who know what moors are, and I venture to say that, in regard to property, the value of the grouse on Scotch moors is probably equal to that of the sheep on them. Thus, this proposal might destroy much valuable property. If the Bill ever comes before your Lordships, I hope you will take care not to permit people to travel freely over moors, and destroy the grouse in the nesting season. I do not think that men would be allowed for a moment, for any scientific or artistic purposes, to walk freely through cabbage gardens, or over strawberry beds. The grouse and deer are about the most valuable properties our mountains produce. Then there is the question of fishing, in which many of your Lordships are interested. Another Bill has been brought in to make all fishing common, except salmon. I am not sure whether it is that Bill which contains a very remarkable provision, but I know a Bill was brought in which insisted that the riparian owners, whose property was thus to be taken from them and given to the public, were to make paths along the rivers and streams, and if they did not do so, and their fences were broken down, the responsibility for any damage was thrown upon them, and not upon the trespassers. Next there was the Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill. That is a nice measure! It provides that anybody who has an unexpired lease of 20 years, shall be able to go to some Public Authority and claim to be allowed to transform his leasehold into a freehold. And not only does that refer to houses, but if there are three acres of ground he can enforce a sale. Can anything be more immoral than such a proposal? A man takes a lease, I do not care whether it be of a town house, a country house, or a cottage, with his eyes open, and having entered into a contract to give up peaceable possession at the end of his term, he comes to Parliament and asks Parliament to break his contract, and to enable him to force his landlord to sell. I venture to say that is absolutely and entirely immoral and demoralising. I am myself a tenant of the Crown in this City, and if I were to endeavour, by passing such a Bill as this, to force my landlord to sell I should consider myself neither more nor less than a thief! That may not be the view of the State; but I think it is the simple, plain, honest, and straightforward view of this question. Then there are three Bills which have reference to mines. One of them is called the Eight Hours' Bill, and another refers to quarries. This is a very remarkable Bill. It is brought in by a Liberal, and it prescribes the angle at which ladders are to be placed, the distances at which platforms are to be fixed; and, further, that an Inspector is to go round, and the owner or person working the quarry is to state to him the amount of produce from his mine and the quantity of metal in the mineral got. This is the way trade is expected to be carried on. If this proposal were to become law quarries would simply become unworkable to their owners, or those who at present work them. I will pass over the Canals and Railways, though there is a Bill which proposes to empower Municipalities to force the sale of them. But there is one Conservative Bill which I will mention, which prescribes the size of the lettering at Railway Stations. There are 19 Bills affecting trade and manufactures. One of them is very remarkable, about hand-loom weaving. A Temporary Dwellings' Bill provides that an Inspector shall have power, at any time between the hours of 6 a.m. and 9 p.m., that is many hours after dark during a great part of the year, to enter temporary dwellings, including all houses on wheels excepting, I believe, shepherds' huts. Then there is another Bill to compel the payment of wages weekly. If you begin by compelling the payment of wages weekly, how long will it be, having once established such a principle as that, before you fix the rates of wages to be paid? Another compulsory measure is the Shops' Half-holiday Bill. Then there have been introduced no less than 10 Bills in reference to alcohol, with which I shall not trouble your Lordships further than to say that it is a pity that those in power listen as they do to those who, in regard to this matter of temperance, are so active and who make so much noise. They would do far better if they relied on the fact that 999 out of every 1,000 Englishmen prefer, on the whole, beer to water. I think we may say in England that every man has been more or less "sworn on the Horns at Highgate;" by which I believe it is understood that a man swears "he will never drink small-beer as long as he can get ale, and that he will never drink water as long as he can get small-beer." Yet we have Parliament giving heed to the noisy faddists who go about the country advocating all sorts of what they call reforms, and crying out for prohibitory legislation in the face of the fact that such legislation has signally failed wherever it has been tried, as in America and Canada. Your Lordships may remember a famous passage in one of Burke's speeches, in which he says that—

"To listen to the grasshoppers you would imagine they were the only occupants of a field in which a herd of oxen were quietly lying."

I believe that no Government is justified in giving in to a baseless cry for legislation, which has been shown again and again to be a failure wherever it has been tried. Then, in regard to education, there have been some extraordinary proposals. A Bill entitled "Elementary Schools Continuance" proposes that there shall be taught drawing, book-keeping, shorthand, German, or some other foreign language, the properties of soils and manures, irrigation, draining, the principles of farming, the rotation of crops, the structural life of plants, the growing of fruit, vegetables, and flowers, botany, the rearing and keeping of cattle, pigs, and poultry, singing, calisthenics, musical drill, the use of tools, laundry work, art-handiwork, modelling, wood-carving, &c. One very comprehensive saving clause provides for instruction in any other "analogous subjects." Then Mr. Broadhurst says that he holds it to be the duty of the State to see that every child shall have daily "one good, sound, wholesome meal." This, of course, is to be provided for out of the rates. And if they are to be fed, my Lords, why not clothed? Why not let the State or the unhappy ratepayer, who is to stand in loco parentis to these children, take upon himself all the duties of their parents? When a rate is spoken of it is said, "Oh, it is only a  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 1d. or 2d. in the £1;" but the ocean is made up of drops. I know one estate on which the rents are down 25 per cent. and the rates up 50 per cent., and I believe that is by no means an exceptional case. On the contrary, I think it is very generally the case throughout the country. But who are the people who suffer most? My Lords, the people who suffer most from high rates are those poor people who are just able to keep their heads above water, and whom this additional halfpenny, penny, or twopence, may sink altogether. My Lords, I cannot pass from this question of the Senate and its legislation without touching upon the action of Trades Unions, because I think I am saying what is exactly to the point when I say that I believe our legislators are greatly influenced by the opinions of workmen, as expressed through their Trades Unions, and rightly so if those views are reasonable. What is the view of these Unions? There was a Congress, in 1888, at Bradford, and another in Dundee, in 1889. Let us see what is the view upon this kind of legislation of those who have the right to speak in the name of the working men, through their Trades Unions. Here are a few words from the President's Address at Bradford. He said that—

"The Eight Hours Bill is only a temporary measure. Land Reform will give permanent relief. It must be searching, durable; and give the land to the people. . . . Inspectors should be allowed to enter at all hours, without warrant, to see whether the work is properly carried on, whether it be in a bedroom, or anywhere else."

At the Congress at Dundee the President said that—

"The Eight Hours Bill is only a stop-gap."

A stop-gap till when, my Lords?

"Till light has spread, then, indeed, it will go hard with stock gamblers, land monopolists, rents and Royalties. With Trades Union Magistrates, Trades Union Parochial Managers, and with Trades Union M.P.'s, what could not be accomplished?"

The opinion of the Congress was in favour of Land Nationalisation. Then, my Lords, there is another new element in Socialism in a Public Body which has risen up among us. It is not a Senate, but it has its President, its Committees, and its Finance Minister. I believe it has powers of taxation, though, happily, it has not, as yet, the power of sanctioning public meetings in Trafalgar Square, nor has it got the police under its control. Your Lordships will readily see that I refer to the London County Council, and I regret that the head of the London County Council is not in his place tonight. Nowhere in this island are predatory principles more in vogue than in the London County Council, and nowhere is grandmotherly legislation so palatially housed as is the London County Council in the splendid hall that has just been constructed for them. It seems to me, from a picture I have seen in the Illustrated London News, that the Throne of Her Majesty in this Chamber is as a common chair compared with the seat which the President has had constructed for himself out of our rates. Let us see what is the sort of legislation that finds favour in the London County Council. They propose, amongst other things, to prescribe the kind of grate that everyone is to use in his rooms; they wish to have the control of meetings in Trafalgar Square; and it is proposed by an important member that no contracts should be taken up save those in which the labour is to be well paid. There is a proposal that all loans for permanent works or improvements shall be placed hereafter upon such persons as the law may direct, all contracts to the contrary notwithstanding. That is, they are to be dealt with entirely without reference to any contracts which may have been made with regard to those loans. Of the betterment question I will not speak beyond this, as it is under the consideration of a Committee in "another place;" but it seems to me that the members of the Surveyors' Institute have given the best answer when they point out that there is, per contra, a "detriment" question, where the traffic has been diverted by the alteration or betterment; and I think, where you have to consider detriment against betterment, the one would be simply a set-off against the other. Then, on the great question of the day—the housing of the working classes—they propose to take by compulsion without compensation, for prospective advantages, property for the people engaged in industry, both inside and outside the Metropolitan area. They are to build for them baths, wash-houses, and "other suitable structures;" provide open spaces for their convenience within the Metropolitan area and five miles beyond. Kitchens, nurseries, dining-halls, and other rooms for joint use, and buildings for shops and "other purposes" are to be provided. Every weekly tenant, if his house is demolished after 12 months' occupation, is to receive £1 compensation, and for every year up to 15 years' occupation; the best accommodation is to be found at the lowest rent; suitable places are to be provided for donkeys, costermongers' barrows, and other things, and facilities for home industries. That is the little bill-of-fare of the London County Council for the housing of the working classes. With regard to this question, I hold that the only duty of the State is negative. The only duty of the State or Municipality is to say that buildings unfit for habitation shall not be permitted. I think that is proper and legitimate; but if this sort of thing is to be done by Municipalities out of the rates, if the Government is to encourage this sort of thing, it will be interfering with private enterprise and the independent action that is going on at present. Nothing could be better than Sir Sydney Waterlow's scheme, which was working very well long before this proposition was put forward; and I say that nothing can be better than to leave such free action to supply what is wanted. Then, again, the London County Council has passed a resolution urging the Government to seize the property of the City Companies, and, I suppose, hand it over to them. That resolution was carried by 57 to 40. Looking, then, at the economic doctrines which prevail in the London County Council, considering how they refer back to a long past time in our history, I cannot help thinking that any Plantagenet Exhibition which might be held at the New Gallery, or anywhere else, would be incomplete without a bust of the Chairman of the London County Council; and, looking at the predatory character of the proposals which they would like to see inaugurated, I cannot but feel that the doors of their palatial chamber require no lock and key, but that they will fly wide open when the members approach them, and say: "Open Sesame!" I can only hope that the Oriental parallel will be completed, and that the spirit of Morgiana will be infused into the Metropolitan Electorate before the next London County Council election. My Lords, I have done now with the Senate and the different hearings of its Socialistic legislation, and I come now to what I have termed the Socialism of the Schools. In illustration of this, I will only trouble your Lordships with one quotation, and that is from a Paper read before the British Association, in 1888, by Mr. Bernard Shaw. He is a member of the Fabian Society, and I am told that he is reckoned the ablest writer and the best reasoner upon the Socialistic question. What is his view? It is a very simple one. But first, I had better say what "Fabian" means. As explained to me, it means that this Society does not look to revolution to make its ways prevail, but trusts to Fabian tactics, to silent influences, and the potent action of legislation. Mr. Bernard Shaw's Paper was entitled "The Transition to Social Democracy," and in one passage he said—

"Socialism involves the transfer of rent to the whole people. Here is the rent from industry, here are the pockets of the proprietors; drop the rents into the people's pocket. Organisation of industry required capital and land, to be obtained by the expropriation of landlords, and the taxation of rent."

The problem, then, is a very simple one. The land is to be appropriated to the people by the expropriation of the landlords and the taxation of rents. That, I think, will be especially interesting to noble Lords who receive rents. Then there is another branch of Socialism which I will just touch upon, and that is what may be called Sacerdotal Socialism. Cardinal Manning has recently taken an active part in the dock labourer's strike, and his view of these questions can be obtained from his utterances on the subject of early shop-closing, with reference to which he has said that no remedy except by legislation would ever be adequate. My Lords, I come now to the question of the public meetings in the streets, to show the tone that prevails there. At public Socialistic meetings, the general character of the speeches is violent abuse of holders of property, and the speeches tend greatly to disorder. I need not mention the names of the leading Socialists who use that language; their names are familiar to your Lordships. In two years there have been 37 important public meetings in London alone. In 1888, at a Social Democratic meeting, all the leaders were present, and the sacerdotal element, as I have called it, was represented by the Rev. Stewart Headlam, who called upon the white slaves to possess themselves of the County Councils, the Municipalities, and the State; using the power gained to possess the land, factories, mines, and all the means and instruments of production. That is what real Socialism means. It does not mean attacks upon land alone, but upon unearned increment of all kinds, the idea being that the State or the Municipality should possess all the means and instruments of production. On January 1, 1889, at a public meeting, Mr. Williams threatened—

"That they would go in a body to Grosvenor House and Buckingham Palace, and parade all the thieves and criminals for the benefit of the pot-bellied aldermen and the idlers of the West End."

Mr. Morris, poet, Socialist, and high art
The Earl of Wemyss

manufacturer, was present on that occasion. On January 8, at a meeting of the unemployed near the Marble Arch, Mr. Burns said—

"By Heaven, their rights were worth fighting for."

and Mr. Williams said—and I would specially call the Prime Minister's attention to this—

"There were thousands ready to cut off Lord Salisbury's head, like the French in 1789. They would terrorise Parliament, and knock down Members of Parliament like bullocks."

On July 1st a mob, headed by the editor of Justice, broke in upon and dissolved for a time the Bermondsey Vestry. On the 25th August, at a meeting of dock labourers in Hyde Park, Mr. Burns said that the letters of the Dock Companies' Directors "expressed the sentiments of ghouls and financial Jack-Rippers." On August 30th an appeal was signed by the leading Socialists asking all the trades to strike on the same day and paralyse trade of every kind. On November 17th a very nice meeting took place at the Guildhall Tavern. It was not an ordinary meeting of people in the streets, but a meeting of shopkeepers; and what did they ask? They asked for a Court to fix rent, that rates should be divided between the tenant and the landlord, all contracts to the contrary notwithstanding, that tenants should have a vested right in goodwill, a right to compensation for unexhausted improvements, and leasehold enfranchisement. When I read that, it struck me that there was a strange omission in this programme. Surely they must have intended that the Court that is to fix rent should fix the prices of commodities also, for if rents are to be fixed for the benefit of the shopkeeper prices ought to be fixed for the benefit of his customer. I think that does not admit of dispute for one moment. And now, my Lords, I will give the last quotation with which I shall trouble you on this head. First let me state, however, that on the 15th November, at a meeting of the Liberal Union, Mr. Causton, M.P., in the chair, it was decided that, if their demands were not granted, a Liberal Party should be formed on the lines of the Irish Party. On December 22nd, at a meeting held in connection with the gas strike, a speaker said—

"That a man like Livesey"

and that atrocious expression of opinion at a public meeting was loudly applauded. Now, I would say a few words respecting this question of strikes. In 1866 I sat on the Trade Unions Commission for two years, but I had previously had occasion to consider the subject, as I had addressed the miners at Dalkeith upon Trades Unions and strikes; and had formed the opinion that all a successful strike could do was to anticipate a rise in wages and to check a fall. After sitting on the Commission for two years I remained of the same opinion. The Commission recommended that Trades Unions, which had been up to that time illegal, as being in restraint of trade, should be legalised. But certainly it never entered the heads of those who formed the Commission to legalise tyranny over men who did not wish and who declined to belong to Unions. Surely, my Lords, it is the duty of the Government, of every Municipality, and of the police, and of everybody to take care that the man who has for his only property free right to labour shall be at liberty to sell that labour in whatever market he chooses. During the gas strike a most painful and shameful thing occurred. The Trades Unions in London having declined, on behalf of the men, to accept the wages that were offered, a body of Scotch labourers came up to the Metropolis from Dundee, but they were not allowed to enter upon their proposed service. They were hustled off, and had to beg their way back to Dundee. I say it is a disgrace that such a thing could be possible in a country which professes to protect liberty and to give the right to free labour. Now, my Lords, I have so far dealt with this subject; but I think I should be treating it incompletely if I failed to bring before your Lordships the views taken upon this question, and their utterances upon it, of some prominent public men. Politicians are all, more or less, worshippers of the “jumping cat,” and by the actions and speeches of public men you can often gauge the pressure that there is outside which is forcing them in a particular direction. Now, my Lords, I propose to call your Lordships' attention to the sayings of some of our public men of note. The first I will take is Sir William Harcourt. Sir William Harcourt was called, in another place, two years ago, “The high priest of the jumping cat,” and he has recently said, “We are all Socialists now.” That was a very remarkable statement coming from Sir William Harcourt; for it will be in the recollection of my noble Friend the Prime Minister and of others in Parliament at the time that it was Sir William Harcourt who, some 20 years ago, ran off to Oxford with Mr. Schofield's “Grandmother,”—Mr. Schofield being the inventor of the phrase, “Grandmotherly legislation.” Sir William Harcourt was so enamoured of it that he took this respectable old lady down to Oxford and made immense political capital out of her; turning her on all occasions into ridicule. But when he had to go to Derby to conciliate another constituency, finding they had there a great respect for the old lady, he completely changed his views, and has since taken every opportunity of praising her—in public. That shows, I think, if anything can, the contrast between the utterances of 20 years ago and now on these questions. Then my noble Friend Lord Rosebery said, I think it was at Glasgow, that—and Mr. Morley, who stood stoutly out against the eight hours movement, said that—“Democracy would not be tender to vested interests.”

That, I take it, means that Democracy will rob right and left. But if anyone wants to know what is the real Liberal programme of the future, he should turn to an address delivered by Sir C. Dilke at Glasgow, who is endeavouring to work and bribe his way back to public life. In this address he said he looked forward to the time when brains and heredity would be at a discount as compared with strong arms, when every one would work, when there would be no lazybones, shorter hours, more diffused work, when there would be free education up to the University, a working day of eight hours, compulsory acquisition of land, fair judicial rents, security of tenure, a division of rates between landlord and tenant, graduation of municipal rates, equalisation and graduation of Death Duties, manhood and womanhood suffrage, four Home Rule Parliaments, payment of Members of Parliament and of Local Bodies, and many other extreme changes. But, my Lords, if I wanted to point to one thing which more than another shows the Socialistic tendencies of the time, I should find it, I think, in the Report recently drawn up by the Committee of your Lordships' House appointed upon the subject of Sweating. The Report of the Sweating Committee contains recommendations that the weight and size of hammers with which women worked and that chains made by them should be regulated by Statute. Why should they not carry that a little further, and prescribe the weight of every scuttle of coals that is to be carried upstairs by the housemaids in your Lordships' houses? But the most serious of the recommendations of that Committee is one which suggests that Public Bodies should take every precaution in their power to insure fair and reasonable terms to their workers. I see before me a noble Lord who was a member of that Committee, and I should like to ask him if he can make out that that does not mean really fixing wages?

THE EARL OF DERBY: No; certainly not.

*EARL WEMYSS: Then I should like to be informed, if they do not propose to do that, what they mean by "insuring fair and reasonable terms to the workers?" Practically, that would make them judges of what is, and what is not, sufficient pay. Two years ago, when speaking on this subject, I referred to the noble stand made by Mr. Bradlaugh against the feeling prevailing amongst working men in favour of State interference and Socialistic grandmotherly legislation. Lately, I find, he has made a similar stand upon the eight hours question. All honour to Mr. Bradlaugh for speaking as he did! He said the proposal, if carried out, would, in his opinion, "Have a most demoralising effect upon the labouring classes. Let the working men encourage a spirit of self-reliance and settle their hours of labour for themselves. Parliament cannot make backbones for men who have not got them; and to legislate for the weakest and most helpless would discourage the strongest and most vigorous in the continuance of the efforts they have hitherto made, and which have advanced this country before the other nations of the world."

That was a portion of his speech delivered in the House of Commons on the 24th February. But, my Lords, what is all important at the present time, surrounded as we are by all these Socialistic tendencies, is to know what are the views of the Prime Minister on the subject. I was delighted to read that at a great meeting held at Nottingham in the winter my noble Friend at the head of the Government, while expressing full sympathy with labour, and with the poor, showed the folly and certain failure in the long run of wild attempts to benefit them by proposals to rob other people. He spoke thus—

"On confidence is built the proud structure of our commercial supremacy; on confidence is based the vast fabric of civilisation which we see around us; and if you encourage these peddling philosophers with their petty, spiteful acts of confiscation, animated by no philanthropic spirit, but by a mere impulse of class antipathy, if you allow them to have their way, the substratum of all your civilisation and prosperity and happiness will melt away."

Those, my Lords, are words of wisdom, and I hope they will be taken to heart by those Conservatives who are inclined to coquette with Socialistic legislation, and have brought in such Bills as I have referred to. Not long ago it was my good fortune to hear my noble Friend at the Royal Academy ridicule grandmotherly legislation. Your Lordships have no doubt read the speech that he then made. It was as wise as it was witty. He assured the Royal Academy that the one thing they needed, as in regard to other institutions, was to be left alone, and he turned the whole idea of State interference into consummate ridicule. He also made some comparison between my noble Friends on the right, and their position with one of the pictures, to which, however, I need not further allude, and I will only say that it is a comfort that we have a Prime Minister who can give utterance to doctrine so wise. I have only one other point to call your Lordships' attention to, and it is that this Socialistic legislation is hurtful to trade, and to industry alike. I believe that those who encourage it are really the worst friends of the working man—I mean this kind of Socialistic legislation, which destroys confidence. Nay, more, I believe that by substituting State aid for self-help you tend to destroy the very fibre and moral character of the nation. There comes to us upon this point a voice from Central Africa, for I find that Mr. Stanley, speaking the other day at St. James's Hall, when giving credit to those who had served with him and endured terrible sufferings with so much courage, said—

“Darkest Africa had been to them a fiery furnace, a crucible, and a question chamber which have tried each of them to the very depths of their natures, and they have borne every trial to which they have been subjected with more than Spartan—with old English—fortitude, before mawkishness and mock sentimentality had rendered men maudlin.”

Those words from the great explorer of the great Dark Continent it would be well for all to take to heart. My Lords, it now only remains for me to thank you for listening to me for so long a time; but before I sit down I would point out that the time of my bringing forward these Socialistic questions is singularly appropriate. We are still in the month of May. It was inaugurated, not as the merrie month of May was of old in the days of Merrie England, but by an organised demonstration of labour throughout the civilised world. On the Continent those demonstrations were viewed with alarm; but by the action taken by the Governments all danger was removed, and they have all passed over without the occurrence of any event which there might have been cause to deplore. In our own country also there was a similar and vast trades demonstration sanctioned and escorted by the police. Thanks to the good conduct and order maintained by the people themselves it all passed off in the quietest and most satisfactory manner. But even here, my Lords, words were spoken by one of the Socialistic leaders which showed the spirit in which the demonstrations were got up. Mr. John Burns, when a band passed the platform from which he was addressing the meeting, playing the “Marseillaise,” said, “We can stand the ‘Marseillaise,’ but we could not have stood ‘God save the Queen.’” That shows, my Lords, the spirit which animates some, at all events, of the leaders of the Socialistic movement in this country. But all these matters, to which I have referred for the purpose of showing the spirit which animates Socialism, and what an element Socialism is now in the politics of our country, sink into insignificance compared with the great Labour Conference held at Berlin. Our country was represented there—whether rightly or wrongly I do not pretend to say—but we ought to be thankful that we have come out of it untrammelled and uncommitted, above all, upon the vital question of State regulation of adult male labour. Once pass that line within which adult men are left free to contract for their labour as they like, and we shall take a leap, my Lords, not, indeed, in the dark, but from light into darkness—from the light of sound economic science back into the dark ages of our past legislative economic errors. I trust, my Lords, that that leap will never be taken by the Legislature of this country; and that if any such Bill comes to your Lordships' House I hope you will resist its passing to the utmost, whatever the consequences to your Lordships may be.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, the noble Earl has made a very interesting and somewhat discursive speech. He has called your Lordships' attention to the Poor Law, dating back to the time of Queen Elizabeth, and he has also placed before you a programme of what is to come in the future, as announced the other day by Sir Charles Dilke. But, my Lords, the noble Earl made very few allusions to the subject of the notice which he has placed upon the Paper, namely, to call attention to the Socialistic Legislation of the last two Sessions. The Acts of Parliament to which the noble Lord has alluded are exceedingly few, although he has given a long list of Bills, which are very different things. He has called our attention to the saying of agitators and others, the utterances of men excited at public meetings. He has referred to the writings of lights of the Fabian Society, and of many other authorities on that and other subjects, but he scarcely alluded to the Acts of Parliament at all. Acts which were designed, like the Merchant Shipping Act, and two or three Acts of a similar kind, to protect the lives of men from unnecessary peril, ought not to be called Socialistic measures. Those Acts were so designed, and have, I fancy, proved tolerably successful for the purpose for which they were intended. The noble Earl gave no definition of what he means by Socialistic legislation or of sound political economy. If the noble Lord had only explained what we are to understand by sound political economy, he would have made a valuable contribution to the Debates of Parliament, and to our stock of knowledge, because the writers on political economy at the present day appear to contradict in almost every particular the writers on political economy a quarter of a century ago. The speech of the noble Earl was full of interest; it was also a very feeling speech. I know it affected me, and I think it must have affected your Lordships, to contemplate the mental condition to which the mere spectres which the noble Earl has conjured up have reduced him when he said that, owing to the Socialistic tendencies of the past 25 years, the only pleasure left to him in life was to "call a spade a spade." It is a perfectly innocent amusement, and it has the merit of being absolutely true; but it is a rather dismal kind of pastime for him to indulge in, as the only means of relief from the cares and duties of life. But I think the difference between legislation which might rightly be called Socialistic, and legislation designed to protect people from dangers, physical or other, from which they cannot protect themselves, was sufficiently instanced by what the noble Earl said in reference to the Report of the Committee on the Sweating System. He mentioned the fact that the Committee recommend that women should not be allowed to cut cold iron with an "oliver" beyond a certain weight, and that they should not be allowed to make chains beyond a certain size; and he asked you whether, if you entertain such proposals, you ought not logically to pass an Act of Parliament to prevent housemaids being overburdened by the weight of coalscuttles. As to the suggestion that the size and weight of coalscuttles of the housemaids in your Lordships' houses might have to be regulated, I admit that if there was an overwhelming weight of evidence given before a Committee that the coalscuttles in the noble Earl's house were of such a gigantic size, and that the lifting of them caused physical detriment to the noble Earl's housemaids, I should be of opinion that the noble Earl ought to be restrained in the use of such coalscuttles. I think, my Lords, that is a fair example of the fact that the noble Earl does not seem to draw a proper distinction between Socialistic Acts of Parliament and Acts of Parliament which are really intended to prevent injury being inflicted where injury might and ought to be avoided. I do not venture to anticipate any discussion which may take place at a later date on the Report of the Sweating Committee, and I do not wish to be led into an academic argument upon what is and what is not Socialism or Socialistic legislation; I merely rise to say that it is perfectly true, as the noble Earl has said, that the legislation of the last 25 years has been very different from, say, the legislation of the 25 years preceding it, in the fact that the former legislation was directed to the removal of restrictions, and that of late years it has been found advisable—necessary, as I think—that some restriction should be placed on the liberty of people to injure others. But, after all, that only means that Parliament has recognised that different circumstances require different laws; that the circumstances under which industry was carried on at the present day are not precisely the same as those which existed a quarter of a century ago. I hope that in dealing in that practical way with the problems which present themselves for consideration Parliament will not allow itself to be influenced by the spectres and the bogeys which appear to have so much troubled the mind of the noble Earl.

EARL COWPER: My Lords, I am sure we have all listened with the greatest interest to the speech of my noble Friend in bringing this subject forward. I believe that a great many Members of your Lordships' House who came down last week in the hope of then having that gratification were very much disappointed when the noble Earl thought proper to postpone it. He has made an interesting and able speech, and I hope we may have something of the same entertaining nature from him every year for some time to come. I sincerely hope my noble Friend may live many years in order to give us that gratification. The subject is a most important one. All the great questions of the day which are occupying the minds of thinking men, and which are being taken up by statesmen, involve more or less the question of Socialism. The overcrowding in our great towns, the terrible revelations so simply, yet so clearly and so forcibly, put in the Report of the Sweating Committee, the unnecessary dangers to which our merchant sailors are exposed, and many similar subjects which I need not enumerate, all involve the question as to how far the State is justified in interfering. No doubt it is a sound principle that people ought not to be taught to look to the State for everything; but I think, while repudiating the idea that the State is to do everything, it would be a great mistake to fall into the opposite error that the State is to do nothing. We must, in fact, as we have had to do in so many other cases, steer between two extremes. I will not go into all the points of the interesting speech my noble Friend has made. We have heard his enumeration of the measures which he condemns, and he appears to admit in some degree the principle that everything ought to be considered on its own merits and not according to any hard-and-fast rule, or disposed of by the formula that the State has nothing to do with anything of that kind. He showed fallacies and absurdities in some of those proposed measures, and was quite justified in doing so. But some which he enumerated, like the Bill for the Mitigation of the Law of Distress, for instance, could hardly be called Socialistic measures. On the contrary, the tendency of that Bill was to place the landlord on the same footing as other creditors, and it was a measure rather for repealing former legislation than for enacting new legislation. Neither could the question of the action of the police with regard to meetings in Trafalgar Square, or who is to have the control of the police, whether the Home Office or the County Council, be properly described as a branch of Socialism. But my noble Friend admits the proposition which I am so anxious to lay down, that every question is to be settled upon its own merits, and simply with regard to the point whether that particular legislation on that particular subject will do good or harm. I will take the instance of the Eight Hours'

Question. Everybody who has any knowledge of the terrible state of things which exists, everyone who remembers that in certain cases and under certain conditions persons have to work from 6 o'clock in the morning until midnight for a mere pittance, being thus worn out prematurely in body and mind, must certainly feel that the limitation of labour has, at first sight, something to say for itself. This Eight Hours' Question has, no doubt, obtained a strong hold on the country; and if your Lordships wish to combat such views, it must not be by applying the epithet of "grandmotherly legislation" or by asking what the State has to do with private contracts. Some one must, if it is desired to combat such views, take the trouble to show that that legislation would be positively harmful to the very class which it is intended to benefit. That must be plainly proved. It must be shown clearly that such legislation would probably lead to work being carried on in holes and corners without check, and would have the effect of driving away capital; but it will not do to dispose of the question merely on hard-and-fast lines and by saying that the State must never interfere in the relations between man and man. My Lords, I have only risen to say this: it is utterly impossible for us now to lay down the rule that the State cannot interfere with these things. We have gone a great deal too far in the opposite direction to be able to say that. We are in the midst of things in which the State has interfered in every way. Look, for instance, at the questions which were brought before the Berlin Conference. It had a great effect there when it was shown that in this country the hours of labour are limited, because there is a day of rest on Sunday. What argument is there that can be used in favour of that which cannot be used in other matters which are called Socialistic? Then, again, there is the limitation in the work of women and children by the Factory Act. That is clearly Socialistic, and it would be impossible to go back now. If we compare the far better state of things now with that which existed before Lord Shaftesbury took up the question, we cannot assume that the State is never to interfere. Many things are now made subject to regulation. Even the plying of the hack cabs, by which any of your Lordships may drive from this House, is regulated by the Legislature. The legislation dealing with the truck system, by which people are not allowed to pay those who work for them in kind, and the licensing question of which we are now talking, as if we were going to interfere in it for the first time, though it has always been a matter of regulation, are in the same category. We cannot, therefore, go back to the system which Mr. Herbert Spencer and his followers advocate, of leaving everything to settle itself. We have abandoned that principle long ago. What I maintain is that we must proceed, on the lines we hitherto have followed. And what have been the lines on which we have hitherto proceeded, almost ever since the existence of Parliament? Not to lay down any general principle, but to debate every question on its own merits; to see whether, in the opinion of thinking and experienced men, who know what they are legislating about, the particular measure brought forward will do harm or good. This is the plan we must continue to pursue; and it is only by feeling our way, by doing what is apparently good, what we have every reason to believe is good, and by not going too fast, but steadily and gradually, and if we find we have made a mistake, drawing back and not going upon that line for the future, that we may hope to grapple in some degree with the great problems before us.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, the other day, when I was detained elsewhere, my noble Friend did me the honour of putting off the date for delivering his speech on the subject of Socialistic legislation, because I did not happen to be present in your Lordships' House. I took that as a hint that I am expected to make some observations in this Debate. That is my only reason for trespassing on your Lordships' attention for a few minutes in case my noble Friend, were I to do otherwise, should consider that I was guilty of disrespect towards him. But I fear that, after the two speeches to which we have just listened, I have little to add that would be of use in considering this subject. The noble Earl has brought before us an extraordinary mixture and medley of things; every kind of subject, drawn from every kind of source; some projects which are utterly ridiculous and absurd; others which are open to condemnation; others which are decidedly beneficial; some drawn from Acts of Parliament, some drawn from Bills which very irregularly he discussed, though they are now pending in the other House; some drawn from observations made by gentlemen at meetings in Hyde Park or Trafalgar Square. Well, I can only give very much the same answer to these things that has been given by my noble Friend who has just sat down. I do not think it is our habit in this country to ask how proposals are to be classified before we determine what we are to do with them. We no more ask what is the derivation or philosophical extraction of a proposal before we adopt it than a wise man would ask the character of a footman's grandfather before engaging the footman. What we want to know is the character of the proposal itself, not how it is to be classified; not where it comes from, or what motive has prompted it, but whether it is good or bad, wholesome or unwholesome. As my noble Friend who has just sat down has said, we ought first to discuss every subject on its own merits. It is astonishing how many different ideas are mixed up under this name of Socialism. And I cannot help thinking that, although my noble Friend adds to the gorgeous variety of his speech by the number of subjects which he introduces into it, he only detracts from the force of his arguments by bringing so many different ideas under the denomination of one word. I take Socialism in its strict meaning to be for the State to do that which is usually done by private people for the sake of gain. I believe that that is sometimes a very unwise thing; on the other hand, it is sometimes a very wise thing. There is nothing so Socialistic as the Mint or the Post Office. No doubt my noble Friend is right in saying that at the present day there is a strong leaning towards bringing in the interference of the State on every possible occasion, and I think that is a tendency against which it is right that we should be upon our guard. It is not that we sin against any principle, but that we expect from the State what it cannot possibly do if we impose upon it tasks which it cannot fitly perform or burdens beyond its power; all we shall do will be to create an indefinite source of expense, and ultimately an unlimited cause of corruption and inefficiency. My noble Friend includes in the word a number of things which have nothing whatever to do with Socialism. For instance, many things are now done by the State which were not done before, because we have become much more careful of human life during the last 25 or 30 years, and especially of the lives and interests of those who are defenceless—that is to say, of women and children; but these things have nothing to do with Socialism. New dangers have arisen in consequence of the development and the concentration of our industries, which the State has always acknowledged its bounden duty to meet, and consequently we have had new measures to take to prevent them. But that has nothing on earth to do with Socialism. Then there is another class of measures which my noble Friend alluded to—measures proposed for interfering with grouse and fish—very foolish measures—but there is not the slightest probability, I should say, that they will ever find their way into the Statute Book. They may represent a transitory phase of class antipathy, but they are not Socialism; they have nothing to do with the principle of the State doing what would be much better done by private individuals. Then, again, my noble Friend referred to what he called the robbery and confiscation which has characterised recent legislation, and he referred especially to the legislation with respect to Ireland. I have expressed my opinion too often in this House with regard to that legislation for it to be in the least degree necessary for me now to repeat it. But my noble Friend makes a mistake in mixing that question of legislative honesty in any degree with the question of legislative Socialism. We are accustomed to think that this interference with landlords' rights in Ireland is a specially democratic proceeding, and very indicative of the spirit of the times. I came across the other day—I think it was in some letters which have been published of the Earl of Strafford—an account of the proceedings which took place in that day. There was a nobleman of very large property in

Kent, the Earl of Thanet, who was guilty of what was then called depopulation, but in these days would be called eviction. He did nothing in the least illegal; all he did was to diminish the holdings of his tenants, and to resume his land, but because that had the effect of diminishing the rural population in Kent the Earl of Thanet was had up before the Star Chamber before Archbishop Laud, and was fined £10,000, and that proceeding was very much lauded by the Earl of Strafford. Therefore, my noble Friend will find that the Land League of Ireland, Archbishop Laud, and the Earl of Strafford were all equally guilty of Socialism. I am quite willing to acknowledge the plain and frank-spoken language of my noble Friend when he enumerates the kind of words he would like to attach to spoliation of this character; but I feel that he loses one of the strongest arguments against that kind of legislation when he includes it in a class to which it does not belong, gives to it a philosophical and legislative extraction which cannot be recognised as having really any reference to it, and when he mixes up an attempt—if you will, a blundering attempt—at the solution of some of the most difficult problems of the day with legislation which has nothing in it new or unusual, but which he condemns as an innovation of private rights. My Lords, it seems to me that Socialism is a great mistake, but I do not think it is an irremediable evil. What it really means is spending public money on a useless object. The taxpayers will soon find out that the public money is being wasted on useless objects, and will insist on more economy. No irremediable evil will be the result, only a certain amount of legislative goose-step will have been performed. But I agree with him in thinking that the measures which are adopted in defiance of private right are of much graver significance, and that a much more serious evil follows them. They are destructive of confidence, and consequently the capital which is created each moment as we go on for the purpose of being applied to the industry of the immediate future is prevented from flowing in its true and intended channel; and the industry of the future is starved. My Lords, that is a very great evil which has induced from time to time much of the legislation to which my noble Friend has attached the term Socialistic, but to which it does not really belong. There are several other matters to which the noble Lord has referred. As my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Dunraven) observed there are many spectres and bogeys put forward in my noble Friend's speech. I think he attaches too much importance to words. These are days of words. At the present day everybody reads, writes, and talks more or less and people listen to words and read them without their leaving the slightest trace upon their minds, or feelings, or actions. You will see the most extraordinary doctrines preached, the most extraordinary deductions evolved, the most strange projects unfolded, and yet the public look on and walk by peaceably with the most pleased content as if there was not the slightest danger to the order of things to be anticipated from the intentions expressed. But if you go one inch beyond words it is a different thing. The moment these words take the form of action the public is aroused very quickly, and my belief is that if some of those Socialist schemes, to which my noble Friend referred, could for a short time, be brought into action, they would promote such a vehement reaction that we should hear very little more of them for a long time to come. These fallacies may be trusted to find themselves out. You may trust the nature of things to show that the State must not undertake the work of everybody; you may trust the nature of things to show that legislation must not invade private right or undermine confidence or destroy that reliance on the law by which alone the machinery of capital and industry can be hoped to move. But then there is another suggestion which I would suggest for the consideration of my noble Friend. All this noise and all these proposals have not sprung from nothing. It is not out of mere gaiety of heart that all these absurdities are being introduced in every newspaper and on every platform. There is some cause for it all. It may be that they are quacks who make these Socialistic proposals. I do not in the least interpose to shield the quacks from all the contempt which my noble Friend may pour upon them; but when you see quacks gathering round a bed, however deeply you may despise the quacks, it is probable that the patient lying on the bed is suffering from some serious suffering or some deep disease. The truth is, that these Socialistic proposals indicate great evils, which they are brought forward to remedy, and no one who is not absolutely blind will deny the existence of those evils in the world. There are evils to which the German Emperor testifies in summoning the Conference to which my noble Friend referred. How far we can grapple with them we do not know as yet; but we are bound to give our best energies to the task, and I think we are bound not to be frightened from the clear and upright performance of that duty by the fear that we may be imagined to be yielding to, and misrepresented as, acting upon the sophistries and fallacies which my noble Friend has exposed. Undoubtedly, we have come upon an age of the world when the action of industrial causes, the great accumulation of population, and many other social and economic influences have produced great centres of misery, and have added terribly to the catalogue of the evils to which flesh is heir. It is our duty to do all we can to find the remedies for those evils, and even if we are called Socialists in attempting to do it, we shall be reconciled if we can find those remedies, knowing that we are undertaking no new principle, that we are striking out no new path, but are pursuing the long and healthy tradition of English legislation.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—THE SCHOOLS OF THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the members of the Order of "Les frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes" have been admitted to the position of classed teachers under the National Board in the City of Waterford; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will direct the attention of the Commissioners of National Education to the Report of the Powis Commission, now 20 years old, with a view of making such alterations in their Rules as will, in accordance with that Report, enable the Irish Order of Christian Brothers to obtain State aid for their Primary schools; and whether he is aware that nearly 40 per cent. of the boys for whom results fees have been paid by the Intermediate Education Board during the last three years have been educated by the Christian Brothers in schools primarily intended for the elementary education of the poor; and, if so, whether he will direct the attention of the Intermediate Education Board and the Commissioners of National Education to the necessity of making such alterations in their Rules as will enable the Christian Brothers to obtain the State aid to which their services in the cause of public education entitle them, rather from the funds provided by Parliament for primary education than from the limited amount which ought to be applied to aid Intermediate schools?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It is the case that a body of monks who belonged to the Order of "Les frères des Ecoles Chrétiennes" are the teachers of a National school in Waterford, and also of National schools in other parts of Ireland. These monks, like the Brothers of St. Francis, the Patrician, the Presentation, and the Marist Orders or Communities, have undertaken the charge of National schools upon the rules and conditions applicable to the teachers of all National schools. There are 26 monastic schools at present in connection with the national system of education. Some of these schools have intermediate education departments attached to them. The same opportunities to obtain the grants of the National Board are, of course, open to the Irish Order of Christian Brothers as those availed of by the Christian Brothers of the French Order, and by the monks of the various other orders or communities who are the teachers of National schools. The facts are as stated in the second paragraph of the question; but under the Rules of the Intermediate Education Board, which came into operation at the commencement of this year, results fees are not now payable on boys who pass in primary subjects only.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is there any national or State reason why the Code should not be modified, in order to enable the Christian Brothers to obtain this aid?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Various orders of monks, including the French Order of Christian Brothers, find no difficulty in taking advantage of the public grants and putting themselves under the general regulations of the National Education Board, and therefore I do not see that it is necessary to make a special modification of the Rules in favour of one monastic order.

EVICCTIONS ON THE PONSONBY ESTATE.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that an evicting force of many bailiffs and over 100 policemen, under the command of County Inspector Hogel, proceeded on Thursday last to evict Jeremiah Keohane and family, of Carhergariffe, County Cork, but were debarred from carrying out the eviction owing to the dangerous illness of one of the tenant's family; is he aware that the valuation of the holding is £82, whilst the rent is £110; that Mr. Keohane, being a leaseholder, served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed immediately after the passing of the Land Act, 1887, but that, owing to delay in the Land Courts, the rent was not fixed until last December, and that meanwhile Captain Wheeler served the tenant with an eviction notice under the 7th section of the same Act, thereby breaking the tenant's title to holding; and whether, in view of the many cases of a similar character which have been brought under the notice of the Government, steps will be taken to protect the interests of the tenants either by legislation or other action on the part of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the forces protecting the sheriff and his bailiffs consisted of 40 police, and not 100, as stated in the question. The eviction was postponed in consequence of the illness of one of the tenant's sons. It appears that the man had three farms under a lease, the rents amounting in the aggregate to £109 10s., and the valuation to £82 5s. In respect of one of these farms only did he serve a notice to have a fair rent fixed on the passing of the Act of 1887. In March, 1889, he served a similar notice for the second of the farms, but he served no such notice in respect of the third. The tenancies were terminated as stated, but I am informed that at the time of the intended evictions the agent offered the tenant not to evict if he paid the amount due less 20 per cent., and also offered a permanent reduction at that rate on the annual rent, which, however, the tenant refused. As regards the inquiry in the last paragraph, the necessary legislation already exists. When the application to terminate the tenancies was before the Court, it was open to the man to apply for a postponement or suspension of the proceedings, on such terms and conditions as the Court might direct, until the termination of the proceedings on the application to fix judicial rents.

*MR. FLYNN: In view of the fact that evictions are now taking place in the case of tenants who applied two years ago to the Land Court to have fair rents fixed, and which cases have not yet been heard, cannot the Government introduce a short Act to prevent the evictions from being carried out until the cases have been heard?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is quite impossible to deal by an Act of Parliament with the case (that of the Ponsonby tenants) mentioned by the hon. Member.

Mr. Flynn

MAILSERVICE BETWEEN LEHANMORE AND CASTLETOWNBERE.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he has received tenders for a mail car service between Lehanmore and Castletownbere; whether the sum required for such service is 23s. weekly; whether the present mail service amounts to that sum; and whether he purposes availing himself of the tender for a mail car service, and thereby convenience the public?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to state that I have received a conditional offer to provide for a Mail Car Service between Lehanmore and Castletownbere Haven at the rate of 24s. a week, but I do not propose to avail myself of this offer. There is no official post at present between the places named, but a scheme is under consideration which may possibly admit of a post being afforded by messenger on foot.

LAND COMMISSION—NORTH LEITRIM.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will afford immediate facilities for the return visit of the Sub-Commissioners of the Land Commission to North Leitrim, in order to dispose of the applications for fair rents, some of which have been listed for hearing more than two years?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that they will arrange to send a Sub-Commission to the County of Leitrim as soon as the cases in other counties which remain unheard are brought up to the same date as those disposed of in the County of Leitrim.

OUT-DOOR RELIEF IN MOVILLE.

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many persons received out-door relief in the electoral division of Moville, Innishowen Union, during the 12 months ending March, 1890; and what was the average amount received by such persons?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Clerk of the Union reports that the number who received out-door relief in the electoral division named, and during the period stated, was 28, and the average amount received by such persons was £3 2s. 10d.

SWIFT'S HOSPITAL, DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware, and, if not, whether he will inquire if it is a fact that, although on the 7th November, 1889, it was officially reported to Mr. Richard Owen Armstrong, J.P., a member of the Board of Swift's Hospital (Lunatic Asylum), Dublin, that the funds of the institution had been to a large amount misappropriated by the Secretary, Mr. Newland, and that although Mr. Newland himself reported to Sir Ralph Cusack, J.P., D.L., another member of the Board of Swift's, that he had been guilty of extensive defalcations in the funds of the hospital, the members of the Board of Swift's, at a special meeting held on the 12th November, agreed to allow Mr. Newland to make restitution to the extent of £1,000 of the funds he had fraudulently misappropriated; whether such action of the Board was legal; whether he is aware that, in consequence of this action of the Board, Mr. Newland, on the 15th of November, 1889, lodged in the Bank of Ireland a sum of £1,000 to the credit of the Board of Swift's Hospital; but, being subsequently declared a bankrupt, the Board of Swift's Hospital were obliged to refund the said payment of £1,000; whether the total loss to the funds of Swift's Hospital caused by Mr. Newland's frauds has yet been ascertained; and, if so, what is the total amount of the said loss; can he explain how it happened that it was not until the 7th February, 1890, three months after the discovery of Mr. Newland's frauds, that the members of the Board of Swift's caused informations to be sworn against Mr. Newland, who meantime had absconded, and placed himself outside the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Courts of Justice; and whether the Government proposes to take any action, and, if so, what action in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to refer the hon. Member to my previous statements in regard to this question.

MR. CLANCY: But does not the Coercion Act give the right hon. Gentleman all the control he could require where criminal proceedings have been taking place?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no reason for believing that there has been any crime in the matter.

MR. CLANCY: Is it not a crime for persons in the Commission of the Peace in Dublin to condone the embezzlement of the funds of a charitable institution in Dublin; and is it the fact that these malpractices have been passed over because they were committed by supporters of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If crime has been committed it can be investigated by a proper tribunal.

MR. CLANCY: Is it not the habitual practice of the police in Ireland to swear information upon which the Government take action?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In this case I am advised there is no evidence of a crime having been committed, and under those circumstances there is no necessity for the police investigation.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to give notice that on the first opportunity I will call attention to the matter, and endeavour to show that there is some connection between the Government and the delinquents.

THE REGISTRAR GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Dr. Grimshaw, Registrar General for Ireland, was appointed to that position on the condition of devoting his entire time to the duties of the office; whether he is aware that Dr. Grimshaw holds other appointments of an honorary character, and also holds, and has held since his appointment as Registrar General, other offices for which he does receive, and has received, remuneration, the duties connected with which demand for their discharge a considerable amount of time; whether he is aware that Dr. Grimshaw is at present a member of the Conjoint Committee of the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, and is paid for duties in connection with said position a sum of £40 or £50 per annum; and whether it is the intention of the Irish Government to call upon Dr. Grimshaw either to resign his appointment as Registrar General, or relinquish the office above mentioned, and refrain in future from seeking or accepting any such appointments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Dr. Grimshaw was appointed to the office in question on the understanding that he would undertake and fulfil all the duties of his predecessor. This gentleman holds certain other appointments of an honorary character, and also performs other duties for which certain fees are attached, but these duties do not interfere in any way with the time required for discharging the duties of Registrar General, and the Irish Government see no reason for interfering in the manner suggested by the question.

MR. CLANCY: Is it not quite plain that Dr. Grimshaw has violated the condition of his appointment that he should accept of no other offices?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I understand that that is not so.

POLICE WATCHING IN IRELAND.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on a recent occasion, when the Rev. Father Humphrys, Mr. Sheehy, M.P., and Mr. Cullinane, P.L.G., were standing talking to one another in the streets of Tipperary, two police constables stood immediately behind them and took down their conversation, and that, when Father Humphrys complained, one of the policemen left but the other refused to leave; whether he is also aware that, when Father Humphrys stood speaking with Mr. Gill, architect, of New Tipperary, a constable ordered them to "move on," and, on their refusing, stood about three feet off, listening to their conversation; if he can state what the constable's name was; whether Father Humphrys has complained of insulting conduct on the part of the constabulary, as likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and was told by Inspector Gamble that it was the duty of a constable (who gave his name as Wilson Williams, of the Tipperary Depot) to follow the rev. gentleman; and whether he will inquire into the matters complained of?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the rev. gentleman in question is closely watched by the police in consequence of the leading part he is taking in endeavouring to promote the boycotting of tenants who have paid their rents on the Smith-Barry Estate. On the occasion referred to in the second paragraph, the constable states that he was engaged in requiring a commercial traveller to remove some baggage which was creating a street obstruction, and that he was not aware of the rev. gentleman's presence until accosted by him. The constable's name was Patrick Leonard. The rev. gentleman did not complain of any insulting conduct on the part of the police. He did complain that he was being watched. The District Inspector did reply that the "constable was only obeying orders."

MR. SCHWANN: Is it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to arrest Father Humphrys under the Statute of Edward III.?

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Did one of the constables decline to state where he was stationed, and did the same constable on three occasions give a different name? Did he not further state that he came from the depot, meaning the headquarters at Dublin? Did this constable, whose name is Wilson Williams, follow Father Humphrys about whistling, and was it necessary to remonstrate with him twice before he ceased?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must give notice of those questions.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Having regard to the fact that the constable, whose conduct is impugned, either refused to give his name or gave a false name, will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the proposal repeatedly made from these Benches that, as the uniform of the Irish Constabulary precludes identification, the men should be numbered like the Dublin and Belfast police and the police here?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the numbering of the Irish Constabulary, that is a question which has been often debated in this House, and it is impossible that within the limits of an answer to the hon. Gentleman's question I could cover the whole ground.

MR. MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me an answer, yes or no, whether these men are unnumbered in order to avoid identification?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

LIGHT RAILWAYS—GALWAY AND CLIFDEN.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Mr. Barton reported to the Board of Works his reason for selecting Mr. Price's line, as regards which he had to suggest considerable alterations in the curves and gradients, in preference to a line promoted by an Englishman, which followed the same route, but required no alteration in curves and gradients; and whether the Commission appointed by the present Government to inquire into Schemes for Light Railways in congested districts, and presided over by Sir James Allport, is still in existence; and, if so, why matters relating to Light Railways have been referred to gentlemen appointed by the Board of Works, instead of being referred to that Commission? I have further to ask whether, in view of the fact that the rejected line of light railway in Galway, known as the Coast Line, would pass through the most populous, poorest, and most congested districts in the county; whereas the line selected by Mr. Barton passes through an almost uninhabited and barren district between Oughterard and Clifden, his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. George Morris, a member of the Local Government Board, and a gentleman of considerable local knowledge, and Mr. C. T. Redington, a Deputy Lieutenant of the County, and the Chairman of a Commission for the relief of distress in the congested districts in 1886, gave evidence in favour of the Coast Line?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): (1) The Commissioners of Inquiry, namely—Sir John Bull Greene, Mr. Barton, Mr. Bourke, and Mr. Cotton, were unanimous in reporting in favour of the Galway and Clifden via Oughterard Railway, and gave their reasons for preferring it. (2) As regards the latter part of the question I would point out that by the Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1860, and the Light Railways Act, 1889, the duty of reporting on schemes submitted to Grand Juries, is imposed upon the Board of Works. (3) I believe that the two gentlemen named did give evidence in the direction indicated.

In reply to a further question by MR. MAHONY,

MR. JACKSON said: While negotiations are going on I must ask hon. Members to defer further questions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will an opportunity be afforded to the House of discussing the matter before a final decision is arrived at?

MR. JACKSON: I am unable to promise that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then what are we to gain by postponing our questions?

MR. JACKSON: That is another question I am unable to answer.

THE LABOURERS ACTS.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an application was made to the Guardians of the Cavan Union, six years ago, by 200 labourers to have the Labourers Acts put in force in that union; how many similar applications have been made in other unions in the County Cavan; how many schemes have been drawn up by the Guardians in the different unions of that county; how many cottages have been provided under the Acts in that county; and whether, considering the insufficiency of the present law to provide for the better housing of the labourers, he will expedite the further stages of the Labourers (Ireland) Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the year 1885 representations were made to the Guardians of Cavan Union, seeking for the erection of over 200 cottages; but by reason of informality there was a delay. In 1887 the Guardians received fresh representations and proposed schemes for 85 cottages, of which 23 were approved. With reference to other unions in the County of Cavan, the Local Government Board cannot say how many representations have been made to the Guardians; and as several unions are situated partly in and partly out of the county, they cannot say what portion of the schemes submitted to them related to the County Cavan alone; but they have authorised the erection of 144 labourers' houses in that county, exclusive of the 23 above mentioned in the Union of Cavan.

MR. CLANCY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of the question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the opinions of Her Majesty's Government on that subject are well known.

THE CORK CORPORATION.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that, on the right last occasion for nomination of Governors to the District Lunatic Asylum, the Dublin Corporation sent forward to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the names of 10 of their members, and that the Lord Lieutenant appointed all the gentlemen so named; and, if so, why was a different course adopted by His Excellency in the case of the Cork Corporation; also whether he is aware that the Cork Corporation recently sent forward to the Lord Lieutenant the names of four members of their body (including a Mayor and ex-Mayor of the city) as fit representatives on the Board of Governors of the Lunatic Asylum; and is it a fact that the Lord Lieutenant refused to appoint any one of the four gentlemen named; and, if so, what was the reason for such refusal, and on what principle of selection or nomination does the Lord Lieutenant act in regard to this matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in both questions. The principle acted upon is to promote local representation, so far as this is consistent with the duty thrown on the Lord Lieutenant by Statute of selecting fit and proper persons to serve on the Asylum Board. This principle was not inconsistent with the selection made in the case of Dublin; it would, in the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant, have been inconsistent with the selection of the names sent up in the case of Cork.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that of recent years the authorities of Dublin Castle have invariably chosen from the list presented by the Corporation of Cork either Conservatives or Liberal Unionists to act as Governors of the Asylum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that none of the persons nominated by the Corporation of Cork are fit to be appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot enter into any invidious discussion as to the merits of these gentlemen.

MR. SEXTON: Would not the Lord Lieutenant ease the situation if he were to appoint any of them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a very different proposition from that of accepting the whole number.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why is it that Conservatives know more about lunacy than the Nationalists?

*MR. FLYNN: I may say that among the names sent in by the Corporation of Cork there were those of the present Mayor of that City and the ex-Mayor.

BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General how many appointments have been made to the respective staffs, postal and telegraph, of the Belfast Post Office, upon the nomination of the local postmaster, during the year ending the 31st March ultimo, and how many vacancies exist upon these respective staffs at the present time; whether it is a fact that all vacancies as they arise are filled by the nominees of the local postmaster, to the exclusion of all other applicants, and whether there is any special reason why vacancies as they arise on the establishment of the Belfast Post Office in the future should not be thrown open to competition instead of being at present dependent upon the nomination of a local official; whether the arrangement by which nominations to vacancies on the staffs of provincial offices were confided to local postmasters was intended to apply in cases of offices of the standing of Belfast, or did it only refer to offices in provincial towns of lesser standing, upon the staff of which vacancies seldom arise and where it would be inconvenient or impossible to hold competitive examinations; whether he will consider the advisability of throwing open all existing and future vacancies as they arise upon the respective staffs of the Belfast Post Office to public competition; and if he can state under whose supervision the examination of the nominees of the Postmaster of Belfast to vacancies in the Belfast Post Office hitherto have been held?

*MR. RAIKES: The number of appointments made to the staff of the Belfast Post Office during the year ended the 31st of March last was five on the Postal and 15 on the Telegraph side respectively. At the present time there are 10 vacancies—all on the telegraph side. At Belfast, as at other Provincial Post Offices, vacancies are filled, as a rule, on the nomination of the local postmaster. As regards the remaining points, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I made to a similar question on the 24th of April last. I will merely add that the Committee of 1854, on whose recommendation postmasters nominate to vacancies in their own offices, contemplated no exceptions.

MR. SEXTON: In what other towns are these nominations made by the Post Office Department?

*MR. RAIKES: I may mention off-hand, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham.

REGISTRATION OF COUNTY ELECTORS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that "The Registration of County Electors Act, 1889," expires after the present year, and that great expense and inconvenience will be caused if some alteration is not made early next year in the dates for completing the registers of county electors; and if he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee this Session to consider the best mode of altering the dates for the registration of Parliamentary, Municipal, and County Council electors; or whether he will undertake to introduce a Bill for this purpose?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The question is one of considerable difficulty. If an alteration be made, it must either be in the dates for registration or in the dates for elections both to County Councils and Municipal Councils. In either case an alteration would entail considerable inconvenience, and I am not convinced that under the law as it stands the registers cannot be made out in sufficient time if due diligence be used. The matter is, however, at present under the consideration of the Government.

THE PLATTERS ROCKS.

MR. LEWIS (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is a fact that the London and North Western Railway Company have offered to remove the Platters Rocks in the Holyhead New Harbour to a depth of 25 feet below low-water mark, which according to Sir J. Hawkshaw's estimate would cost about £250,000, on the condition that the Railway Company be allowed to erect a pier in a part of the harbour which is now perfectly useless, and some other small concessions as to the lease on their present premises in the old harbour; and whether the Government would have any objection to state their reasons for refusing to accept that offer?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am unable to accept the accuracy of the hon. Member's description of the offer of the London and North Western Railway Company; but if he wishes to move for copy of the correspondence between the London and North Western Railway Company and the Board of Trade respecting the construction of a deep water pier and the removal of the Platters Rocks in Holyhead Harbour I shall offer no objection.

POOR RATE DEFAULTERS AT GOVAN.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state how many poor rate defaulters there were in the combination of Govan, Scotland, on 20th June, 1889; how many of them subsequently paid their rates; what was the amount due on the said date; and what was the amount ultimately lost to the funds of the combination through defaulters during the year; and also the same particulars with regard to the barony and city parishes of Glasgow respectively?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): On 20th June, 1889, there were in Govan combination, 10,721 defaulters, of whom 1,649 subsequently paid their rates, the amount due was £1,551 ls. 5½d., and the amount lost during the year was £1,301 12s. 9½d. The information as to the barony and city parishes has not yet been received, as these parishes were not included in the question as it originally appeared on the Paper.

THE LOSS OF THE ROHILLA.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the inquiry held on Thursday, the 24th of April, into the circumstances attending the loss of the iron sailing-ship Rohilla, which foundered with all hands, and to the suppressing of certain letters at that inquiry; whether copies of those letters are in the possession of the officials of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, written by Ned Butchers, sailmaker on board the Rohilla, from Pisagua, and dated 15th October, and what steps were taken to ascertain what credence ought to be placed in the serious charges of overloading contained in those letters; whether he was aware that Mr. D. W. McDonald left the Rohilla at Valparaiso, and whether any attempt was made to communicate with him in order to ascertain whether his leaving was in consequence of his refusal to sanction the overloading of the vessel; whether it was mentioned to the Court of Inquiry that the owners of the Rohilla have lost six vessels during the last five years; and whether he has the power to annul the verdict of the Court and to grant another inquiry on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence laid before the Court?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Court found that the Rohilla was lost through striking on a shoal, and not from overloading. Copies of letters from Ned Butchers, sailmaker of the Rohilla, are in the possession of the Board of Trade. They contain allegations of overloading on previous voyages, and the Board would have endeavoured to test their truth, and to place the letters before the Court, had there been any ground for supposing that the loss of the Rohilla was due to overloading. The voyages referred to in the letters were made in safety, and upon the vessel's arrival at Falmouth after the last of these voyages, she was seen by one of the Board's Surveyors, who found she was not overladen. During the five days the vessel remained in Falmouth Harbour, no complaint was made by the sailmaker or any other of the crew. Mr. Fyfe, the gentleman who forwarded copies of Ned Butcher's letters to the Board of Trade, in addressing the Court, requested that these letters should be read, but the Magistrate held that they were not relevant, and could not be received in evidence. The Board of Trade made every effort to communicate with Mr.

Mr. Cuninghame Graham

McDonald, but his wife reported that he would not return to this country for three years. The Board were advised that there would have been no justification for calling the attention of the Court to the loss of other vessels belonging to the same owners. The Board of Trade had no power to annul the finding of the Court, but they could order a rehearing if satisfied that sufficient ground for such a course existed.

"MITCHELL V. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that the Attorney General and Duke of Cambridge have long since advised the claim of the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" to be settled by a substantial payment; and whether that advice has been rejected, and if he could state for what reason; but I beg to postpone the question until to-morrow, and also a further question which I intended to put to the First Lord of the Treasury, namely, whether his attention has been called to the report of "Mitchell v. Regina" in the London Times, 13th of May, and the remarks in the Evening Standard of that day; and whether in consequence of the decision of the learned Judges, he is prepared to introduce a Bill to conserve to officers the promises conveyed to them in Her Most Gracious Majesty's Royal Warrants, which are signed by the Sovereign?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that a letter or petition of grace to Her Majesty the Queen was sent to the Home Office many weeks ago by the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina," praying for many reasons some payment of money withheld by the War Office; whether he is aware that this application was made on the written advice to the suppliant by General Sir Henry Ponsonby, C.G.B.; and whether it is true that the suppliant has been officially informed that the letter has not been forwarded to the Queen?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In December last Colonel Mitchell forwarded to the Home Office a petition of right in the matter of a claim made by him upon the War Office. This was submitted to the Queen in the usual manner, and proceedings followed in the Law Courts. Subsequent to the decision of the Courts, Colonel Mitchell, in February last, sent some printed documents relative to his case to the Home Office, and asked that they might be laid before the Queen, Sir Henry Ponsonby having advised the applicant that documents of this nature could only be submitted to Her Majesty through the Secretary of State. No petition accompanied these papers, and the applicant was informed that his case having been decided by the legal tribunals of the country, it would be improper to lay papers before Her Majesty which were in the nature of an appeal against the decision of those tribunals.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY STAFF.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what are the percentages of increase of salary given the Ordnance Survey Staff in the years from 1883 to 1890, and when was the new scheme of increase of pay communicated to the men?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): If I understand the question of the hon. Member rightly, I may say in reply that there is no regular progressive increase of salary given to the civil assistants of the Ordnance Survey. I stated in my reply to a similar question on the 8th inst. that increase of pay in the Ordnance Survey Department is dependent on increased efficiency, combined with length of service. The average pay in the skilled branches of the Survey is now from 15 to 30 per cent. higher than it was eight or nine years ago. But no new scheme of increase of pay has been proposed, and therefore no such scheme has been communicated to the men.

THE NEW OFFICES IN WESTMINSTER HALL.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if it is a fact that fireplaces without chimneys have been supplied to the new offices off Westminster Hall, now used as the offices for Private Bills; whether it is true that gas fire appliances were placed in them, and whether they have been or can be used; who is responsible for the fireplaces and fittings; and what was the expense incurred in connection with each?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): It is not the fact that fireplaces without chimneys have been constructed to the new offices off Westminster Hall, now used as the Private Bill Offices; but owing to the change in the appropriation of the whole of the rooms in the new building, certain expensive warming and ventilating arrangements, which were originally intended to meet the requirements of the rooms, if used as Committee rooms, were not fully carried out. Some additions are, however, about to be made to the extracting flues, which will enable the rooms to be suitably ventilated for the purposes for which they are now used. It was at one time intended to use gas fires in the new fireplaces; but as the whole of the rooms have now been warmed by steam pipes in the same manner as the rooms recently vacated by the departments now occupying the new rooms, it has been found to be unnecessary to adopt those fires. The Office of Works is responsible for the fireplaces and fittings, and the fact of their having been provided renders the rooms fit for any future occupation in case of change. It is impossible to give the cost of the said fireplaces and flues separately from that of the building, as they were constructed as part of the later, and in that way they certainly cost very much less than would be necessary to form them at a future time if they should be required.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that there are chimneys existing in connection with these rooms which cannot be used?

MR. PLUNKET: I believe that there are chimneys in existence.

DR. TANNER: Are they closed up?

MR. PLUNKET: I think not.

DR. TANNER: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to smother all the unfortunate persons who are obliged to use the Hall?

MR. PLUNKET: I propose to make changes to prevent any inconvenience; and unless I were to climb the chimneys myself, I do not know what more I can do.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Committee, consisting of certain members of the Royal Society, appointed to inquire into the question of Lighthouse Illuminants has yet reported; and, if not, when it is likely to do so?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There has been some unavoidable delay in this matter in consequence of a change that it was found necessary to make in the composition of the Committee; but I have communicated with the President of the Royal Society, and I understand that the Report of the Committee may be expected in the course of the summer.

THE SCIENCE AND ART DRAWING GRANT.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, provided that drawing be satisfactorily taught, teachers holding the general certificate of the Education Department will be, under the New Code, considered eligible, as hitherto, to earn the drawing grant from the Science and Art Department, irrespective of their holding any special certificate in that subject?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): So long as the instruction is satisfactory, I am not disposed, at any rate for some time to come, to insist upon the possession of the drawing certificate by every teacher under Article 85 (b) of the Code; but, where practicable, I hope that managers will avail themselves of the recognition which the Code affords to the peripatetic teacher for this and other purposes.

FRANKING MEMBERS' LETTERS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hunts, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the great amount of time that hon. Members now have to devote to their Parliamentary correspondence, and that, in addition to this, they have not only to go and purchase stamps, but even to affix them to their letters, he will restore to them their ancient privilege of sending their letters free of charge provided that they are written on House of Commons paper, and posted in the House?

*MR. RAIKES: The privilege to which my hon. Friend refers was abrogated by the Penny Postage Act, and he will therefore see it is not in my power to restore it.

MR. JEFFREYS: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the question—whether, after a Member buys stamps, he will give orders to some person to affix them?

*MR. RAIKES: I thought my hon. Friend hardly put that part of the question seriously.

THE CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is yet in a position to state the exact amount owing by the Trustees of the late Cardiff Savings Bank to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, on account of the loss of forfeitures resulting from the omission to enforce signed declarations, and of the large sums invested and drawing interest in excess of the sums the Trustees were entitled to invest?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): A Return of the number of savings banks which had failed between 1852 and 1888, and of the loss to the depositors as far as it could be ascertained, was presented in December, 1888. The Return also stated how the deficiencies were met. Since the date of that Return the following savings banks have been closed, or are in process of closing:—Castle Cary, Dorchester, Macclesfield, and Chelsea. In the first two cases, the Trustees undertook to make good any deficiency there might be; the assets of the Macclesfield Savings Bank exceeded the liabilities; and the liquidation of the Chelsea Bank is still proceeding.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can state how many Trustee Savings Banks have failed since 1852 up to the beginning of last year; in how many of the cases of failure the depositors ultimately suffered loss; how the deficiency was met in those cases where the depositors were paid in full; and what is the total amount of loss sustained by depositors, exclusive of those in the late Cardiff Savings Bank, whose case is still sub judice?

MR. GOSCHEN: No; the exact amount of the sums has not yet been ascertained, but the matter will not be lost sight of.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, now that the Ordnance Survey has been merged in the Board of Agriculture, the Circular issued by Sir Charles Wilson in November, 1887, as to the "new scheme of pay for the Ordnance Survey," still holds good, or whether that Circular is superseded by the Treasury Minute of the 4th February, 1890; and whether it is the case that the men on the Ordnance Survey are in the dark as to their future pay and prospects, in accordance with a rule which does not exist in any other Department?

MR. CHAPLIN: I understand that the Treasury Minute of February 4th, 1890, relates to the Second Division Clerks, and does not apply to the Ordnance Survey; and it is not the case that any Circular was issued by Sir Charles Wilson, in 1887, as to the new scheme of pay for the Ordnance Survey. The men, I am informed, on the Ordnance Survey are in the same position now as to knowledge of their pay and prospects as they always have been.

OUTRAGE IN CRETE.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a telegram in the Evening Standard of 15th May, purporting to come from Canea (in Crete), in which it is stated that a young Christian had been stabbed to death by some Mussulmans near that town; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the truth, or otherwise, of this telegram?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): No such information has as yet reached Her Majesty's Government; but the British Consul will not fail to report the matter by despatch if such a murder has been committed. Murders are not infrequently committed by members of the different factions.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I had intended to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, in consequence of the regulations which will presently come into action in regard to the limits of age for candidates for the higher branch of the Indian Civil Service, there have been strong expressions of opinion in the scientific Press and at the Universities, that the conditions of the examinations for this Service ought no longer to continue to be relatively so unfavourable to candidates whose studies have been chiefly in science as has hitherto been the case; whether he is aware that a Memorial, signed by 50 distinguished graduates of the University of Cambridge, including several heads of houses, many professors, and a large number of Fellows of Colleges, has been presented to the Civil Service Commissioners, in which it is pointed out that the position of the science tripos in their University is now practically on an equal footing with the classical or the mathematical tripos, both from its numbers and from the awards assigned by the colleges to those of their members who distinguish themselves therein; and whether he will endeavour to secure that changes shall be made for admission to the Indian Civil Service such as shall secure more equal prospects of success for those whose chief studies have been in science than are at present accorded in these competitions. At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question.

RATING OF FEU DUTIES.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the intention of the Government to refer the subject of the Taxation and Rating of Feu Duties and Ground Annuals to the Committee now sitting on Town Holdings, &c., on which there is only one Scotch Member, or whether they would consent to refer the subject to a separate Committee next Session, composed to a large extent of Scotch Members?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The taxation and rating of Feu Duties and Ground Annals seem to fall within the terms of the reference to the Town Holdings Committee, and it is manifestly desirable that the Committee which is charged with the consideration of the question generally should be enabled effectively to take up this branch of it. The Government, therefore, propose to move the addition of six Scotch Members to the Town Holdings Committee.

EXTINCTION OF LICENCES.

MR. ARTHUR ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the same disabilities will attach to members of County Councils in dealing with the extinction of licences under the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill, as now attach to Magistrates pecuniarily interested in the trade in dealing with licensing matters?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Bill does not provide for disabilities such as those suggested in the question; but the matter is one which will, no doubt, have to be considered in Committee.

BRITISH AND GERMAN INTERESTS IN AFRICA.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the following extract of a letter from the Marquess of Salisbury to Sir E. Malet, dated 2nd July, 1887, forms the understanding upon which the British and German spheres of influence are defined in East Africa:—

“Baron Von Plessen said that the Imperial Government had started from the idea that England would leave Germany a free hand for the future in the territories south of the Victoria Nyanza Lake, and, without interfering with the territories lying to the east of the Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa, at the back of the German Protectorate, would confine herself to opening up the territories lying to the north of the agreed line:”

and whether, therefore, a line drawn from the south of Victoria Nyanza to the northern extremity of Tanganyika forms the line of demarcation between the British and the German spheres?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: These spheres of influence have not yet been geographically defined, and the understanding in question was general in its terms.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is proposed to surrender the country of the Bamangwatos, to the extent of 100,000 square miles, lying between Damaraland and Lobengula's territory, to Germany, in the negotiations now taking place at Berlin; and, if so, on what ground?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not aware that any such proposal is under consideration.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I should like to ask the right hon. Baronet whether the Foreign Office have had any communication from Mr. A. J. Nicholls, lately returned from that country, and who seems to have entered into some arrangements for concessions on behalf of British interests?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think I must ask the noble Lord to give notice of that question. I cannot give an answer off-hand.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the entire question of the relations between this country and Germany throughout Eastern and South Western Africa is the subject of negotiation at Berlin at the present time; whether he will inform the House what is the scope of Sir Percy Anderson's instructions, or lay these instructions upon the Table of the House; and whether Her Majesty's Government will endeavour that any arrangement that may be arrived at, particularly with regard to South Western Africa, shall be such as will commend itself to the approval of the opinion of the Cape Colony and our other South African Settlements. Will Her Majesty's Government take care to ascertain what the opinion of the colonies are?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Undoubtedly it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to ascertain and to give due consideration to the opinion of the colonies. The communications between Sir J. Anderson and Dr. Kranel at Berlin have had reference to questions both in East and West Africa. The communications are confidential, and no Papers can be laid at present. In any arrangement that affects the interests of the British colonies in Africa, full consideration will be given to their opinions.

MR. BUCHANAN: Is it not the fact that all the difficulties that arose in 1884-5, with regard to Germany in this quarter of the globe, were due to the fact that the English Government were not acquainted with and, therefore, could not give full consideration to, the proposals of the Cape Colony; and will the Government take care on this occasion that they are fully acquainted with the views of the colonists?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Without going formally into the question which has been put by the hon. Member, I think I am correct in saying that I believe the Government are fully aware of the opinions of the colonists.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Seeing the total absence of information the right hon. Gentleman has on the subject, and in view of the great interest taken in it, will he see that the House has an opportunity of discussing the matter before a definite decision is come to with the German Government?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman knows how these things are done. While there is every disposition not to undervalue the great interest taken in this question, it is manifest that while negotiations are pending, discussion is not conducive to success.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether the Government will take care to ascertain the views of other people in Africa with regard to the contemplated proceedings before a criminal conspiracy is entered into by two great Powers to plunder the people of Africa?

[No answer was given.]

INDIAN COUNCIL BILLS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I had intended to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the amount of Council Bills sold since the commencement of the present financial year; what proportion is this amount of the whole of the current year's estimate; under whose advice has Her Majesty's Secretary of State forced on the market so much larger a proportion of the year's drawings than is needed for the current requirements of the India Office, and what is the present amount of the cash balances in the Home Treasury of the India Office? but, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, I will postpone the question.

SCOTCH CENSUS RETURNS.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will make arrangements in order to make the expressed desire of about 50 School Boards in Scotland, representing a population of over 800,000, to make the Census Returns of all children under 14 years of age available for School Board purposes, no addition to the existing schedules being required and no additional cost incurred, the School Boards being willing to pay for copies of the particulars required, or to make copies themselves, under such conditions as would not affect the confidential character of the Returns?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Census Returns are obtained for statistical purposes only. The information given on the householders' schedule is of a confidential character, and it is clear that if permitted to be used in the manner proposed this character would be destroyed and great difficulties would be thrown in the way of obtaining accurate Returns. I understand that this proposal was put before the Committee on the Census, whose Report is now, I believe, about to be presented.

COMMANDER ANNESLEY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has yet received any Report from Admiral Sir W. Dowell, K.C.B., as to the inquiry held into the conduct of Commander Annesley on board the Icarus; and whether he can state the result of such inquiry?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Report has been presented, and is now under consideration. If the hon. Member will repeat the question on Thursday next, I shall be able to answer the second part of it.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I will repeat it on Thursday.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether as regards Civil Service writers, considering that the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments had confined their deliberations to general propositions, and recommended that the writer system be put an end to without saying in what manner, and had not specifically considered questions of adequacy of pay, holidays, sick leave, and other grievances of which the writers complained, the Treasury would now do so, and formulate a scheme for the permanent settlement of the case, which had been left in a transitory state by the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and which that Minute itself stated would be done as soon as the Government had arrived at a decision upon certain ulterior questions appertaining to the Civil Service then about to come before them, which had since been disposed of?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot agree that the Royal Commission confined their deliberations respecting the copyists to general propositions, or left the questions of pay and other matters open. On the contrary, they stated that they could not report that the copyists had established any grievance which it is the duty of the State to remedy. Nor can I admit that the Treasury Minute of 1886 left the position of the copyists in a transitory state. It dealt with all the questions raised respecting the copyists. The only words which can give colour to the hon. Member's contention are "pending ulterior arrangements." These words referred to the fact that the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments were then sitting, and doubtless any recommendations of that Commission would have received the respectful attention of the Government, but the Commission really confirmed the settlement made by the Treasury Minute of 1886.

THE LATE GENERAL SIR W. JONES.

SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for War with reference to that part of the Queen's Regulations of 1889, which specifies that

"Officers are not interred with Military honours unless they are at the time of their decease on full pay, or employed on the Staff, or in the exercise of some Military command or office;"

whether General Sir William Jones, G.C.B. (who was in command in the capture of Delhi, the turning point of the great Mutiny), was, at the time of his decease, Colonel of the Duke of Connaught's Light Infantry, and in receipt of the pay of £1,000 a year; and whether he was therefore entitled to a Military funeral? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman I will postpone the question until to-morrow.

LOSS OF THE CAMELIA.

SIR E. WATKIN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade if inquiry will be made into the circumstances of the loss of the fishing boat Camelia (232), believed to have been run down by a steamer between Dungeness and Folkestone in the night of the 8th May, the master, Donaldson, and the two fishermen, the brothers Harris (being the crew) having apparently lost their lives, as their bodies have not been recovered, nor have any tidings of them been received; if the Bremen steamer the Trave, bound east, and the west bound steamer Essequibo, were passing the point of accident at about the same time; and if he is aware of the many narrow escapes of fishing boats in the Channel, and of the reckless speed and course adopted by the foreign steam liners?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The question of directing an inquiry in the case of the Camelia must depend upon the possibility of obtaining evidence of the facts. The German steamer Trave and the British steamer Essequibo are believed to have been in the vicinity at the time of the accident, and inquiries have been set on foot to ascertain whether either of them was in collision with the Camelia. I am not aware that foreign steam vessels are especially dangerous to fishing boats in the English Channel.

LITERATURE FOR WORKHOUSES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether Boards of Guardians may legally spend a portion of the poor rate in supplying the inmates of workhouses with newspapers, periodicals, and books; and, if so, whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the extent to which these bodies have availed themselves of this particular power?

*MR. RITCHIE: Boards of Guardians are empowered to defray out of the rates the cost of supplying the inmates of workhouses with newspapers and periodicals and books. I have directed that the Inspectors of the Local Government Board shall be instructed, in connection with their visits to workhouses, to give this subject their special attention, and to report to the Board as to the views and practice of the Guardians with respect to such supply.

ORDNANCE MAPS OF SOMERSET.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when the Ordnance Survey maps on the one-inch scale are likely to be published for the County of Somerset; and whether, seeing that the existing maps on that scale are 80 years old, he will take steps to accelerate the publication of the new maps?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am afraid it is impossible to fix a date for the completion of the Ordnance Survey maps of Somerset on the one-inch scale; but the engraving of the one-inch map of England is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. Engraving is a slow process, and the supply of engravers is limited. The Director General, however, is aware of the defective nature of the old one-inch map of the south-western counties of England, and is taking steps to expedite the publication of the new map. I may add that Somerset has recently been published, both on the 25-inch and the six-inch scales.

METROPOLITAN POLICE SUPER-ANNUATION.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, after payment of the £150,000 proposed in the Local Taxation Duties Bill in aid of the Metropolitan Police Superannuation Fund, the total annual amount allowed for the superannuation of the Metropolitan Police will be larger than at present; and, if so, by how much?

MR. MATTHEWS: The annual amount allowed for superannuation grows automatically year by year, as more constables become entitled to pension under the existing scale; but there will be no augmentation of that amount as a necessary consequence of the proposed grant of £150,000, or before Parliament has had an opportunity of considering the whole question.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MEETINGS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉES.

MR. A. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any Order or Regulation which prohibits, regulates, or interferes with the holding of meetings by those employed in the Customs and Excise, or any other Department under the control of the Treasury; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of any such Order or Regulation?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that any such Order exists.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: May I ask the Postmaster General whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Order or Regulation as to the holding of meetings by those employed in the Post Office which was in existence before the Order or Regulation now in force?

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I ask whether it is under the new Order or an old one that a procession of postmen was interfered with by the police on Friday evening last?

*MR. FLYNN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask him if he will endeavour to make himself audible to this part of the House?

*MR. RAIKES: The question of the hon. Member for Shoreditch (Mr. Cremer) is already on the Paper addressed to the Home Secretary. With regard to the first question, I have no objection to lay on the Table a copy of the Order in question if the hon. Gentleman will move for it.

THE STEAMSHIP HESPER.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any inquiry will be made as to the circumstances under which the West Hartlepool steamship Hesper, 1,069 tons, which sailed from Barry with a cargo of 2,277 tons of coal on the 30th January last, was lost on its voyage to Genoa, together with its crew of 21 hands?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; an inquiry has been ordered.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the fact that several men are now employed in the Science and Art Department at South Kensington who have been hired through Messrs. Waterlow & Sons; if so, whether Messrs. Waterlow & Sons are paid at the rate of 1s. per hour by the Government in respect of every such man's service for the normal official day, and of 1s. 6d. per hour for overtime; whether Messrs. Waterlow & Sons are permitted to make a profit of 3d. and 6d. per hour respectively out of the work of every such man so hired to the Government through their agency; and, if so, on what ground this system of obtaining clerical labour for the Public Service has been adopted, as it is in direct opposition to the advice of the Playfair Commission of 1874; whether it is the fact that, of the Civil Service writers in the Department in question (many of whom have served from 10 to 17 years and who are in receipt of only 10d. an hour with the bonus of 1d. a day per year) as many as 45 out of 85 were recommended by the heads of their Departments for promotion to the Lower Division, in accordance with the terms of the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and that these recommendations have been, with two or three exceptions, ignored by the Treasury; and if he will state the reasons for which these recommendations of nearly 40 public servants of long standing and admitted merit have so been ignored?

*MR. CREMER: Have the Government arrived at any conclusion in regard to the appointment of a Committee, which they more than half promised me last Session, to inquire into the whole system of the employment of persons in Government Offices and allowing them to be sweated by contractors?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that 13 law stationers' clerks are temporarily employed at South Kensington, and that Messrs. Waterlow receive 1s. per hour for their services, but none of them are employed on overtime at 1s. 6d. an hour. I have no cognisance of the arrangements between Messrs. Waterlow and the men. The employment is purely temporary, to meet a pressure of work, and is in accordance with recognised regulations. I have always felt it necessary to decline to discuss the confidential recommendations made by Departments as to the promotion of copyists. The recommendations made by heads of Departments were not ignored by the Treasury; on the contrary, every case was carefully considered.

*MR. CREMER: Are we to understand from the reply which has been given that Messrs. Waterlow are permitted to deduct in one instance 3d., and in another 6d., per hour out of the work of the men hired for the Government through their agency?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that 13 law stationers' clerks were temporarily employed at South Kensington, and that Messrs. Waterlow received 1s. per hour for their services. The Government have no cognisance of the arrangement between Messrs. Waterlow and their men.

*MR. J. KELLY: I beg to give notice that when the Vote for the moneys to be paid to Messrs. Waterlow is taken, I will move its reduction by the amount payable to them in respect of this sweating contract between the Government and themselves.

POOR'S LAND AT BETHNAL GREEN.

MR. J. KELLY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council whether it is the fact, as reported in the Morning Post of the 15th instant, that the Charity Commissioners have decided on directing a poll to be taken on the question of the alienation of the Poor's Land at Bethnal Green from the purposes for which it was given?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Charity Commissioners propose shortly to republish the draft scheme already published for the Bethnal Green Poor's Land so revised as to afford an opportunity to the inhabitants of the parish of Bethnal Green of expressing their opinion on the questions raised by the first publication of the draft scheme. The draft scheme, as revised, will not involve any expenditure out of the rates; and in view of the special difficulties which this case presents the Commissioners are not prepared to re-consider the matter until the draft scheme has been so re-published. The delay in this matter has been caused by the number and importance of the representations, oral as well as written, which have been made to the Commissioners as the result of the original publication of the draft scheme, and by the difficulty which the Commissioners have experienced in coming to a conclusion upon the conflicting opinions thus presented to them.

THE WATER COMPANIES AND THE RE-VALUATION OF PROPERTY IN LONDON.

MR. J. KELLY: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the quinquennial re-assessment of property in London, which will come into force in 1891, and will give the Water Companies power to exact an increased charge for their supplies, he can give the House any assurance that he will introduce a Bill during the present Session for the purpose of suspending the powers of the Water Companies to increase their charges for water consequent upon such increase in the assessment, and so prevent such companies from being in a position to force up the prices at which their undertakings will have to be purchased eventually by the London County Council?

*MR. RITCHIE: The powers to which my hon. Friend refers are powers conferred by Statute on the Water Companies, and cannot, I think, be dealt with alone. The matter is one which should be considered in connection with the whole question of water supply. I need hardly say we can hold out no hope of dealing with so difficult a question during the present Session.

PROCESSIONS OF POSTMEN.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state by whose authority processions of postmen, proceeding to a meeting in Clerkenwell Green, on the night of Friday, the 16th, were interfered with by the police, and forced to break up; by what authority a bill, purporting to be from the Postmaster General, warning men from attending the meeting, was issued; and if a postman is in any way subject to such discipline as authorises his superior officers to order him not to attend a meeting out of working hours?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: May I ask why, on the same evening, a procession of gas stokers was broken up by the police at Mile End?

MR. MATTHEWS: With reference to the last question, perhaps the hon. Member will give notice of it. It was by my authority that processions of postmen were not allowed by the police to proceed along Oxford street or any of the thoroughfares in which the passage of a procession at night must necessarily cause inconvenience and even danger to the public, especially on an occasion when a celebration in the city was likely to bring unusual crowds into the streets. The bill purporting to be from the Postmaster General was issued by the authority of my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General. An order prohibiting Post Office servants from holding meetings outside the Post Office building for the discussion of official questions has been in existence since March, 1866. This order was relaxed by my right hon. Friend in April last, by a Circular in which he allowed such meetings, subject to specified conditions. The Post Office, like any other employer, is entitled to prescribe conditions on which the servants of the Department will be retained in the Service.

MR. A. WILLIAMS: May I ask whether the Order of 1866, said to be more stringent, has ever really been enforced at these meetings?

MR. CREMER: I would ask, on what ground does the Postmaster General claim to prohibit meetings of working men after their hours of employment; whether such is a Constitutional course of proceeding; and why he has taken refuge behind the rules and regulations framed by his predecessors?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Is Oxford Street, like other neighbourhoods, prohibited to processionists? I also desire to know whether it is the intention of the Home Secretary, if he remains in office long enough, to close all the main arteries of London to processionists.

MR. MATTHEWS: It is my intention to prevent, as long as I possibly can, public inconvenience and danger being caused by processions, or in other ways. As to the action of previous Postmasters General, I must ask hon. Members to give notice of their questions.

MR. C. GRAHAM: Is it not the fact that the procession was a small one of 200 men, which could not obstruct the traffic?

MR. MATTHEWS: I had no reason to believe that the procession would be a very small one. It was represented to me that it would be a very large one.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Does the right hon. Gentleman contend that all processions necessarily interfere with the comfort of the rest of the public?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must decline to argue such general questions.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Would the right hon. Gentleman tell us if there are two sets of rules, one for processions of working men, and one for the Lord Mayor's procession?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Lord Mayor's procession is of immemorial standing. If it had to be considered de novo, I do not know what view might be taken. At all events, the Lord Mayor does not have his procession at night.

*MR. CREMER: I addressed a very respectful question to the Postmaster General, to which he has not deigned to reply. I shall put it down for another day, and when the Estimates for the Post Office come under discussion I shall move the reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary, with a view of registering a protest against what I believe to be his most un-Constitutional abuse of power.

IRELAND—THE TREASON FELONY PRISONERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department has he since had an opportunity of reading the Blue Book on the treatment of Mr. John Daly and the other treason felony prisoners; and will the suggestion as to transferring them to another prison be considered?

MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon. and learned Member is referring to the suggestion of the Roman Catholic Chaplain, contained in the last paragraph of the Report, that certain of the treason felony prisoners should be removed for reasons of health, this suggestion was not endorsed by the Medical Officer. The Visitors state that, after prolonged inquiry, they see no reason for concurring in it, and the Prison Commissioners inform me that, in their judgment, there is no necessity at present of acting upon it.

With regard to the removal of prisoners convicted in Scotland, I am still in communication with the Scotch Office on this subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will call attention to this matter on Report. May I ask if the Vote on Account will be taken this week?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope it will be taken before the holidays.

LICENCES—CASE OF MR. D. M'NAMARA.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that Mr. Denis M'Namara, of Ennis, County Clare, was deprived of his licence by Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., and other Stipendiaries, because he refused to give an undertaking not to sell United Ireland; that, on an application to the Queen's Bench and to the Court of Appeal in Ireland, it was found impossible to review this decision; and will it be possible to deprive a vintner of the right to compensation by Government Stipendiaries after the new Bill is passed in cases of this kind?

*MR. RITCHIE: I know nothing personally of the circumstances to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers, but I understand from my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the facts are not as stated in the question. I may say, however, that the Bill does not provide for the payment of compensation to any holder of a licence who is refused renewal by the existing authorities.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman contend that Mr. M'Namara was not deprived of his licence by Mr. Cecil Roche, and that there was not an appeal?

*MR. RITCHIE: I contend nothing of the kind. I say I know nothing beyond the reply I have given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would like to ask the Chief Secretary what are the facts in the question which he disputes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that, in the first place, the hon. Gentleman is wrong in supposing that Mr. M'Namara's licence was opposed for refusing to give an undertaking not to sell United Ireland. I understand it was opposed for an offence under the Licensing Act. It was not done, as the hon. Gentleman would seem to imply, by Mr. Cecil Roche sitting as a Resident Magistrate, but by the Magistrates in Quarter Sessions; though, no doubt, Mr. Cecil Roche was on the Bench. The matter did not come before the Court of Appeal, but it did come before the Court of Queen's Bench; and I believe, in the fourth place, that the licence was not opposed after it had been suspended for a year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It did come before the Court of Appeal, and that will give us the measure of the right hon. Gentleman's accuracy in the other points he has dealt with.

VALUATION OF LICENSED PREMISES.

MR. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the system of valuing licensed premises by the Inland Revenue Department for the purposes of Probate and Succession Duties, set forth in the Return just distributed to Members, has ever received the sanction of any legal tribunal, or has ever been questioned in a Court of law; and whether, if it simply represents the views of the Department, those views have been in any way modified by the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield?"

MR. GOSCHEN: The practice of the Inland Revenue is based on the well-settled rule of law that goodwill forms part of the estate of deceased persons, and that the goodwill of a public house passes with the public house. This practice has never been questioned in a Court of Law. I must remind the hon. Member that it is the executors or other accountable persons who bring in the capital and annual values into the affidavit and Succession Duty accounts, and that the business of the Department is to check what is thus brought in. The practice has been to assume that the licence will continue. No question on the subject has been raised since the decision in the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield."

LEGAL BUSINESS IN ANGLESEY.

CAPTAIN VERNÉY: I desire to ask Mr. Attorney General whether he will include Act 2 and 3 Edw. 6, c. 54 (local), for the keeping of the Sessions and county days of the Isle of Anglesey, in Beaumaris, in the First Schedule of the Statute Law Revision [H.L.] Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It would not be possible to include the Act referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the Statute Law Revision Bill for the present Session. It is antecedent to the period covered by those Bills, and the Committee have expressly determined not to include any Acts in the Schedule to the Bill which have not already been submitted to the Statute Law Revision Committee.

THE CENSUS OF 1891.

MR. ARTHUR ACLAND: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can say when the Report of the Departmental Committee on the Census of 1891 will be laid upon the Table?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We hope that the Report will be presented during the course of this week, and no time will be lost in laying it on the Table.

THE COMMITTEE ON SWEATING.

MR. C. GRAHAM: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to act upon the suggestions of the Committee on Sweating, or to give facilities for a Debate on the Report of that Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on the 8th inst. to the hon. Member for Camberwell; and, having regard to the wish of the Government to deal with the question of factory legislation, I am unable to promise facilities for a Debate on the Report of the Sweating Committee.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: The right hon. Gentleman is a kind-hearted man, and I would ask him whether, in view of the fact that in that Report is to be found statements that would be almost incredible were they not statements that were made on oath before the House of Lords—statements so strong as to be an indictment on our civilisation—he will not promise facilities for the discussion of a matter of such great public interest?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman is aware that we desire to deal with the matter by legislation as far as we possibly can. Some of the points mentioned in the Report will be dealt with in the Bill relating to factory legislation, and I trust that hon. Gentlemen opposite will be kind-hearted enough to give facilities for that Bill passing.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: I never obstructed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Will the Government give facilities for the carrying of that Bill by dropping some of those Bills they have already brought in?

[No answer.]

THE EDUCATION VOTE.

MR. POWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in order to consult the convenience of hon. Members, he will undertake not to bring on the Vote for Elementary Education until after the Whitsuntide holidays; and whether he will, in due course, name a day for that purpose with adequate notice?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Adequate notice will be given before the Vote for Elementary Education is taken, and it will not be dealt with before Whitsuntide.

THE BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Report of the Berlin Labour Conference will shortly be laid before the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the Report of the Berlin Labour Conference will be laid before the House about the middle of next week.

THE SILVER PLATE DUTIES.

MR. CAUSTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to the notices sent to licensed dealers in plate with regard to the claiming of drawback, whether he intends to adhere strictly to the terms of the notice that all claims must be filled up and sent by post to Somerset House on or before to-morrow, otherwise no claim for drawback will be admitted; whether he is aware that the forms of request were received in Sheffield as late as Saturday last, and that considerable inconvenience has been occasioned to manufacturers and their employés to get the information together, and that it will be in many cases almost if not quite impossible to furnish the information by to-morrow?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Out of 14,000 cases there have only been three in which that point has been raised. I will see what can be done in the case of Sheffield, but I have no doubt that generally the order will work smoothly and successfully, and I will see what can be done in individual cases.

SUPERANNUATION IN THE ARMY.

*COLONEL HUGHES: May I ask when the Government propose to introduce the Bill referred to on the 21st April as about to be introduced in a few days relating to superannuation in the Army?

*MR. GOSCHEN: To-morrow.

THE BEHRING SEA SEIZURES.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has seen in the newspapers a cable from Ottawa that, prior to the prorogation of the Dominion Parliament on Friday, Sir John A. Macdonald, in answer to a question as to the result of the discussion at Washington with reference to the Behring Sea seizures, said that—"He was unable to give any definite information with regard to the fisheries negotiation; a message had arrived from England which the Ministry could not understand, and he had written for an explanation, which had not yet arrived; and that Mr. Charles Tupper was on his way home from Washington;"

whether the return of Mr. Tupper indicates the close of the negotiation, and whether he will communicate to the House the terms of the message which the astute Prime Minister of the Dominion and his Ministers cannot understand.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The return of Mr. Tupper to Canada does not indicate the close of the negotiations. The message has since been explained by a later telegram. It did not relate to the Behring Sea negotiations.

SUPERANNUATION.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: May I ask whether a Return showing the superannuation in all Departments of the State will be laid on the Table before the Committee stage of the Local Taxation Bill?

MR. MATTHEWS: A Return similar to that presented by Mr. Hibbert, but fuller, will be presented. It has been in course of preparation for some days, and will be laid on the Table shortly.

BONDING OF SPIRITS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the letter, dated the 16th of May, to a Scotch gentleman named Ramsey, respecting the bonding of spirits, from his Secretary, was written by his directions? It states that he is afraid the Bill for the bonding of spirits cannot be introduced at present.

MR. GOSCHEN: Of course, it is impossible to say whether such a Bill can be introduced or not. It is a very difficult subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Seeing that the Whitsuntide holiday is only to last three days, and it takes one day to go to the North of Scotland and another to return, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will not withdraw the Whitsuntide holidays altogether, except Whit Monday, and give us three days at the end of the Session instead?

MR. DILLON: On what day does the First Lord of the Treasury propose to take the Vote on Account?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be convenient that I should say that, in the event of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill not being passed through Committee to-night, I shall to-morrow ask the House to give precedence to it over all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion until the Bill is passed into law. The Vote on Account will follow the conclusion of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and must be taken before the holidays. As to the question of the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont), I should be sorry if he were deprived of his holidays; but I will take notice of his recommendation.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to give notice that in the event of the right hon. Gentleman moving for precedence I shall oppose the Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in 1885, when the Spirit Resolutions were before the House, it was the 8th of June before it was proposed to read the Budget Bill a second time? It is now only the 19th of May; and seeing that the question is interwoven with several Bills I would ask, what is the hurry in May, 1890?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that it would be exceedingly unwise for us to follow that bad precedent.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean by a bad precedent the turning out of the Government on this question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I invite the right hon. Gentleman to endeavour to accomplish that purpose.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state when the Irish Land Bill will be dropped?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If it will relieve the mind of the hon. Member I may tell him that it will not be dropped.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON
(SUPERANNUATION) BILL.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I wish to ask the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) whether he intends to-night to take a stage of the London School Board (Superannuation) Bill?

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I certainly shall if I possibly can.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury grant any facilities for its discussion? It is strongly supported by the teachers, and the opposition to it is rapidly diminishing.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly, Sir; if the House passes our measure we shall be very pleased.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: As the opposition now comes almost solely from the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell), will the right hon. Gentleman use his influence with his supporters to induce him to let the Bill pass?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will make inquiries on the subject.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Henry Harrison, esquire, for County of Tipperary (Mid-Tipperary) Division.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act to amend the Open Spaces Act." [Open Spaces Bill [Lords.]

MOTIONS.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACTS (CONSOLIDATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ritchie, Bill to consolidate the Acts relating to Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings and the Housing of the Working Classes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Secretary Matthews, and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 285.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL.—(No. 231.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Postponed Clause 4.

(5.5.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to move to insert, after "ninety," in line 9, page 2, "in England and Scotland, but as regards Ireland, after the passing of any Act relating to Local Government in Ireland." I understand that some of the Scotch Members find considerable fault with my Amendment, on the ground of its moderation—that it does not extend to Scotland. Personally, I cannot go into a discussion I do not understand, and therefore, I have confined my Amendment to Ireland. I hope that even at the eleventh hour the Government will give us some assurance as to the way in which they propose to conduct this measure. Let me put before the Chancellor of the Exchequer the position in which the Irish Members find themselves. We have before us a Bill brought in in a manner in which no other Bill has ever been introduced before, because in its Preamble the Bill sets out that we grant Supply to Her Majesty; but in another clause it provides that the moneys shall be dealt with as Parliament may hereafter determine by Act of Parliament of the present Session. Then the Bill speaks of two Bills, neither of which has yet passed, namely, the Land Purchase

Bill and the Bill relating to Local Government in Ireland. Irish Members intend to support this Amendment, in order to relieve themselves from this triple embarrassment. We protest against a Budget Bill containing clauses relating to Local Government; we protest that when it does so contain them we should be referred to a Bill to be dealt with in this present Parliament, a Bill which may never become law, a Bill which, even if it does become law, refers us to two other Bills which may never become law, namely, the Land Purchase Bill and a Bill not yet introduced, a Bill for Local Government in Ireland. We are confronted with three Bills—the Probate Duty Bill, the Land Purchase Bill, and the Bill for Local Government—and we are asked to give a tax to the Government on the contingency of the three Bills passing, two of which have only been read a second time, and one of which has only been promised in the Queen's Speech. I hope that light may penetrate the mind of the Government on this point, at least so far as Ireland is concerned. The position the Government has taken up is absolutely unexampled. I challenge them to produce a single precedent for anything that has been done in regard to this Bill. It is surprising no one has ventured to consult Mr. Speaker as to whether such embarrassment has ever before been placed in the path of private Members. Personally, I believe the embarrassment has been designedly created by the Government. Now, I desire to address myself to the more immediate matter of the Amendment. I have not had the opportunity of consulting my Colleagues on the point; but I heard with considerable satisfaction the statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary were good enough to make on Friday night. That statement tended to some extent to alleviate our position, and, accordingly, I welcomed it. But we want to know before we assent to these taxes how much further the Government are prepared to go? Are they, for instance, prepared to enable us to have the Corporations who are to have the disposition of the money elected upon a franchise similar to that on which the County Councils in England and Scotland are elected? If the municipal franchise in Derry, Belfast, and other towns is reduced, so that the Corporations can be popularly elected, the position will be vastly improved so far as the towns are concerned. I wish the Government to understand that I, speaking for myself, do not at all reject the suggestion which has been made. On the contrary, I think it is a matter which in principle we might fairly be inclined to admit if the Government will consent to reduce the franchise in Ireland to the level of the franchise in England and Scotland. Then we come to the consideration of the more important question, the question of the counties. We are asked to agree to this tax, although we are placed in a position that Englishmen and Scotchmen are not placed in. Englishmen and Scotchmen address themselves to the consideration of this question, knowing that Local Government prevails in their counties and boroughs, and that if the tax be inequitable, and they object to it, they will get value for the cash they have paid. That is not the case with us, and I should have imagined that before the Government proposed or attempted to carry a tax like this, in face of the Irish people, they would have made some effort to redeem their pledges on the question of Local Government. It is now 10 years since the first real pledge on the subject of Local Government was given; Local Government was promised in the Queen's Speech of 1880. It is now 1890, and the same pledge is given almost in the same terms. I can carry my mind back to the glorious time of Conservatism in Ireland, when the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther) was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. That right hon. Gentleman went the length of introducing a Bill to create Local Government, so that, so far as the legislative history of the question is concerned, Local Government in Ireland is as old as the hills. Yet we find the Government proposing the imposition of a tax in regard to our country, while any advantages resulting from it are made dependent upon the existence of a system which, as yet, does not prevail in Ireland. I admit also, for myself, that my position is, to some extent, illogical. My objection to the tax is not so much as a Customs Tax as an Excise Tax. I would prefer to see the Customs Tax increased instead of reduced. I do not want to see German spirits at 9d. introduced, while Irish spirits are taxed at the rate of 4s. or 5s. Having said that much, let me point out to the Government that as they have refused to carry out the policy laid down by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), the policy of similarity and simultaneity, there is no reason why we in Ireland should be embarrassed simply because of a little Customs difficulty. I do not think we need contemplate any smuggling, especially if we adopt the word hogshead—men cannot carry hogsheads in their waistcoat pockets. Now, I should like to know why the Government will not let us see their hand, their trumps, on the question of Local Government? Why do not they, at any rate, introduce their Bill? In 1886 the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington said—

"Why deal with these trumpery questions now, when next year you shall have the Bill which shall enable you to deal with all these local taxes."

That is four years ago. Are we to put any faith in the words of Ministers and noble Lords? And if we cannot believe the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, what faith are we to put in the statements of the Chief Secretary for Ireland? The noble Lord has never gone about abusing the Irish Members; he has always treated them with courtesy and respect; and if I may institute a comparison between the two Gentlemen, I would certainly as soon believe the noble Lord as the right hon. Gentlemen. I will make a practical suggestion to Her Majesty's Government. Let them introduce their Local Government Bill, which everybody is anxious to pass. It will meet with no opposition if it is anything like the Bills which were passed for England and Scotland. It will have the blessings of the distinguished Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; it will have the support of those enlightened Tory democrats the Members for South Belfast, North Armagh, and North Antrim. Let the Government for the moment drop the Irish Land Purchase Bill, which no one is anxious about, which only takes up time, and the money to be divided by which is not required—because they have £5,000,000 of the Ashbourne Act money unspent—and bring in a non-contentious measure of Local Government. If this were done, instead of continuing the wrangle as we have been doing for a considerable time past, everybody will be satisfied. The Tory Press, which is so anxious to confer Local Government upon Ireland, would be delighted. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) would be pleased, and the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) would be very well satisfied also. The three Parties would lie down in amity and friendship together. We all know it is simply want of time that prevents such a measure being brought in. Let me now point out some of the inconveniences which must arise if the Government do not adopt this suggestion. They are manifold. In the first place, we shall have to vote this money blindfold. We do not know how it is to be spent. I am told it is to be placed in an account; but we shall not be able to look at the account and see how the money is going. Perhaps the Government are going to spend the money on the police in Ireland and extra battering-rams. Perhaps they are going to lend it to the hon. Member for South Hants (Mr. Smith-Barry)—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must invite the hon. Member to address himself to the discussion of the practical question. He has been extremely discursive for some time.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, Mr. Courtney, if you will tell me how this money is to be spent I will discuss the method of spending it. The difficulty I find is how to discuss the question of the way the money is to be spent.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is quite entitled to refer to the fact—if it be a fact—that the money is to be locked up. He is not entitled to discuss the other questions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I find that the money is to be locked up in this way. £40,000 will be assigned for the extinction of licences. No machinery, however, is provided by the Bill now before the House for the extinction of licences. Englishmen and Scotchmen are to have their licences extinguished; but we are to be definitely prevented from adopting a similar course in Ireland. The Chief

Secretary for Ireland will deny to places like Dublin, Belfast, and Derry, which are equipped with the machinery of Local Government, that power of extinguishing licences which Liverpool, London, and other towns in England are to enjoy. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to defend that position, and say why, in those places where Local Government exists, this power of extinguishing licences should not be put into operation? I will tell the right hon. Gentleman the reason: It is that he does not intend to apply the money in this direction at all. The Government will lock up the money, and will never introduce a Local Government scheme. Ireland will probably have the money used for horse breeding, or Queen's Plates, or the other purposes for which this Act enables it to be used. I know I shall be told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government are willing to give us these powers in relation to cities and towns, and that we will not have them. No, Sir, we will not have them unless the Government give us them on the same franchise as that which exists in England and Scotland. We will not take them unless Derry and Belfast can have the same franchise as London, Liverpool, and Glasgow. I ask the Government whether they will carry out our wishes in this respect? In consequence of the manner in which they have dealt with this question, the Committee is placed in the most astounding position. Not one single argument used on the question of temperance during the last three years can be made applicable to Ireland. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. Russell) declared that he would not vote for the Second Reading of a Local Taxation Bill unless Ireland was included in the Licensing Bill. Ireland has not been included in the Licensing Bill; but the hon. Gentleman found himself able to vote for the Local Taxation Bill in spite of his promise. What is your position? You have brought in a Bill under which no advantage is to accrue to Ireland. No Government could have made such a proposal with less justification. I can understand such a course being adopted in respect to coercive legislation; that you might have declared a necessity, but here without any real need you put an aggravated tax on the chief article of Customs, and at the same time refuse to give us the machinery for spending the money thus raised. We are to be deprived of the right of extinguishing drunkenness in Ireland until that country arrives at a normal condition; in addition to being agrarian criminals we must be intoxicated drunkards. You say your Bill is for the promotion of temperance, to spread the blessings of temperance throughout the length and breadth of the land, yet you deny those blessings to Ireland. Our country is continually taunted with being a drunken country; yet, when we ask to be allowed to apply this additional tax on whisky to the extinction of public houses, we are told we must continue to drink until Ireland assumes a normal condition. A more fatuous and absurd position was never taken up by any Government; and yet that is your position because a single Member of the Cabinet has taken up a position adverse to Local Government in Ireland. I am not now referring to the precedent of the Local Government Board, nor to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We know the latter to be a most liberal-minded man, and in favour of the extension of Local Government. So are many of his Colleagues, but because the Chief Secretary has to redeem the pledge of his noble relative to give us 20 years of resolute Government of which only three have elapsed, we are for 17 years to be deprived of the right of extinguishing licences; we are to be stopped for 17 years in the march of temperance, and we are to remain open to the taunt of being drunkards and intoxicated spend-thrifts. That is the position in which you respectable Conservative Gentlemen place us by your proposal to lock up this money. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 9, after the word "ninety," to insert the words, "In England and Scotland, but as regards Ireland, after the passing of any Act relating to Local Government in Ireland."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

(5.35.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I must decline to enter into a discussion of the Constitutional questions such as the reform of Local Government and of the Municipal Corporations which are raised by the Amendment. A great portion of the hon. Gentleman's speech has been but a repetition of arguments which he has already addressed once or twice at considerable length to the Committee; and I do not intend to go over that again. I am sure the hon. Member himself will see that it is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment, and I trust it will not be pressed to a Division now that the hon. Gentleman has made his protest. We could not impose a higher duty on spirits in England and Scotland than we do in Ireland. The hon. Member suggests this could be easily done. I differ from him entirely; I say there would be very great difficulty, and I suspect he only throws out that suggestion as a peg upon which to hang the frequently-expressed desire to suspend this part of the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It would only be a temporary suspension. You could bring in your Irish Local Government Bill and then put us all on an equal footing.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, and in the meantime create a corner in favour of Irish whisky. I scarcely think this is a business-like suggestion. Remember that, after all, we are only discussing the application of £40,000 out of the £900,000 to be raised by this Bill. I repeat we cannot re-introduce a Differential Spirit Duty.

(5.40.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): No doubt the proposal to impose a Differential Customs Duty in favour of Ireland would be a source of great inconvenience. But the inconvenient position in which we find ourselves arises; from the fact that we are now discussing what the right hon. Gentleman himself has described as a Local Budget. We are discussing not an Imperial Tax, but local taxation for purposes of Local Government. That necessarily raises difficulties in reference to the character of the Local Government. In England and Scotland we have got Local Government, and when we have levied a local tax we may proceed to apply it. But in Ireland there is no Local Government to deal with, and this circumstance is at the root of the embarrassment in which we find ourselves. This is the real cruz of the matter. You surely ought to state what you are going to do in Ireland with this money. I have never heard the Government state what they are going to do with it. How are you going to dispose of it for the benefit of Ireland? The difficulties are insuperable. As long as there is no Local Government in Ireland you cannot deal with the money. Certainly, therefore, it is not an unreasonable conclusion for hon. Members to draw that as there is no Local Government in Ireland the money ought not to be raised in Ireland. Three or four years ago the Government promised that the necessary machinery should be supplied, but still it does not exist. Yet, having failed to fulfil your pledge, you propose to raise in Ireland a tax, although you cannot deal with it when you have raised it. This is a point worth arguing; you have not yet attempted to answer it. You are proposing a great financial injustice; you are imposing a tax in such a manner that hereafter the Government will be unable to deal with it for Imperial purposes. The present Amendment is founded in the fact that this is a Local Government tax. The Government have talked about the application of the Bill to temperance purposes, but how are they going to so apply it in Ireland under present circumstances? I hold that until some fuller and clearer explanation is given by the Government in regard to the application of the tax to Ireland, the Irish Members will be justified in protesting against it. You cannot expect to make progress with this Bill until you bring it into conformity with your own declarations.

(5.47.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I hold that the proposal of the Government is unparalleled. I believe that in the whole history of taxation there can be found no precedent for such a tax as this, especially in its application to the Irish people. For, by the proposal of the Government, we are to be called upon to vote an increase of taxation of a most oppressive character on the Irish people; while, at the same time, the tax is not immediately needed, and the Irish people are to be denied the right of using it. The proceeds, so far as Ireland is concerned, are to be locked up in the public chest until some Bill is brought forward, which may not even be drafted as yet. A more unjust or unwarrantable proposal was never made. I venture to say that no British Finance Minister would dare to levy a tax in similar circumstances on England or Scotland; and this is only another illustration of the unfair and unequal treatment which is meted out to Ireland by the English Government. Yet we are to be held up to odium because we are protesting, on behalf of our constituents, against a course of procedure which no English Minister would dare to apply to the United Kingdom generally. The other day the Chief Secretary stood up in this House and, with his eyes turned to Heaven, asked what alternatives the Government had before them. He said they had no machinery in Ireland by which the tax could be used immediately in that island. He went through two or three alternatives and rejected them all as impossible. But if you want a tax which is to be used in England and Scotland for local purposes, and which cannot be used in Ireland for similar purposes, why not impose one which affects only England and Scotland? There are many methods by which you could do this; why not increase the Income Tax or the House Duty? No, the Chancellor of the Exchequer says he must have a tax on whisky. Then why not limit the increased tax to England and Scotland? Because, says the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a differential duty would be so inconvenient. But if the right hon. Gentleman chooses to adopt the inconvenient course of raising his tax, then he ought to put up with the inconvenience of a differential duty rather than act unjustly towards Ireland. I know it is convenient to have a common Customs Duty for the whole of the United Kingdom, but the right hon. Gentleman might remember that for 60 years after the Act of Union there was a Differential Duty. When English Governments have, in the past, brought in an Arms Bill, they have not troubled their consciences much about the inconvenience of searching for arms. I have noticed this on more than one occasion, that when it is a question of abridging the liberties of the Irish people, or inflicting any oppression on them, no amount of inconvenience is allowed to stand in the way, and you are absolutely indifferent on the question of expense, but when it is a question of doing justice to the people, and of not enforcing a tax for which there is not a shred of justification, and which no one attempts to justify, you are then swayed by the suggestion that it would be inconvenient to have a differential duty, and you are thereby induced to inflict a gross injustice on the people of Ireland. How is it that this duty is proposed? It is because the Chancellor of the Exchequer, two years ago, was defeated on his proposal to levy a Van and Wheel Tax. This Whisky Duty is intended to fill up the vacuum thereby created. The right hon. Gentleman ought to have adhered to his former proposal, which would have fallen with three-fold greater force on the richer country than on Ireland. Why should the right hon. Gentleman tax the drink of the poor of Ireland? Why should he not, instead, propose a tax upon the luxuries of the rich, upon their champagne and upon their expensive cigars? Why should he take the money out of the pockets of the labouring classes? The right hon. Gentleman said, the other day, that drink ought to be made to pay for the suppression of drunkenness. Why, a more preposterous argument was never put before the House. The question to be considered is, on whom will the tax chiefly fall, and by whom ought the burden to be borne? I say this tax on spirits will fall chiefly on the labouring classes, and that the burden ought to have been placed on the luxuries of the rich, rather than on those of the poor. That proposition is tenfold stronger on the other side of St. George's Channel. I protest against this proposal in its entirety, but more especially against including Ireland in the scope of this taxation, putting upon our already overburdened people, who pay double their proportional share of Imperial taxation, a tax of the most oppressive character that could be imposed upon the people of Ireland, and at a time when it is not needed for Imperial expenditure, and is not to be used for local expenditure in Ireland. We are not to be allowed to expend it, so there is not the shadow of any ground for justification of the imposition, and I think we are justified in resisting it by every means in our power.

(6.1.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): My only objection to the Amendment of my hon. Friend is, that he leaves in the words "and Scotland," the effect of which will be, that while he will relieve Ireland of the new tax, he will expose Scotland to all the evil of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal. I do not think a more impudent proposal could be made under existing circumstances than to propose to tax Scotch whisky in the way proposed in the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: This clause relates to foreign spirits.

MR. HUNTER: Then I must reserve my remarks.

(6.2.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of his reply, stated that he supposed my hon. and learned Friend's Amendment was merely a peg on which to hang discussion of the proposals as they affect Ireland. I do not think my hon. and learned Friend need be ashamed if that is the case. I think we have every right to seize every opportunity to protest against the postponement of the Local Government Bill for Ireland. There is a Member of the House sitting opposite from whom I hope we may have some expression of opinion on this matter; I mean the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). In the Autumn Session of 1886 the noble Lord made a declaration to which many references have been made. I remember the occasion very well from circumstances surrounding it. I remember the noble Lord declared that Ireland should be treated with similarity and simultaneity to England and Scotland, and I remember that on that occasion he was applauded by many of his followers. More than that, some two years ago, when the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for North Kildare on the subject of Local Government was before the House, the noble Lord emphatically repeated his statement, and again when the English Local Government Bill was before the House the noble Lord said he supposed, and could not believe otherwise, that a similar Bill would be introduced for Ireland. In the face of these declarations, I think the noble Lord is morally bound to join us in our protest against the further postponement of this local measure for Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stigmatised as ridiculous the proposal to put a differential duty on Irish spirits, but it seems to me that so long as we have this differential treatment in the matter of Local Government a differential duty on Irish spirit is a most reasonable proposition, and the burden of proof lies with the right hon. Gentleman, and not with us. The difficulties about a Customs cordon exist only in the right hon. Gentleman's imagination. No difficulty is found in giving Ireland the administration of the Coercion Act, and there is an army of police available for a Customs cordon. I trust we may have the assistance of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington on the lines of the declarations he has previously made.

(6.6.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): As the noble Lord makes no sign of response to this invitation, I will say a few words in support of the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend. The Government are pursuing a dog-in-the-manger policy in reference to the whole question. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) has introduced a Bill for the purpose of curtailing or entirely stopping the issue of new licences in Ireland, but in response to the appeal of my hon. and learned Friend the Government decline to afford him any facilities for passing this Bill into law, and I, therefore, think he is occupying a logical position in asking that the present measure shall not apply to Ireland until Local Authorities have been established there for the purpose of giving effect to the purpose of the Bill in this respect. It is, I say, a "dog-in-the-manger" policy. The Government will not give us any control over the issue of licences, yet still they insist on imposing this tax, which is intended in England for the purpose of extinguishing licences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says there would be difficulties in carrying out the arrangements in regard to different taxation, but let me point out that there is the machinery in existence; there are the Customs Houses in Ireland, the Customs officers, the Revenue officers; the books, as it were, are open. There are the clerks, the gaugers, and the whole staff, and, it is futile to say the plan could not be carried into operation. It is an utterly absurd suggestion coming from the right hon. Gentleman, who is presumed to be, and I suppose is, one of the leading business men of the country. It would not be business, he says, but I say it is a very bad business to go on robbing the Irish people by the imposition of this duty from now until the time when, in the opinion of the Government, it will be right to pass a Local Government Bill for Ireland. Robbery of the Irish people it will be ever, though the money will be hung up, for I believe, though the interest be allowed to accumulate, it will become more difficult to spend the money, as is proposed, without great injustice to many parts of Ireland. It will become more and more difficult and a much worse business to carry out the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot, for the life of me, see what difficulty there would be in the future as soon as the Local Government Bill for Ireland is passed making provision for this tax, for which now, as regards Ireland, there is no defence. The "normal condition" of Ireland has been referred to. The normal condition of Ireland has ever been agitation and coercion. Do the Government think that while we have no Local Government in Ireland we shall have no agitation there? If they indulge in any such hope I promise them it will not be fulfilled. While the Irish people have their rights withheld from them there will be agitation, of a more or less violent character, and with agitation I suppose there will be coercion, and that will continue to be the normal condition of Ireland, and so, if we wait for a change in this normal condition of Ireland for the Local Government Bill we shall wait for all time. We shall wait beyond the 17 years of resolute government still to run before the Irish people are accorded Local Government. That is what I have to say in support of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend and Colleague, and the arguments that have been—if I may call them arguments—addressed to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not hold with any business man, or with any Member of the House who desires to see justice done to the people of Ireland.

(6.13.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Government appear to be lost to all sense of shame in this matter. Every argument addressed to them is met with silence, and no attempt is made to parry any of our statements. They have no case, but they have the Closure. The whole case for the Government lies in their capacity to meet us in that way. They cannot maintain their position; our protests are disregarded; this money is to be raised, though it is to be locked up, and we are not to be allowed to handle it; simultaneity of taxation is to be maintained, similarity of treatment, else there is to be none. I should have hoped some sensible man in the Conservative ranks would have asked what the Government mean by this imposition of taxes they do not want. An amount of £250,000, I suppose, is to be levied, and the money is not required! Is this a Constitutional state of things? Heavy taxes we have had to pay before now, but they have been to pay the expenses of wars and rumours of wars, but this tax is not to be employed; it is as useless as the talent buried in the ground; it is to be buried in the bank, and we are not even to use it in buying out publicans! The right hon. Gentleman says it is inconvenient to have separate Customs House arrangements, and so rather than have an extra clerk or two we must pay this taxation, though the money is wanted for no purpose, but will lie in the bank, or, perhaps, be invested in Egyptian Bonds. Whatever inconvenience there might be you could remove at any time by passing a Local Government Bill. It would be but a spur in your sluggish sides to stir you up to legislative action. Why, I do not suppose the Nabobs of India, or the Sultans of Turkey, or even the gentleman who rules over Egypt, would levy taxes which are not required; but this is what the Government of Ireland has come to! I doubt if it would be done in the Congo State, or any other habitable quarter of the globe. You impose this tax, and, I suppose, at the end of 20 years of resolute government you will take out the money and allow us to buy out a few publicans. This is the Unionist Government you are proud of; this is the legislation we ought to be delighted to undertake a seasick journey of hundreds of miles to come here to assist in! The hon. Member for North Armagh seems to enjoy the position, and he is the author of the sentiment that "England never wiped the eyes of Erin without making her pay for the handkerchief." He relishes the idea, but I suppose on or about the 12th July there is an average amount of whisky consumed in his constituency, and yet he is content to pay the tax, though his constituents are not to have the power of using it to lessen the temptation to over drinking. Tax yourselves as much as you like; tax us, if in your wisdom you think it right; but, at least, have a decent pretext for it. Where is your usual hypocrisy that you can only urge simultaneity and similarity as a reason for making an Irishman pay more for his whisky? An appeal has been made to the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill), and I second it. I admit the difficulties of his position, but he has never spoken contumeliously of Irish Members; he has always spoken kindly of our country and our claim to be treated with equality in the government of the three Kingdoms; he has declared in favour of Local Government; and we may appeal to him to assist us in extracting some statement from the Government. Is this promise of Local Government to remain ever a recurring decimal; is there always to be a full stop before it? In the history of hypocrisy and broken pledges in British dealings with Ireland, no Government has ever gone the length of this Liberal Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer. If this is Liberal Unionism, I prefer brigandage. A brigand takes your money, but he spends it upon his own amusements, even if he only takes an excursion to Egypt; but our money is to be taken and locked up, with the right hon. Gentleman sitting on the chest. Is this your statesmanship? Why, the darkest African chief, the puniest pigmy Stanley discovered, would invent a better system of statesmanship than this. I challenge any hon. Gentleman opposite to give us any other explanation than that you want to work your spite on Ireland, to show Irishmen they are a humbled and conquered people, that they are not to have the right that Englishmen and Scotchmen enjoy, the poor enjoyment of buying publicans. It is not a sport for which I myself have a keen relish, but whether or not it is an excellent thing to distribute this money among the brewers and large owners of tied houses, at least, since we supply the money, we may claim a share in the distribution of it. If the Irish are the most drunken people on earth, why are they to be deprived of this miserable satisfaction? As an Irishman I know I am one of a drunken, degraded race, and that, from your higher moral standpoint, you look down upon our degraded state; but why do you baulk the Irishman's desire to have the means of cutting off his own sins? You say Ireland is not in a normal condition, but we are as your Unionist Government has made us. We are brought here to take part in the equal government of the three Kingdoms, but not one among the Conservative Party is able to raise his voice in explanation or defence of this proposition. On Friday the Chancellor of the Exchequer made some attempt to defend the tax. "We will avail ourselves," said he, "of the existing machinery of Local Government in large towns." "Yes, certainly," we said, "and a simple clause of three lines will remove all difficulty." I will draft it myself if your Government draftsman is too much engaged. But now that we claim equal treatment for Nationalist and Orange municipalities you turn round and refuse what we could have had on Friday. Our object is to give the working class, who feel the evil of the existing public houses, a share in the means of extinguishing the evil. No one has a vote except those who do not use the public house, the club men of Derry and Belfast. To show the absurdity of the position, compare a town like Colchester with Derry. The population is about equal, but in the first there are 4,792 municipal electors, in the other case 981, and yet you will not let an equal number in either town have a voice in reducing the means of drunkenness. The people who exercise the municipal franchise in Ireland are not the people who have the evils of the drink trade brought home to them in their lanes and alleys. You will not give attention to this, because it will take up a few hours of Parliamentary time. Take a Saturday Sitting for the purpose; we will be ready enough to take part in a measure for equalising the municipal franchise to that of England. We will sit through September to accomplish this. What idle talk is this of the difficulties of a Customs cordon, because a few more guagers may be required. You have your cordon now in respect to the introduction of arms, and whatever inconvenience arises you can relieve yourself of it at once by establishing Local Government. Will the right hon.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Gentleman be candid enough to tell us when the Local Government Bill will be introduced? He says my Amendment is but a peg to hang argument upon; but I suppose an argument must hang upon something, call reason a "peg" if you like, its purpose is still the same, but drive the peg home if it is in the way, and say what your Local Government is to be, and when it is to be proposed; do not meet our arguments for equal treatment, equal rights, with charges of obstruction and use of the Closure. We have caught you in the fact, you are naked and yet not ashamed, and it is our duty to expose such suggestions as you have put forward. Smarting, as they do, under the disabilities which I have mentioned, the Irish people have no more aggravating form of oppression than will be produced by this tax; and it is under the circumstances I have stated that I strongly urge the House to support our claim for equal rights to Ireland.

(6.32.) MR. MOLLOY (Kings Co., Birr): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman this question. Will the money be paid to a separate account pending the establishment of Local Government for Ireland, or will it, in the meantime, be used for any other purpose? If the money is to be used for other purposes, it is quite clear that Local Government for Ireland will be delayed as long as possible.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member need not have any fear that there is a desire on our part to keep the sum of £40,000 in hand. The money will be invested in the names of the Commissioners for the National Debt.

(6.33.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Before this vote is taken, it ought to be clearly stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the money voted for one year is not to be used for another, or in ten years to come.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did not intimate anything of the kind. I spoke of the sum of £40,000, and I said there need be no fear of any desire to keep that sum in hand.

MR. STOREY: But the money will accumulate, if it is not used. The Party opposite are supposed to care more for Constitutional facts than we on this side; but if you look back to the whole history of England, it will be seen that some of the severest conflicts between this House and the Crown have been as to the right to use the public money, and it will be difficult to find an instance where the House has admitted that the Crown could lay by money for future use. Take the great conflicts of Elizabeth's time. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.] An hon. Member says, "Oh, oh."

MR. DILLON: Perhaps he never heard of that time.

MR. STOREY: The hon. Member who interrupted me has been travelling so much in Asia that he seems to have forgotten the rest of Europe; but I regard the matter as extremely germane to this question as to the control the House should exercise over the National money. There were conflicts in Charles I. time between the Crown and the people as to the employment of the National funds. Suppose King Charles had come down to this House and had asked the then Chancellor of the Exchequer for £400,000 or £500,000 which he had no immediate use for, but which he intended to make a purse of. What, I ask, would there have been to prevent him from creating a fund by means of which he might ultimately have put down the Parliament? I contend, as a Radical and a Constitutionalist, that it is extremely improper for the House to vote any money which the Government does not propose to expend during the existence of the financial year. That is a principle we have contended for and affirmed over and over again on this side of the House. I object to those who call themselves the Constitutional Party coming here to prevent our discussing these questions as fully as we desire. I say that they are now proposing to take money which they do not mean to spend during the financial year, but to make a purse of; and I have known the time when if such a proposition had been made by us it would at once have been denounced as unconstitutional, and hon. Gentlemen opposite would have stumped the country against it. We say that such a proposal is extremely dangerous, and therefore we enter our serious protest against it.

(6.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether this money is to be in any way impounded or made available for purposes of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, so as to make it an additional tax on the people of Ireland, which is to be applied for the benefit of those who take advantage of that measure?

MR. GOSCHEN: I would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Bill itself.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Bill provides that the Irish share of this money shall be "Subject to the provisions of any Act hereafter passed relating to the purchase of land in Ireland."

So that this additional taxation which is to be placed on the people of Ireland is to form an additional guarantee for the large sum of money to be advanced to the Irish landlords. I do not wish to prolong the Debate; but I think it is worthy of note that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has very carefully guarded himself as to the date of future Local Government in Ireland, and that there is no provision in the Bill for the suspension of licences in Ireland.

MR. GOSCHEN: That has been explained over and over again.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: It was explained that that provision was made by accident.

MR. GOSCHEN: I never alluded to the point of the suspension of licences as left out by accident. What happened was this—we were asked whether we would deal in a certain way with the Corporation of Dublin with regard to the suspension of licences, and I then said—

"The fact is that this Bill does not include the question of the suspension of licence in Ireland."

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman; but I wish to point out that there is an absolute state of confusion and uncertainty with reference to the imposition of this tax in Ireland which affords legitimate ground for the protests of Members for Ireland, who are entitled to know how this tax is to be expended.

(6.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have been listening to the discussion with a perfectly unbiassed and unprejudiced mind, in order that I might know on which side I should vote. After having listened to this discussion up to the present moment I am of opinion that my hon. Friend the Member for Longford is entirely in the right, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is entirely in the wrong. I really do not know who is responsible for business on that Bench. We are told that the First Lord of the Treasury is a good man of business; but I am sure I have never been present at such a muddle. We are asked to levy a tax, a portion of which is to be devoted to the compensation of publicans. I am entirely opposed to that. But what do we find with regard to Ireland? The tax is to be levied, but the publicans are not to be compensated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer denies that this money can be used for any other purpose. My right hon. Friend has pointed out to him that by the Bill, which is the only thing we have to go by, the money may be secured for Land Purchase in Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "No, it does not exactly mean that; it means something else. We are going to put this money in a bag, and keep it there, until we are able to pass a Bill for County Government in Ireland." Who knows what that County Government will be, or whether it will ever be passed? When leader of this House the noble Lord (Lord R. Churchill), at the commencement of this Parliament, said a County Government Bill was going to be passed for Ireland. That was four years ago. This measure of Local Government may not be passed at all, yet we are asked to agree to this money being put in a bag for a vague and indefinite period. The Irish have a right to protest against this, and I should be astonished if they did not. What are they met with? By a conspiracy of silence on the part of right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite. Hon. Gentlemen know that we beat them every day, every hour, every minute, in argument. They sit there stolidly, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to pass everything by the mere brute force of those behind him.

(6.50.) MR. DILLON: I think I am justified in saying that the course which the discussion has taken to-night is the most extraordinary that has ever been witnessed. The Amendment raises issues of the gravest importance to the people of Ireland, as well as the general power of voting the taxes in this House, yet it is treated with the most absolute contempt by the chief Ministers sitting opposite. It is apparent that Ministers and Members opposite are obeying the order of the Times, of which the Ministers are becoming mere salaried servants. The complaint the other day was that we did not talk enough on an Irish Bill, and hon. Gentlemen opposite, I am bound to say, displayed a very poor and despicable attempt at obstruction, although the intention to obstruct was there. If we do not talk we are trying to trick the Government. When we do talk we are obstructing the business of the country. When we did not talk at sufficient length the Governor of our country (the Chief Secretary) treated us to an inordinately long speech, manifestly for the obstruction of business, for he repeated himself over and over again. The measure under discussion the other day was only a small one, affecting only a small section of the Irish people. Ministers and their followers spoke at enormous and preposterous length on that occasion, and now when we bring forward a real, substantial, and important grievance, backed by unanswerable reasons why this tax should not apply to Ireland, we are met by a conspiracy of silence on that side of the House. Hon. Members and Ministers, acting under the orders of the Times, are relying, not on arguments at all, but simply on their majority. By the action of the Government we have one other illustration of the fact that Irish Members need expect no kind of justice or fair treatment at their hands.

(6.53.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo may take some consolation to himself in respect to the treatment of Irish questions by Her Majesty's Government. The precedent they set in taking the article in the Times, and the fact that the majority will not always be on that side, will apply to future Parliaments as well as the present Parliament. Every precedent they set of passing measures for Ireland by the violent use of the Closure, by refusing to listen to argument or discussion, and by laying the Bill on the Table, and saying, "This is the Bill of the Government; we have got the majority; we won't discuss it; we will pass it"—all that will be equally applicable when other measures come to be dealt with for Ireland. One of these days it is possible there may be a majority in favour of Home Rule for Ireland, and all we shall have to do will be to imitate the example now set us. We will lay that Bill on the Table and say, "We do not think it worth while to discuss it." There may be some members of the loyal minority in Ireland who may raise some objection to a Bill of that character. All we have got to say is—"We are the majority; here is the Bill, take it or leave it; we do not want to discuss it, but to vote upon it, and dispose of it in a simple manner." That is the policy which is recommended; that is the policy which is acted upon. Let us know it, let us record it; it may be useful hereafter.

(6.55.) Mr. GOSCHEN: Unfortunately, Sir, history is not written in the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, but in actual events. And the precedent which he quotes will be this, that the general subject has been debated day after day without making progress with one single line of the Bill. We thought plenty of time had been given to the discussion of the subject, which had been thrashed out, as I thought, over and over again. Again, we find that it is useless to argue with hon. Members opposite, because the only result is to open the way to a broader re-statement of the arguments originally advanced. I hope I have not been in the slightest degree discourteous to hon. Members in the brevity of my remarks, but it seemed to me that I had already dealt with the points raised. I endeavoured to dispose of them on the last occasion, and I know I did not succeed in convincing them, and I do not think after their treatment of my arguments then that any fresh arguments I might have used would have given them satisfaction. This is an Amendment upon one particular point of raising a duty to be applied to Ireland, but when the clause comes to be discussed as a whole I shall be prepared to justify the proposal. But I say we are justified on this Amendment in declining to re-open and re-discuss the whole question as to the general imposition of this tax.

he moves to omit Ireland from the operation of this clause. It is a perfectly unchallengeable proposition. The right hon. Gentleman seeks to impose an increased Spirit Duty, the proceeds of which in Ireland are to be expended by bodies which are not yet in existence. And we in Ireland are called unreasonable because we ask that Ireland should be excluded. We have made extraordinary concession to the noisy advocates on those Benches, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might consider whether Corporations or authorised Municipalities may have this tax for the extinguishment of licences and other purposes. Nothing has been said about County Councils, and the extra duty is to be handed over to bodies which are non-representative, and only nominated by themselves. Such a proposition is utterly intolerable and utterly untenable. I think the hon. Member for Sunderland has raised the Constitutional question of how this tax is to be applied in a manner that cannot be mistaken. Of course, we shall be voted down, but we shall insist upon bringing these arguments forward in Committee, feeling there is no real or tangible reason for resisting them. Four weeks ago the Official Representative of Ireland in this House made the clear pronouncement that so soon as Ireland was in a normal condition she would get Local Government. Ireland is not now in a normal condition, and she is not likely to be. We have the Minister most closely connected with Ireland—and who, therefore, may be supposed to have a knowledge of the Governing Bodies in that country—saying we are not going to have these bodies. But you are handing over money to these bodies in England and Scotland, and we have a right to ask "What are you going to do in the case of Ireland, are you going to hand over the money to the Grand Juries?" We in Ireland have no confidence in those Local Authorities, and we predict that if this money be raised and handed over to them it will be simply jobbed away. It is absurd to suppose that they would use it for extinguishing licences, because they are the people who have granted the existing licences, and they have given them largely in excess of the demand. I think in this matter we require from the Government more than the crack of the whip of the Times newspaper; we want a distinct and specific promise as to what is to be done with the money. What do they want it for; how will it be applied, supposing County Governing Bodies are not established for two, three, four, or five years? What is to prevent the right hon. Gentleman in two or three years time coming down and saying "We want this money for extra police," or "We want it to cope with the Plan of Campaign," or for some other purpose. So far as we are concerned we are bound to protect the interests of our constituents and to insist on the recognition of Constitutional principles, and, therefore, we protest against the action of the Government. I hope the Amendment will be pressed to a Division.

(7.5.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I think hon. Members for Ireland have very substantial reasons for protesting against the proposals now before the House, and the Committee has a right to complain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not dealt with the Constitutional objections raised. We are supposed to be dealing with an even hand towards Ireland, but if a Bill had been introduced proposing to apply the taxation of Great Britain for local purposes without any definite scheme being put before Parliament, does anybody suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been listened to for five minutes, no matter how substantial might have been his reasons for raising money in one year and tying it up for use on subsequent occasions? Surely the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, who likes to adhere to safe Constitutional lines, will use his influence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the leader of the House to obtain some justification for this most dangerous innovation. I deny the right of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to limit the discussion. Irishmen have a right to object to the Government laying violent hands on their money, and they are entitled to object to the allocation of that money for the extinction of licences, because they have no security that in a reasonable time that money will be in their hands. I think the trifling, petty, and tinkering suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the proposal will establish differences in the system of Customs between the two countries is no answer to the serious Constitutional objections raised. I do not think the Government can make any charge against the Opposition, and throw on them the stigma of obstruction, when the House has protested again and again against the novel and highly dangerous innovation contained in the Bill, an innovation which the Party opposite and sane Gentlemen on my own side would, in their better days, and in their right minds, have strenuously opposed.

(7.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir J. Corry) is in his place, and, as he was not here on Friday night, I would inform him that the Chief Secretary promised then to devote this money to the cities and towns in Ireland. The hon. Baronet has now heard the Government recede from that promise.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No, no.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, where do we stand? I understood him to say that as we had introduced new difficulties his pledge fell to the ground. The matter cannot be left in this way, and I would remind the Government that it is a mistake to suppose that they can settle everything by the Closure. They have yet to get Section 7, to which I have already put down Amendments; and unless they give us some satisfactory assurance as to how this money is to be disposed of, they will see if their conspiracy of silence is calculated to make them get on more quickly. I would ask them to let us know whether they intend to insist on the section giving the same powers to the boroughs in Ireland as they have given in England and Scotland, or to drop it. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh himself endeavoured some time ago to initiate legislation for Belfast. It failed in consequence of some steps such as Conservative Members are always making, but I would ask if a pledge was not given to him that the provisions of this Bill would be extended in some way so as to meet his views? That is a plain question, and I think we ought to have a plain answer. We were pledged to certain of our friends in Ireland, who were in the licensing interest, to oppose that Bill, because it would compensate the publicans; and now we have a statement, and, so far as the Irish publicans are concerned, there is to be no money compensation, because the money is to be given to the Irish landlords. This is a tax not to compensate the Irish publicans, but the Irish landlords. That, in my opinion, will entirely justify us even with the staunchest advocates of the licensing interest in Ireland. I think a plain issue is before the Committee.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (London-derry) rose to address the Committee.

Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(7.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 212; Noes 150.—(Div. List, No. 91.)

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 148; Noes 211.—(Div. List, No. 92.)

(7.37.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move the omission of the word "gallons," and the insertion of the word "hogsheads." The object of this Amendment is not, as many Members on both sides of the House suppose, obstruction, but the equalisation of the duties chargeable to the various classes of the community. I find that 300 per cent. is charged as duty on the spirits consumed by the lower classes, whilst the Chancellor of the Exchequer is satisfied with a duty of 1d. or 2d. a bottle on the wine consumed by the higher classes. I think this is a monstrous state of things, and I propose this Amendment with the object of remedying it. To my mind, nothing would tend more in the direction of temperance than the abolition of the Spirit Duty altogether. The working classes do not consume spirits day by day, but merely when they are out for a spree. If the duties were reduced a working man would not regard it as so great a treat to have spirits which he could get at any time, and we know that prohibition of any kind increases the desire to obtain the article which is prohibited. I venture to say that there are as bad spirits made in Ireland as in any part of Germany, and that there are more inquests in Ireland on men who drink

Irish spirit than on men who drink German spirit. I believe that many of these inquests would not take place at all if the price of spirits came more within the means of the working classes.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, to leave out the word "gallons," and insert the word "hogsheads."

Question proposed, "That the word 'gallons' stand part of the Clause."

(7.43.) MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the Committee will recollect that 54 gallons go to the hogshead. Of course, you had better have no duty at all than have one which amounts to a 54th part of that which we now propose. It would make the tax absolutely worthless as a means of revenue.

(7.47.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the hon. Member will not press this Amendment to a Division. It is an Amendment which I myself could not support. The next Amendment will very properly raise the question of the duties.

*(7.48.) MR. FLYNN: I, too, hope my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment to a Division, because I think it would have the effect of bringing about the handicapping of native spirits. I must take issue with my hon. Friend as to there being bad Irish spirit. If there is any bad spirit sold in Ireland it is because the Irish spirit has been mixed with the German spirit.

(7.50.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division. The right hon. Gentleman thinks it expedient to divide on a subsequent Amendment rather than upon this; but it must be borne in mind that we defeated a Government on this point. If the Irish Members attack this increase of Spirit Duty at every point, we are certainly acting consistently. In the first place, I object to this tax on whiskies because it is a piece of class legislation. Then I think it amounts to a question of a large nation attempting to bully and over-tax a small nation. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes a pint of claret with his dinner, and pays 1s. for it, he only contributes 1d. to the Revenue; but if an Irishman takes one shilling's worth of whisky he contributes 9d. to the Revenue. Why should an Irishman, after his hard day's work, contribute 9d. to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's ld.? That is most unfair. It is better that whisky should be consumed than wine. Whisky distillation employs a certain number of men in Ireland and Scotland, while the making of wine employs Frenchmen or Germans, who could be employed in the Armies of their countries. Again, it is better, from the point of view of health, that whisky should be consumed rather than wine. Does anyone suppose that a fashionable West End doctor would recommend the drinking of wine before whisky? It is well-known that if a man cannot do without alcohol, whisky, with cold water, is the best form of alcohol he can take. I never could see the justice of taxing whisky, or any other spirit produced in this country, at a higher rate than wine or beer, and, therefore, I regard this as a most valuable Amendment. I do not know a more flagrant piece of class legislation than the extraordinary difference between the tax on alcohol in wine and that on alcohol in whisky, whether Scotch or Irish. I have always noticed that when the duty on whisky is increased the price per glass is not increased. The fact of the matter is, that the article is adulterated just in proportion as the duty is increased, and, judging from experience as the Chairman of a large Union, drunkenness is not diminished by any tax that is put upon spirits. There are certain respectable people in Ireland—people moderately well off—who have just as much right to drink a moderate portion of alcohol as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and these people are prevented from taking a reasonable amount of good whisky by the extraordinary and extravagant duty. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury can revel in their pint bottles of claret, and, at the same time, contribute less to the Revenue. I trust my hon. Friend will press his Amendment to a Division.

(7.59.) MR. MOLLOY: I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his Amendment, because I believe its effect would be to foster the use of German spirit, which is admittedly most injurious to health.

(8.0.) MR. BLANE: Notwithstanding all that my hon. Friends say, and despite what has been said from above the Gangway, this touches an old and recognised grievance. In 1715 the two great grievances of the rebels of that day were the Salt Tax and the Malt Tax; and now, 175 years after that date, the Malt Tax still remains. In these days we hear much about Free Trade; but in any representations against such tariffs as are imposed by the United States, we are met with counter statements about our duties on imported wines and spirits. Is this Free Trade? A nation that teaches the doctrine of Free Trade should apply it at home. It is impossible to say there is Free Trade, when, from the cargoes of foreign ships coming into our ports, barrel after barrel of goods is broken open in the search of spirits; and the boxes of passengers, even of British subjects, are ransacked, and even, I believe, the pockets of their overcoats are searched. If we claim to be a Free Trade nation, we should adopt the principle entirely, and not put into the mouth of Foreign Governments an argument against our own hypocrisy. This is the argument I met with in New York. Remember, too, the men who maintain this embargo on foreign spirits would establish it against fruit, and they resisted the repeal of the Customs Duty against foreign grain. As a humble Free Trader, I have done my duty in good faith; but as my hon. Friends do not see their way to go to a Division, I greatly regret that I must withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(8.5.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before the hon. Member (Mr. P. McDonald) proceeds with the next Amendment, I wish to introduce an Amendment and, in doing so, I would call attention to the fact that great injustice will be inflicted on a large section of the community if this tax is carried in the way proposed in the Bill. It is well-known that there are a great number of commodities used by chemists and druggists in this country in which spirit is used, and upon this subject I have had many communications from members of the trade, though not, as yet, very many from chemists and druggists in Ireland. These gentlemen who have written to me point out that which is well-known, namely, that many of a large number of medical substances known as tinctures and mixtures are made up with the addition of proof spirit, and, therefore, if you are going to raise the price of these spirits you will certainly increase the price of the tinctures and mixtures. I have here a communication which I have received from a medical friend, who tells me that the effect of the addition of this proposed duty will be to raise the price of these substances by about 2d. per pound, and even now that increase is being made, the trade anticipating the increase which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is bringing in. Thus you inflict a great injustice.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member will state his Amendment, perhaps we shall be able to appreciate the drift of his argument.

Dr. TANNER: Certainly, Sir. But, in the first place, I was going to talk about it, and then I was going to hand it in to you. The Amendment is Clause 4, line 15, after "spirits," to insert these words "Except spirits taken out of bond for bonâ fide medical purposes." I can assure the Committee I thought the matter out before I ventured to bring it under consideration, and I think the Committee will understand the point I am addressing myself to. If you look down the pages of the British Pharmacopœia, you will find a very long list containing the medical substances which I refer to. Now, I think that to raise the price of medical necessities is injudicious, if not worse. I tried to find a method of putting my proposition in a more sweeping way, to indicate to the Customs generally that when spirits are imported into this country for bonâ fide medical purposes, they should be fully relieved from the taxation upon spirits for ordinary consumption. However, in talking over the matter with a few friends, we saw the difficulties the Customs would meet with in letting such spirits pass; but I think, with the assistance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there should be no difficulty in devising the means by which compounders of medicines when they apply for proof spirit for the purposes of their trade, should be able to take it out of bond, and the character of these manufacturers for honesty, probity, and straightforwardness would be some guarantee against smuggling under cover of medical purposes; and, on conviction, any such an offence should be severely punished. If the right hon. Gentleman will give consideration to this Amendment, I think he will agree with its object, and will agree that when proof spirit is imported by well-authenticated medical firms it might be allowed to pass through the Customs, paying only the duty heretofore imposed. I think the preparation of medicines should be made as cheap as possible. I cannot deprecate too strongly the very high prices again and again charged for all these medical substances in consequence of various causes, and I certainly hope the Government will try and help the stand that is being made against the increase of the price of such substances. It is purely as a medical subject I bring the matter forward, and I may claim to have some knowledge of it. I hope that we may have the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman in a matter most interesting to the medical profession.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, after the word "spirits," to insert the words, "except spirits taken out of bond for bonâ fide medical purposes."—(Dr. Tanner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(8.12.) Mr. GOSCHEN: Whatever may be the theoretical expediency of introducing such an Amendment as the hon. Member proposes, I can assure him that it would be extremely difficult and practically impossible to carry it out. The Committee will observe that the proposal is not to relieve these commodities from the heavy duty which is imposed upon spirits, but only of this 6d. additional duty, which is comparatively a very small percentage. Now, we have the whole machinery for carrying out the duty, but not for making this exception. It will be observed also that if this proposal is carried out in the Customs, it must equally apply to the Excise.

Dr. TANNER: Certainly.

Mr. GOSCHEN: Yes; but there is a great difficulty in devising any machinery to carry it out. It is impossible for the Customs or the Excise to follow the transport of small quantities of spirits. It is suggested that any respectable manufacturer might enjoy such a privilege, and his name would be a guarantee ; but such a course could not be worked out in law, and no distinction could be made between chemists and druggists and in any quantity which they might require for their own purposes. This proposal would lead to a great deal of complexity and difficulty, and possibly, in the case of some few people, it would lead to fraud. There is nothing more difficult, not only with regard to spirits required for chemists and druggists, but those required for perfumery and other purposes, than to prevent any illicit practices in connection with those trades. The officers of Excise have great experience of the difficulties to be met with in such cases; and whatever our desire might be to meet such a suggestion as that made by the hon. Member, we have no machinery to carry it out.

(8.17.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I do not think there is much in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman. He says the additional 6d. is a very small percentage, but that might be said of the tax altogether. The object of the additional taxation is to provide the people with the means of getting rid of the excess of public houses. That may be a laudable object, though it seems to me the produce of the tax will find its way into the pockets of large brewers and distillers who own tied houses, but I should imagine there can be no objection to an Amendment which lays down a distinction between spirits used for medical purposes and spirits used as a luxury, or as drink. I admit there is a difficulty in following the transport of these spirits in small quantities, but would it not be possible to allow the exemption upon spirits which are used in bond for these medical preparations? Or is it possible in some way to adopt the procedure applied to methylated spirits? Compounding in bond would be an advantage, inasmuch as it would tend to throw the trade into the hands of substantial and respectable firms who alone could provide for the use of bonded warehouses, and this would be a guarantee against the adulteration too often practised in the poorest class of trade.

(8.19.) MR. STOREY: I would rather support a Motion for increasing the tax on medicines, than an Amendment for a reduction. I think the dearer we make medicines the greater advantage it will be to the country. I see perfectly well the difficulties the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to encounter in carrying out such a proposal as that suggested by the hon. Member, and if a Division is taken I must support the Government.

(8.20.) COLONEL NOLAN: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the exuberance of health that induces him to advocate an advance in the price of medicines; but, unfortunately, there are those who are obliged to take medicines, and among the poorer classes price is a serious consideration. It must be admitted that the imposition of high duties on spirits must lead to illicit distillation and smuggling, and this applies to use of spirit in trades, or in preparation of medicines. There is no attempt at smuggling wine, because the duty is moderate. In relation to workhouses and dispensaries this addition to the tax will make a very considerable difference, the medical bill being a considerable item in the poor rates. From this point of view teetotalers will be interested, for they pay these equally with the consumers of alcoholic liquors. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer might find some means of allowing a rebate by which this additional tax may not be made to fall upon workhouses, hospitals, and dispensaries, and the sick poor. Surely a distinction can be made just as it is made on the use of spirit in the industrial arts.

(8.25.) DR. TANNER: This is really an important point, and I should like to secure attention to it. The proposition for the additional tax is supported by the argument that it is to provide for the existing drink evil a cure, but in this those who use spirits in medicines are in no way concerned. I have brought this Amendment forward with the best intentions, and the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in calling it a theoretical point; I support it from a purely practical point of view. There are, at the present time, certain classes of manufacturers who are exempted from this tax. For instance, hat manufacturers are permitted, under stringent restrictions, to buy, minus the duty, at the actual commercial price of spirits. Surely, what is allowed in the case of hat manufacturers might be allowed in this case. Instead of raising a theoretical or obstructive point I contend I have really raised a point my opinions as to which will be endorsed by nine-tenths of the member of my profession throughout Great Britain. I had hoped that the Government would have given some assurance that steps will be taken to lower the price of the medicines affected by this tax. I am extremely sorry to have to say I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has met my proposal in an unworthy spirit. I am only doing my duty to the poor; because the House should bear in mind that when a small addition is made to a tax it will not affect the large manufacturers so much as it will affect the smaller manufacturers, and it will certainly affect the poor, because whenever any addition is made to the taxes relating to medicines of this class the dealers often raise the prices, so that in this way the poorer classes really suffer from this kind of legislation. The right hon. Gentleman said that this would affect the Excise as well as the Customs; but even if it does, that would only be a small matter. I think the proposal, if accepted, will do a great deal to relieve the wants and necessities of the poor, and I am sorry the Government have not seen their way to accept it. I shall certainly press the matter to a Division.

(8.33.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I am, of course, against the raising of the duty on spirits, and I should be glad to be able to support my hon. Friend in his Amendment if I possibly could. As to what my hon. Friend has said about these medicines being compounded in bond, I think there is some difficulty in that. My hon. Friend must have had in his mind the fact that by law it is enacted that whiskies in Ireland that are blended for the purpose of exportation shall be blended in bond and marked with the letter "B." But it must not be omitted from the consideration of this subject that that portion of the question deals with large quantities of spirits, while this portion of the question raised by my hon. Friend deals with a comparatively small portion of these commodities. What I am afraid of is that a great amount of injury might be inflicted on many persons by this Amendment. The Member for Kilkenny has said it would have the effect of concentrating the trade in these medicines in the hands of large manufacturers, and I ask the Committee whether that is a desirable thing to have in view or not. I should like to have some explanation on that point from my hon. Friend, because I, for one, shall always oppose any legislation that has for its object the placing and concentrating in the hands of large manufacturers any important branch of trade whatever. I know, for a fact, that many chemists throughout the country are obliged to hold in stock small quantities of spirits that are many degrees over proof—spirits of wine, for instance. Well, we must do one of two things in this matter. We must either compel all medicines to be compounded in bond, or we must prohibit these small people from holding any strong spirits on their hands in stock. We must assuredly do one of these two things, and let us take care that, while we have a supreme desire to benefit the poor, we do not inflict a great injury upon a large number of traders in the country, who dispense very wholesome drugs to the poor, and who are, therefore, beneficial to the poor. Are we going to drop these small traders who are in contact with the poor, and who do their best for the poor? These objections would trouble my mind if I were to vote for the Amendment. If my hon. Friend can remove these objections I shall certainly be most happy to support the proposal. But if there is to be an increase of duty on spirits let it be an increase all round. I believe we should create a greater evil if the Amendment were carried than the one sought to be remedied by its adoption. I trust that my hon. Friend will be able to remove the objections to which I have called attention. (8.45.)

(9.9.) DR. TANNER: Sir, I moved this Amendment in the interest of the poorer classes of Ireland; but, inasmuch as the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not intend to give ear to it, I shall not press the matter any further, though I shall certainly go to a Division.

*(9.20.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I propose to move the rejection of this clause, because it constitutes the first stone in the erection of the Government Local Budget; and, so far as Scotland is concerned, her protest may be best made by moving the rejection of this clause. The right hon. Gentleman, by this clause, proposes a Customs Duty on foreign spirits, but that is only a part of the scheme to levy a Local Budget Duty on spirits and beer, to be distributed between the three countries. I protested, on the introduction of the Chancellor's scheme, against the proposal of a tax of 6d. a gallon on spirits and whisky, and an extra 3d. a barrel on beer. I did so on the ground that that was most unequal and inequitable on the respective liquors of Scotland and Ireland and England, greatly to the advantage of England, and that it was an injustice done to Scotland and Ireland, aggravated by the circumstance that it was proposed that the whole fund thus raised should be one fund devoted to local purposes amongst all countries. I am quite aware that the right hon. Gentlemen will attach no importance to anything I can say in the way of argument, but I think I can adduce to him the statements and arguments of an authority he will accept. He will not, for instance, altogether throw overboard the President of the Board of Trade, who, in 1885, took the lead in resisting a similar proposal when made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh. The President of the Board of Trade argued that the original proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was bad enough. That was to put 2s. a gallon tax on whisky. But he said that if the proposed tax were reduced to 1s., the result would be even worse; that it would be impossible for the dealer to raise the price of the commodity, and that the tax would lead to the deterioration or unwholesomeness of the article. Again, the President of the Board of Trade said if a man wanted to buy a higher class of article made from the best malt he would find it adulterated either with very inferior sherry or with spirits made from rice. Such was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the present President of the Board of Trade, and in stating the case for Scotland, I will do it in the words of a supporter of the existing Government, the Member for Dumbartonshire, who, in a Debate which took place in 1885, said he had intended to move an Amendment, but had omitted to put it on the Paper. The effect of that Amendment was that the proposed increase of 2s. per gallon in the duty on spirits was unjust and inequitable to Scotland and Ireland, and that no increased duty should be placed on spirits until wine, beer, ale, and porter, were charged an equal duty; and, further, that considering 1,711 stills had been detected during the previous two years, it was inexpedient to make any increase in the duty charged on spirits. The hon. Member who should have moved this Amendment, went on to show that the high duty on spirits was of comparatively modern origin, and added that, while no one would dare to propose that Scotland and Ireland should pay double the Income Tax paid by England, the then duty on spirits made Scotland pay, for the alcohol there consumed, an amount larger than double the Income Tax she paid in 1883. This is not my argument, but one put forward by one of the right hon. Gentleman's most devoted supporters, who showed that it was not until 1860 that the Whisky Duty reached its present high figure. The hon. Baronet also said "he knew the increased duty was supported by teetotalers and others, on moral grounds, but, in his belief, there were no higher principles of morality than truth and justice, while there was no lower form of morality than cant and hypocrisy in defence of injustice; and he held that anyone, acquainted with the facts, who yet supported these duties on alcoholic drinks on the ground of morality, shut out all sense of justice from his mind." For my part I should hardly like to use language such as that, but I have no hesitation in calling the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the language of one of his supporters, in order to show the deteriorating influence it must have on, at least, that Member of his Party if he persists in the suicidal course on which he has embarked. My objection to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal is vastly intensified since the figures in its defence have been before the House, for anything more destructive of his argument it is hardly possible to conceive. The Secretary to the Treasury told us that when the Probate Duty was allocated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer he had to determine the respective shares to be allocated to the three countries, and he had decided that the true principle was not to take the amount of Probate Duty paid by each, but to take the total contribution of each country to the Imperial Taxation. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not done this; for he has allocated the License Duties to the different countries on the amounts raised in each, and he also proposed to deal with the Wheel Tax not in regard to the common fund, but to allocate the money to the countries according to the amounts raised in those countries. And now he proposes to raise a sum of money which would be, roughly, what would have been raised by the Wheel Tax for local purposes in England. And how does he propose to do it? We were told the other night that we were too well off. We were told that the percentage of contributions paid were 82·6 by England, 10·5 by Scotland, and 6·9 by Ireland, and that England received less than she paid, whilst Scotland received £18,846 more than she, and Ireland £57,000 more than she paid. He proposes to remedy that so far as Scotland is concerned by making her pay £76,000 more than she receives. The inference to be drawn from this proposal is too obvious to need re-enforcement—that I only trust that the people of Scotland will derive a correct impression from the figures. None will more readily appreciate their injustice. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will reply “You take simply the Spirit Duty,” but I do that because it is the only new duty proposed to be raised. No extra duty on beer is proposed in the Bill before the House, and this £76,000 on spirits is to be raised in order that it may be sent into England and applied to a purpose of which we do not approve. A Return presented to the House in the course of last week shows that England contributes £177,000 more than she receives of the Probate Duty, and Scotland is £69,600 less. I would beg the House to look for a moment at the principle on which the grant was allocated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that instead of giving grants in aid, which only led to extravagance, half the Probate Duty would be given to the Local Authorities, who, by being left to make the best of it, would be stimulated to economy. At the time that grant was made Scotland received £234,000, and, according to the Secretary to the Treasury, she ought to have received, on strict principles of justice, £11,000 less. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, wishing to be generous, gave 11 per cent. instead of 10½ per cent. to which she was entitled. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now comes down and says that the Probate Duty in England has increased, and Scotland will receive an undue benefit. That shows the vice of the whole system of this allotment by the Exchequer. If a fixed sum had been given out of the Consolidated Fund, instead of a share of the Probate Duty, that would have remained stationary, and there would have been no dislocation in the equity of the arrangement. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to make any calculations he should base them on the £234,000 intended to be granted to Scotland, and not on the £264,000 which he estimates will be given to Scotland in the next year. That would leave a continued benefit to the extent of only £39,000, instead of £69,000. Now he proposes to impose a tax upon Scotland by which she will have to pay £76,000 more than she receives.

MR. GOSCHEN : I don't find the £76,000 on the Return.

*DR. CAMERON : No, the right hon. Gentleman does not find that, but he will find the materials for arriving at it. He has carefully concealed the £76,000. I will tell him how he can find it. If he will look at the amount of the Spirit Duty on page 5 he will find the amount that England, Scotland, and Ireland get on the basis of 80 per cent., 11 per cent. and 9 per cent., and he will find what they pay by omitting in Table 2 the item beer, and adding together the contribution from British spirits and foreign spirits. In this way he will find that Scotland will have to pay £76,000 more than she receives. I contend, also, that the assumption of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the larger consumption of foreign spirits in England equalises the tax is erroneous, and I would point out that it is shown in a Return that the quantities of foreign spirits consumed in the three Kingdoms contradicted his assertion. The percentage of Scotland is 10·7, almost exactly the proportion proposed to be returned to the country. The amount of the tax on a gallon of proof spirit contained in beer is only 1s. 8d., and on whisky it is 10s. The right hon. Gentleman says that beer sustains a man—that it is a food. Well, in Scotland there is a superstition that whisky sustains a man. I have noticed, however, that when a man takes too much beer, or too much whisky, so far from its sustaining him he has generally difficulty in sustaining himself. But the right hon. Gentleman says beer is food, and that, therefore, it should not be taxed in the same way as spirits, whilst alcohol is simply an intoxicant, which should be taxed to any extent. Well, I do not object to the right hon. Gentleman taxing alcohol to any extent he likes, compatible with the prevention of illicit distillation. I do not object to his taxing it for local purposes, provided he gives the proceeds of the tax to local purposes. But I certainly do object very strongly to his imposing an extra tax of 1d. a gallon on the alcohol in beer in England, while he imposes an extra 6d. a gallon on the alcohol in whisky in Scotland, and then dividing the proceeds equally between the two countries. It is grossly unfair to do this, and lump together all the proceeds for the purpose of buying up licences, superannuating police, and mitigating rates, both in England and Scotland. When are we to have finality in this matter? Because the receipts from the Probate Duty have somewhat differed from the expectations of the right hon. Gentleman, he now proposes a new tax. The right hon. Gentleman thinks no one can get fat on whisky. I would remind him, however, that the fattest Member who ever sat in this House, in my recollection, was a man who eschewed beer as a poison, and who was celebrated for his strict adherence to whisky, and could carry a large amount of it. To my mind, the alcohol in beer and the alcohol in whisky have precisely the same effects. They may stimulate the nutritive functions to a certain extent; and, in the case of some persons, each of them may produce fatness, and in the case of others each may lead to leanness. Well, supposing whisky comes to be adopted in England as an anti-fat stimulant, in accordance with the right hon. Gentleman's notions, and it appears that, on the allocation, Scotland is getting more than her contribution out of the new fund, is the right hon. Gentleman again coming to Scotland to tax bag-pipes, haggises, kilts, and oatmeal? If the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to give each country the proceeds of its own tax on alcohol I should have been quite content. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, on page 2, to leave out Clause 4.—(Dr. Cameron.)

(9.50.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I entirely agree with the arguments of my hon. Friend. I am quite agreeable that the tax on whisky should be made as high as it possibly can be without producing smuggling, but I do object to the gross injustice of taxing the whisky in Scotland when you do not give an equivalent tax to England. My hon. Friend has said, with perfect truth, that there is not a word about imposing a duty on beer in the Bill before the House. Last year it was discovered that the basis on which the tax on beer was imposed was not a fair basis, and did not entirely fulfil the original object with which the tax was imposed. It was, therefore, necessary to make some slight variation in regard to the strength. The tax was not imposed for any special purpose, but for general financial considerations, and it, therefore, cannot be brought into comparison with the tax which it is now sought to place on whisky for the special purpose of local taxation. It is altogether misleading to ear-mark a particular tax in the way proposed. The arrangement suggested is of the most inequitable character. The tax on the alcohol in beer will amount to about one-sixth of the tax on alcohol in whisky. The Chancellor of the Exchequer justifies this on the ground that beer is, to a certain extent, food. Well, Sir, in Scotland we combine the consumption of whisky with the consumption of food. We used to hear a great deal about a concoction called Athol-brose, a mixture of whisky, oatmeal, and milk. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the whisky in brose ought to be taxed at six times the amount at which beer is taxed? This is a case in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not dared to face the great brewing interests of England. These interests are very powerful in this country, and he dared not face them. I shall have very great pleasure in supporting my hon. Friend's Amendment.

(10.0.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not know whether I ought to move to report Progress; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not seem inclined to reply to the arguments which have been used.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Amendment has not been put from the Chair.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then the Chairman was wrong in calling on me. I venture to differ altogether from the right hon. Gentleman, because to suppose that the clause was to be put from the Chair is to suppose a very unusual thing. I understand the clause was put in the usual way; but the right hon. Gentleman has been so anxious for Progress that he has forgotten the promise he made to us earlier in the evening.

(10.2.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am surprised at the observations of the hon. Member; I was waiting to have the opportunity of hearing other Members who might get up before I made my reply. One of the main points put by the two hon. Members who have just spoken is that the Beer Duty is an old duty which is re-imposed this year. That may technically be so; but when the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) says that I am frightened of the brewing interests, I must point out that a more ridiculous statement was never made in the House. I should have thought that to fight the whole of Scotland was a much more difficult matter than to fight the brewers of England. The hon. Member may not have read the declarations I made last year with regard to the Beer Duty. I stated that the remission of the extra 3d. should be taken into consideration side by side with any general reduction in the tax. When I proposed the increase in the duties on spirits I felt that an increase of 3d. should be levied on beer, and it is certain that the proceeds of the 3d. will be devoted to local purposes in Scotland, Ireland, and England. The hon. Member does not deny that?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do deny it.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, considering that the whole plan is that the proceeds should be distributed among the three countries, I do not understand his denial. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) charged me with having imposed this duty in order to rectify an increase which has taken place. I would point out to him that the Probate Duty is levied in much larger proportions in England than in Scotland or Ireland. Would the hon. Member be prepared to have each of the three duties distributed in the proportions in which they are collected in the three countries? I think he would make a bad bargain for Scotland if he adopted the suggestion. I turn to the general question of the imposition of this duty. If hon. Members will read up the history of the Spirit Duties they will see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has repeatedly laid down the proposition that the taxation of spirits stands on a different footing from the taxation of beer or any other article. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed the opinion that spirits should be taxed as highly as possible short of producing illicit distillation. The hon. Member for Glasgow has contended that the tax ought not to be put on whisky as compared with beer, and it is in reply to that portion of his argument that I think I am fairly justified in quoting the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I am prepared to contend that we are entitled to increase the duty upon spirits. Hon. Members have spoken as if the whole increase is intended for the purpose of buying up licences. But there are many other purposes served by this increase of duty, amongst others being the additional endowment of national teachers in Ireland, amounting to £77,000. I shall be perfectly prepared to argue with hon. Members from Scotland or Ireland as to how far this particular duty ought to be allocated for local purposes; but this clause simply imposes a duty on foreign spirits, and I think that the hon. Member for Glasgow can scarcely contend that that duty weighs with any unfairness upon Scotland.

(10.15.) COLONEL NOLAN: The First Lord of the Treasury and the President of the Board of Trade have run away. The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr.

Jackson) is obliged to stay to assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he really must be ashamed of himself on the present occasion. The hon. Gentleman assisted us in turning out the Liberal Government on this very question. I acknowledge the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes to this question unspotted and unstained. He voted for the taxation of spirits in 1885, but the whole of the Conservative Party demanded the importation. They said it was a crying iniquity to tax spirits and beer unless wine was also taxed. They went to the country on the question, but now that the election is over they evidently think this a nice time to increase the tax on whisky. It is rather amusing to read what was said by prominent Members of the Conservative Party at that time. The President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) proposed—

“That this House regards the increase proposed by this Bill on the duties levied on beer and spirits as inequitable in the absence of a corresponding addition to the duties on wine.”

The Liberal Budget was unfair to the whole country, because it proposed to increase the tax on beer as well as spirits, but this Budget proposes to increase the duty on spirits only, which, I contend, is most inequitable and unfair to Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer argues that Ireland gets more than her share through the Probate Duty grant, but he himself picked out the Probate Duty; if he had fixed upon the Succession Duty Ireland would have stood in a far more favourable position. Under the proposed arrangement our country will pay more than she receives. It has been pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian raised the tax on whisky. That is the only blot on the right hon. Gentleman's name; but still Mr. Disraeli raised the tax on Irish whisky; indeed, every English Government since 1814 has raised the tax on such spirit. Possibly you may, by these increases, force the people to drink beer instead of whisky, but then you will force them into the poorhouses, because they will be unable to work. I consider the proposal a most unfair one. As I have said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been consistent, but what has the First Lord of the Treasury to say in defence of this increase, considering that he voted against the increase in 1885?

(10.18.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to be permitted to read a few extracts from the speeches of leading Members of the Conservative Party, when, in 1885, they denounced as immoral and tyrannical the imposition of this tax by the Liberal Party. I am glad to see the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton) in his place, because he was one of the chief opponents, in 1885, of this immoral Whisky Tax. [Lord G. HAMILTON: Oh!] Oh, yes; Hansard never lies. The noble Lord was most eloquent in his denunciation of this tax, and so was the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) not five years ago, and yet the Conservative Party have managed in that time to forswear every opinion they held on this question. The President of the Board of Trade, speaking on the 8th of June, 1885, was not only most eloquent upon the subject of the increase of the Spirit Duty, but Mr. Courtney, he wept, I may say, alcoholic tears at the very idea that there would be adulteration of the drink of the poor man. He was afraid of illicit distillation, but, above all, he was afraid of the addition of the murderous German potatoe spirit to the drink of the working classes. The right hon. Gentleman showed that the whisky production of Ireland and Scotland was the chief article of commerce in those countries, and he wept over the fact that the whiskey trade was already decaying. He added—

“The Government have selected for increased taxation two important British and Irish trades, already heavily taxed, and by no means so prosperous as they were formerly, and have added insult to injury, because at the very same moment when they impose this increased taxation on these trades, they are proffering a boon to the foreign producer of the very article—namely the strongest class of wine—which principally competes with these home industries.”

A moment or two afterwards the First Lord of the Admiralty jumped up and said—

“Lord Beaconsfield once observed that the Radical Party were friends of every country in the world but their own.”

The noble Lord attacked Sir Charles Dilke, and said—

“The great mass of the Radical Clubs who supported the right hon. Baronet had beer and spirit licences: and to support pothouse politicians out of doors and denounce them in the House of Commons was nothing but clap-trap."

Then he said—

"Of course, any taxation was unpopular; still, it was remarkable that whenever it was proposed to tax any home produce, the Radical Party were dumb; but when it was proposed to tax an article of foreign produce they raised every possible objection."

I wonder who are the dumb now. To turn back to the President of the Board of Trade, let me say that what troubled his mind most was the introduction of terribly poisonous spirit into the beverage of the poor man. This fear caused him to assist in turning out a Government that was carrying out the law in Ireland with energy and vigour, which I understand to be the great credit of hon. Gentlemen opposite. You forget every question when Ireland comes up. No matter what blunders are committed by other Members of the Government, the one Member who shines out above all others is the Chief Secretary, and the people are asked to support him as the true man, even though all the others have proved faithless. But in 1885 the President of the Board of Trade had great concern for the consumer of spirits. He said—

"I fear that the consumer of spirits will be too often maddened by raw spirits sold to him by persons who will not be able, owing to the increased taxation, to bear the necessary expense of mellowing their spirits by keeping them in bond."

You are a great Party. You talked like this in 1885; but now, in order to establish and endow the bung—the publican—you swallow all your former speeches. I will not go through the speeches of some Members of the rank and file of the Party opposite. There was Mr. Orr Ewing, who, I believe, was a most respectable Scotch Member. He grew furious at the proposed taxation of the beverage produced on his native heath; and then there were the Allsopps, who are here by the score, and who will support you in the Lobby in a few minutes, never thinking that there ever was such a year as 1885. But now I come to the Excise section. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has denounced the German spirit. We all know he has a close acquaintance with German spirit. Is there any intention of carrying out these suggestions made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite in the memorable year 1885? Radicals, we know, are friends of every country but their own; but I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not ready to sacrifice the produce of this United Kingdom in the interest of Germany. I believe a lot of this German spirit is, or was, made by Prince Bismarck; but he is no longer in Office, and, therefore, this cannot influence the present Government. The Germans can send spirits into this country, at the price of 9d. a gallon, and though this stuff, as a friend of mine said, is only fit for lighting lamps, this same spirit is blended with Scotch and Irish whisky under the very nose of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the mixture is sent through the country to deceive consumers into the belief that it is Scotch or Irish whisky. It is no more entitled to the name of whisky than to be called beer or champagne. I denounce this practice which allows this poisonous compound to be sold at 15s. to 17s. a gallon. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is no friend to German spirit. Why does he not do justice to native spirit, and put an extra tax on this foreign spirit, and provide that it shall be illegal to sell it under the name of whisky? He might punish an evasion of such a law, as the Treasury dropped upon the gentlemen who attempted to concoct sparkling wines in bond. No; the right hon. Gentleman would do nothing of the sort when the suggestion was made. He suggests, when we raise a point, that we shall let it stand over for the next clause, and when the next clause is reached we are told the opportunity is passed. Now, I think the time to discuss this question of this German spirit is on the German Clause; and I ask the right hon. Gentleman what he intends to do? Are we to continue to pay 10s. 6d. duty whether we get Irish whisky or German spirit? Has the right hon. Gentleman no regard for the consumer or the interests of law and order? Yes; I assert that this vile, adulterated concoction is a cause of much violent crime and disorder—this spirit at 9d. a gallon, similar to that which is known in India, I believe, as "fixed bayonets"—but there it is supposed to be arrack. This poison should never be allowed to be sold as whisky. I make a suggestion that will greatly ease the situation so far as Ireland and Scotland are concerned. The original meaning of whisky was a spirit from a pot still of three or four runnings, and made from malt or barley; but this foreign spirit is made from potatoes or from wood, treated with sulphuric acid. But in this clause the nomenclature is most unfair. "Spirit" only is mentioned, as if the Excise and Customs know no distinction, and regard all alike from an Excise point of view; and if 10s. 6d. a gallon can be collected it does not matter what the consumer gets. You have enormous distillers in the three Kingdoms. Is it fair to these traders to allow this free admixture of this 9d. spirit under the eyes of the Excise? I submit this stuff ought to be stopped at the ports and branded as poison or something of the kind, for it is no more fit for human consumption than so much oil of vitriol. Yet the Government absolutely encourage the importation, and when it is sent out again to exercise its civilising influence in Africa or South America they allow a drawback upon it. The whole question is treated from a purely fiscal and Chancellor's point of view, and no attempt is made to prevent the consumer being deceived. When we hear of these murders in England, of a character to make an Irishman's hair stand on end; when we hear of Englishmen kicking their wives to death; when we hear of the murders here in proportion of four to one in Ireland, we can, to a large extent, trace these things as the result of the maddening effect of this German spirit, the trade in which the Customs and Excise arrangements encourage. It is time our manufacturers lifted their voices in emphatic protest against this system by which the trade in this spirit made from potatoes, wood, or rags is given the Government stamp of respectability.

*(10.45.) Mr CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): When, five years ago, I received such a denunciation from the present President of the Board of Trade because I proposed an increase in the Spirit Duties, I little thought the Nemesis would come so soon, or that it would come through the action of one of his Colleagues, a right hon. Friend of mine who supported me in 1885; and is therefore, perhaps, more entitled to take this course now. I do not think right hon. Gentlemen will easily forget those Debates of 1885; at all events, they have not been allowed to forget them to-night. Two distinct questions arise on this clause; there is the question which has been well argued by the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down as to how German and other raw spirit should be allowed to go into consumption, and the other question is in reference to the allocation of the amount raised. Upon the first question I will only say that I think the time has come when it might be dealt with, I mean what restrictions as to its age should be placed on spirit containing much fusil oil. When I was at the Exchequer I had the matter before me, but at that time it was a new question, and the Revenue officers were tolerably strong in the opinion that not much could be done; but I have reason to believe that now that opinion is much altered. I gather from the nod of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he agrees with me, and that it is a question that must be dealt with ere long. Whether it would be better to prohibit the sale of spirits within a certain time of distillation, and whether there should be special treatment for imported spirits, I do not profess to judge; but I am quite sure the question is one that will have to be dealt with, and I hope before this discussion is over we shall have a word or two from the Government upon it. The branch of the question that was so well put by the Member for Glasgow is whether we should allow this clause to pass having regard to its sole object, which is the allocation of the money between the different parts of the United Kingdom. Looking at the figures, I come to the conclusion that the distribution proposed by the Government is not fair. It is said that we have to deal both with spirits and beer. I deny altogether that it is fair to consider beer—first, because the Beer Duty was settled in a previous Session; and, secondly, because there are really no reliable statistics as to the consumption of beer. We have reliable statistics as to the consumption of spirits, because spirits cannot be removed from one part of the United Kingdom to another, except under a permit; but no permit is necessary for the removal of beer, and the result is that the quantity of beer transferred from one country to another is estimated, as we are told, in a note to the Return, solely from information supplied by a few leading firms. Now, I entirely dispute the propriety of Parliament founding such an important division of revenue on such information. It is only right that the allocation, as far as beer is concerned, should be based on something more exact. The actual percentages of spirits consumed in the three countries are 67 per cent. for England, 19 per cent. for Scotland, and 14 per cent. for Ireland. If beer is also included, as I trust it cannot be, the percentages are 73, 15, and 12 respectively. It is proposed, however, to give 80 per cent. to England, 11 per cent. to Scotland, and only 9 per cent. to Ireland. I maintain on the face of these figures, compiled from official statements, that this is an unfair provision, and I hope the Committee will reject the proposal of the Government.

(10.55.) MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman has certainly effected a great change in his opinions now that he has become a Scotch Member from those he held when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. He now proposes on this question of the Spirit Duties to make the division on a principle that will give the advantage to Scotland and Ireland as against England. The Probate Duty was distributed according to the proportion in which the three countries were supposed to contribute towards it, and that is the principle which is adopted in the present case. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that one principle should be applied when it is favourable to Scotland and Ireland, and another when it is adverse to those countries. England has lost by the Probate Duty, and gained something by the Spirit Duty; but the loss on the Probate Duty is greater than the gain on the Spirit Duty. I am willing to accept either the one or the other principle, but it is preposterous to apply the one principle in the one case and another principle in an analogous case.

*MR. CHILDERS: It is not a question of collection but of consumption, which is a totally different thing.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is not a question of consumption or collection; it is the point of view of who bears the taxation, and in reference to the Spirit Duty the right hon. Gentleman would adopt a totally different principle.

*MR. CHILDERS: I quite concur as to spirits, for which we have accurate statistics, but we have none for the Probate Duty, and I accepted the settlement of 1888 as a fair estimate.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Probate Duty was distributed according to the proportion the different countries were estimated to contribute to Imperial Taxation, and that is the principle now adopted. The question of foreign spirit is scarcely germane to this particular Amendment. I have, however, stated that the question of retaining spirits in bond and the question of German spirit are under consideration. I will consider whether it should be examined, not only from an Excise and Customs point of view, but also from a medical and scientific point of view. I propose that the German spirits should be examined in order to ascertain whether there is any truth in the statement that they contain deleterious substances; but this is a matter that is scarcely germane to the clause.

(11.0.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not propose to go into the question of whether justice is given to Scotland and Ireland by the division of the Probate Duty. It is quite enough to refer to the fact that in 1885 all the Members on the Ministerial Bench, except the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were strongly against the policy which they now support. It appears to me that in order to meet the arguments as to the injustice done to England and Scotland, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been obliged to fall back upon the Probate Duty of last year, and to put that forward as redressing the inequality of which he does not deny the existence. It is really the fact that the Budget can be defended only by going back upon the Probate Duty of last year. I shall vote against the clause, but not because I object on general principle to raising the Spirit Duty. As far as I am concerned, I am very sorry that the Amendment for reducing the amount of the Spirit Duty, which stands upon the Paper, by some accident was not moved. It was quite intended the reduction should have been moved, because what would have been left of the Spirit Duty would have been quite sufficient for all the purposes contemplated by the Government other than compensation for public house licences. I hope that the question may be raised in that form upon the Excise Clause. Taking this clause as a whole, I regard it as having for its main object to obtain the money with which to pay compensation to brewers for licences, and therefore I shall have no hesitation in voting against it.

(11.3.) COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to point out that we in Ireland did not accept the distribution of the Probate Duty without protest, because we deemed it most unfair. The whole result of the operations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is most unfair to Ireland, because its share of Probate Duty is very small, as that is a tax which is much more productive in England than in Ireland, and the unfair allocation of the Spirit Duty aggravates the grievance of Ireland.

(11.5.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I think it is only fair that English Members should take some part in this Debate. In some parts of the country, and especially in Cornwall, in which I am more particularly interested, there is a very strong feeling on this question, and I think the time is come when we should enter our protest against the whole policy of the Government in connection with this tax. The Government have little hope of winning any support in Scotland or Ireland; indeed, they did not the other day venture to contest the return to this House as Member for Mid Tipperary my fellow criminal; while as to Scotland the only scintilla of hope they have had was in the election at Ayr Burghs. Surely it was very unkind of them to reward their friends in that constituency by thus increasing the Spirit Duty. On the other hand, the Government have everything to fear from the defection of the brewers, who are a strong electioneering force in England, and, notably, in the southern part of the island; and this is the explanation of their policy. They have held out to them a gigantic bribe for their votes and influence at the next election, and they may reasonably fear that if they fail to carry their proposal that election will result unfavourably to them. It is very amusing to hear the right hon. Gentleman, who has deserted his former chief, always relying on the financial authority of that greatest of modern Financial Authorities—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I always notice that when right hon. Gentlemen opposite get into any difficulty, they find it convenient to quote the right hon. Gentleman as their authority. They practice what they do not preach, and if their leaders only had the honesty to stand by their principles it would be more reputable on their part. Though we may be all agreed as to the desirability of taxing spirits with a view to preventing intemperance, we are not all at one as to the wisdom of utilising the proceeds of the tax for the purpose of pensioning off publicans. I should prefer to see no taxation of spirits at all, rather than that, by means of the taxation, we should confer on the publicans a vested interest which has hitherto been denied to them. There are minor reasons for opposing this proposal, but perhaps it is hardly worth while emphasising them, seeing that they have already been raised by other speakers in the course of this Debate. But, before I resume my seat, I should like to state that I entirely sympathise with those who have argued against the impolicy of heavily taxing native spirits to the great advantage of the filthy potations which the Germans send over here. We are being flooded with Germans and German articles, with German waiters, and with German potato-spirit of a most poisonous character, and we have actually got a German Hebrew trying to force his way into this House for the purpose of undermining the political Constitution of this country.

(11.16.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I think there is a general misconception as to the position of the tax on beer. My hon. Friend has contended that no new tax is being imposed, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has contradicted that statement. There seems to be a general impression that last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer imposed an additional tax on beer for Imperial purposes, and that he now proposes to transfer that tax to local purposes. That is not the case. There has been no additional tax on beer at all. I will read the words of the right hon. Gentleman in his Budget speech last year. He said—

"I have still to find £300,000. This I propose to effect by doing an act of justice and reparation to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I must ask the Committee to carry its mind back to the year 1880, when the right hon. Gentleman substituted a Beer Duty for the duty on malt and certain other duties connected with the manufacture of beer which had previously existed. The problem he had to solve was to place such a tax upon beer as would be a full equivalent for the duties which were abolished, and give a slight advantage to the Revenue. He did this by assuming that two bushels of malt would yield 36 gallons of beer of a specific gravity of 1055, and by imposing a tax of 6s. 3d. either on the two bushels of malt or on the 36 gallons of beer of a specific gravity of 1055. A great resistance was offered by the representatives of the brewers' interests, who asserted that the imposition of 6s. 3d. on 36 gallons of beer of the specific gravity of 1055 would give a great deal more than the right hon. Gentleman estimated. . . . In the long-run it has been proved that my right hon. Friend was entirely right. Still, the right hon. Gentleman yielded to the brewers' contention, and raised the standard of specific gravity from 1055 to 1057. What I propose to do is to revert to the original proposal of the right hon. Gentleman."

It is evident that, from 1880 to 1889, the brewers were not paying their full share of taxation; they were, instead, putting the money into their pockets. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer rectified the injustice. Therefore it is not right to say that the right hon. Gentleman has put any additional tax whatever on beer.

(11.20.) MR. J. M'CARTHY: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will now allow me to say what I would have said earlier in the evening had not the right hon. Gentleman closed me. I do not often take part in the Debates of the House—

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that I did not see who was the person in possession of the House. [Cries of "Oh."] What do hon. Members mean by saying "Oh?" Surely they accept my statement? I give my assurance to the hon. Member, knowing his position in the House, that I did not know he was the Member who had risen.

MR. J. M'CARTHY: I entirely accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman had he seen me would not have stopped me, as I do not usually occupy the House at any length, and never speak unless I think I have something to say. What I want to point out is that we have had no explanation from the Government as to their plan or method for utilising the machinery of Irish cities and towns for the purpose of dealing with this Licence Purchase Question. The question I wish to ask is whether the right hon. Gentleman can give a single precedent for raising a tax which is not to be applied within the year?

(11.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: My answer to the observations of the hon. Member is that Her Majesty's Government made an offer fairly to consider the question of this £40,000 being disposed of by the Municipal Authorities in Ireland. Soon after that it was said that some arrangement had been come to with the Town Clerk of Belfast, whose name I had never heard of, and then the hon. Member for Longford stated that the Irish Party could not consider the question of the administration of these funds by the Municipal Authorities until the municipal franchise had been reformed. I have never said that the Government withdrew their pledge, but they cannot undertake to alter the municipal franchise, or to deal with Municipal Government in Ireland, before they pass this Bill. That is the main point. As to the other point of the hon. Member, as to there being any precedent for the allocation of money the disposal of which has not been finally settled by Parliament, I would remind him that the allocation of the Probate Duty was made before the final disposition of the fund was settled. Let me remind the hon. Member that this £40,000 is only part of the sum dealt with in this Bill.

(11.26.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am very glad indeed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has proved, by the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that no additional duty has been put on beer, but that what was done last year was to rectify the duty imposed in 1880. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the duties on articles of ordinary consumption ought to be reduced; but is not whisky an article of ordinary consumption, and are you reducing the duty on that? No, you are increasing it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to put beer on the same footing as tea and currants; he says it ought not to be taxed. I utterly deny that, and I think the Government proposal is a most arbitrary one, not to be justified by the references to the allocation of the Probate duty.

(11.29.) Mr. ILLINGWORTH: I wish, before we go to a Division, to enter my protest against the Government scheme. This and the three following clauses are what I regard as the extension of a vicious system—a system of subvention from the Imperial Exchequer. It has been contended that this is a separate local Budget, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has entirely knocked that ground from under his feet. Now, what are the facts before us? It is bad enough when we are trying to raise the money wanted for Imperial taxation; but here the Government are proposing to create a tax for local purposes, which is designed to set Scotland and Ireland against England, while the people are being deluded by having the money taken out of one pocket for the purpose of having it put into the other. I wish to enter my protest against the mischievous and vicious system of subventions from the National Exchequer for local purposes, and I believe the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will, in a very short time, be condemned as mischievous to the last degree. If the local taxation of this country amounts to £40,000,000, and they want £4,000,000 more, surely the ratepayers will be courageous enough to raise the additional sum on the same system as the rest, without resorting to the juggling system of subventions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has attempted to deal with the gross injustice which will be caused by the dangerous proposal, first of all to tax Ireland without her consent, and then to tie up the money so that she cannot get the benefit of it. Surely Ireland is the last portion of the kingdom that ought to be experimented on in this way. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer saw the difficulty of establishing a Local Authority in Ireland to distribute the money, he ought to have left Ireland out altogether till such time as she might be able to distribute the money produceable by Irish taxation. What good can come of this legislation? It is a piece of legislation which the country will very shortly have to redress, and we shall then convict ourselves of having wasted the time of the House over so small a matter during a Session in which the Government have so many important measures which it declares must be passed into law.

(11.33.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: I wish to say a word or two in correction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is very hard for us struggling Irish Members to defend ourselves against his repeated charges of misrepresentation, because we venture to give our appreciation of his statements. Whenever we venture to challenge him, he says that when we come to the clause he will make his grand and final deliverance on the subject. I challenge him now to say whether the use of the Closure this evening was not justified on the ground that we should have sufficient discussion on this question when we came to this clause? We have only discussed the matter a very short time.

Mr. GOSCHEN: We have been discussing it since 9 o'clock.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I largely sympathise with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is in charge of the Bill, and is conducting it by himself, unsupported by any of his Colleagues who opposed the Whisky Bill of 1885. I feel for his position, alone as he is on that Bench. He says we have been discussing this matter since 9 o'clock, but, so far from that being the fact, not one word was uttered till the right hon. Member for Derby got up and asked a question. It was the Scotch clause we were discussing.

Mr. GOSCHEN: We ought not to discuss on this clause a question which is raised by a subsequent clause.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Then, when is this question to be discussed? Are we to be dodged about from clause to clause as if we were pursuing some "Will o' the Wisp?" What we are pursuing is the sum of £40,000, which is a very different thing, and what we want to get from the Government is on what clause we may discuss this subject. If the right hon. Gentleman would only say "on this or that particular clause I will make my announcement," we will stop instantly, but we cannot allow this question to remain in a kind of Parliamentary cloudland. The right hon. Gentleman is at present in a state of Parliamentary ineptness; he does not want to get along. The Chief Secretary has deserted him, and so long as he had that right hon. Gentleman by his side, he left the matter very much to him. Now, however, the Chief Secretary has gone, and this shows how beautifully united the Cabinet is. I deny the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that I object to his proposal on principle. What I said was that we should be glad to accept it if the Government would give us the same franchise that exists in England and Scotland. Nor did I charge the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with colluding with Mr. Black, of Belfast. I also introduced the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh, and it seems very strange that whenever I mention this subject the hon. Baronet immediately skedaddles out of the House. ["No, no!"] Oh, at present I see the hon. Baronet has taken up a very modest position. What I asserted was that the hon. Baronet, accompanied by Mr. Black, had taken a particular course, in order to put pressure on the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This discussion is quite irrelevant to the clause before the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I bow to your ruling, and I think the astonishing thing is that we have been able to get so far. I have only, in conclusion, to assure the House that our only anxiety in this matter is that if we are to be taxed, our money should not be hung up. I think it would be the proper thing, supposing the tax cannot be used for the extinction of public house licences, to refer the point to a small Committee, on which I should not object to see the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh taking the position of Chairman. In that way you might get out of the Constitutional difficulty in which you are now placed, namely, the raising of money which you do not know what to do with. For the first time, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed the House in this dilemma, and I deny and protest against his statement, repeated four times, that what occurred in 1888 is a precedent in this matter. The question of the Probate Duty was an entirely different question. It was not, as in this case, the imposition of a new tax. If it were a precedent at all, it was one invented by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. Here you seek to impose a tax on Irish commodities which the Irish people repudiate through their Representatives, and no one knows what is to become of the money. These are our objections to the clause.

(11.58.) DR. TANNER: I rise for the purpose of trying to move the exemption of a substance which has become very popular and useful, and beneficial to the public. I refer to chloroform, the application of which has been greatly successful in ameliorating human suffering. It was first used and turned to account by a French surgeon, and then was turned to account by an English surgeon, Mr. Lawrence, of St. Bartholomew's, and by Edinburgh surgeons, since which time it has come into general use. Because this drug has come into general use the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to think it right to tax it. The first time it was taxed was in 1856, when 3s. was put upon it. The increase now proposed is a very small one, namely, 1d., but I think that at a time like the present, when the anæsthetic is so extensively used, and is of incalculable value to humanity, the tax ought rather to be taken off than increased. If any non-medical Member of the House had an opportunity of seeing what my medical friends are in the habit of witnessing every day—the sufferings of unfortunate patients on the operating table—and if they could appreciate the terrible agony these people had to go through before anæsthetics were known, they would instead of increasing the tax upon chloroform, be only too anxious to do all in their power to take it off. I should like further to say that chloroform is more extensively used in the public hospitals nowadays than it was formerly—of course, in those hospitals supported by voluntary contributions—and, in view of those institutions especially, I think the tax an unfair one. And the more right hon. and hon. Gentlemen look into it the more they will see the inherent objection to the increase of the tax.

(12.1.) MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to interpose and to point out that if this clause is omitted the only result will be that the foreign manufactured article will come into this country duty free, and English manufactured chloroform will pay a higher duty. This clause is necessary in order to put the foreign and English manufactured articles on the same footing. The total amount of the tax which would be derived from this addition would only be about £7, and I trust, therefore, the hon. Member will see that the item is hardly worth while discussing.

(12.3.) DR. TANNER: Then will the right hon. Gentleman promise to give a rebate on English chloroform? When the right hon. Gentleman was introducing the Bill he made an allusion to Fair Trade in connection with currants, and there was a loud cheer from below the Gangway. Well, if he allows a rebate upon home spirits, why should he not do so in the case of home made chloroform? He says the amount of the increase is very small, if it is small why propose it? I think, instead of putting an increased tax upon these anæsthetics, the proper policy would be to take it off entirely. I want to force this point to a conclusion, and to ascertain whether the right hon. Gentleman, who is a supporter of coercion in Ireland, will also desire to deprive suffering mortality in England of the relief which is afforded them by this great invention. I shall press my Amendment to a Division, and I may say that I think the right hon. Gentleman should extend to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House that courtesy which they are in the habit of extending to him. There is another Amendment down in my name, and that is with reference to a substance known as sulphuric ether, which is used for flavouring foreign spirits. I will not propose that Amendment. There is also one as to "ether butyric," which is used, I am told, for purposes of adulteration. I shall not propose that either, but will confine myself to dealing with chloroform and collodion.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 25, to leave out the word "Chloroform."—

Question proposed "That the word 'Chloroform' stand part of the Clause."

*(12.5.) MR. CHILDERS: I hope hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway will not find it necessary to divide the House. I would point out to the hon. Member that chloroform is made in this country with spirit; the spirit is either distilled here or imported, and, therefore, has paid a duty, which duty is included in the price of the chloroform sold in London. If the Committee strike out this clause the effect will be that the foreigner will reap the advantage, for the difference to the English producer will be sufficient to destroy the trade. It will prohibit the production of chloroform in this country in favour of French manufactories, where a very large amount of this drug is made. What I would suggest is that the hon. Gentleman should not press this Motion; but if he could induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider whether it would not be possible, in the interest of the home manufacture of chloroform, to introduce some Excoise arrangement which would enable the British manufacturer to use spirit free of duty, as in the case of methylated spirit, it would be very desirable—assuming that, from the Revenue point of view, it was possible, and then there need be no duty on foreign chloroform.

(12.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I have understood that we are all Free Traders, and if Free Trade is to apply in some directions I do not see why it should not apply in this. I do not see why the British manufacturer should be ruined in order that the consumer may benefit. Why is the chloroform maker to get an advantage over the whiskey manufacturer? While we admit German postcards and German swords, and other articles of German manufacture into the country, why should we protect British chloroform against foreign chloroform? Why should not the chloroform trade be put on the same footing as the sugar bounties arguments advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier in the evening, and it would be unreasonable to attempt to commence the discussion of this clause at such an hour.

(12.36.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I would point out to the First Lord of the Treasury that he proposes to take the whole time of the House; and, that being so, to-morrow evening and Wednesday afternoon will be at his disposal. I think the Government have not considered their own harvest of opportunities in this matter. I would also point out that the present hour is equivalent to 20 minutes to 2 of the old time. The Government gain nothing by resisting the Motion to report Progress, and their position would be far stronger to-morrow night in moving to take private Members' time if no progress were made in the meantime. I protest against their present attitude as a most unreasonable one.

*(12.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am anxious to meet hon. Gentlemen as far as I can, but no suggestion has been made as to when the Bill can be got through Committee. Under these circumstances, we are clearly bound to make progress. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has said the Debate this evening has been a perfectly reasonable one. I have no wish to enter into any controversy with him on that point; but I have been present the greater part of the evening, and I could not help noticing a considerable amount of repetition. However that may be, I do not desire to enter into a contest as to the circumstances which render it necessary for us to ask the House to proceed somewhat longer than it has yet done.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Let us fight it out now.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the right hon. Gentleman state how much longer he will take to go on? [Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] That shows the temper of the Party opposite. The shouts of hon. Gentlemen simply show that the supporters of the Government will not listen even to the reasonable proposals of their own leader.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: There is one other consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is asking hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to swallow all their principles and to go directly in the teeth of the votes they gave in 1885. That ought not to be without some deliberation. I do not think the Government is well advised in following further the Times newspaper. The Times newspaper—[Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!"—the Times newspaper—[renewed cries of "Oh, oh!"—the Times newspaper—[renewed cries of "Oh, oh!" and counter cries of "Pigott!"]] The Government have been led far astray by taking the advice of the Times, and if they take it again they will only have to blame themselves for the consequences.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not desirous of entering into any controversy which can be avoided, but I think it is not unreasonable to ask the House to finish the 6th clause—["No, no!"—seeing that all the questions that it raises have been debated on the 4th clause. Clause 7 is the clause which raises the questions of interest for the Party opposite.

MR. HUNTER: It is most unreasonable to ask Scotch Members to debate a point of peculiar interest to them at a time when the proceedings of the House cannot be adequately reported. The Scotch case has not yet been dealt with because the Scotch Members were told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they could most properly plead their case on the 6th clause. Already the proposals of the Government have been condemned by two-thirds of the Scotch Members, and now the leader of the House is trying to force the Bill through at 10 minutes to 1 o'clock.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I assure the leader of the House, who, I am sure, does not wish to be unfair to the Irish Members, that they refrained from speaking on Clause 4 because they thought they could raise the Irish case best on Clauses 6 and 7, both of which raise questions of great importance. I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman also that, although a Division was challenged on Clause 5, we did not go to a Division, because we distinctly understood that if we did not the Government would not resist the Motion to report Progress.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I had no knowledge that influence was being brought to bear on hon. Members.

MR. SEXTON: There must have been some misapprehension; but hon. Gentlemen were led to believe that the Government would consent to report Progress. On that account we refrained from taking a Division on Clause 5. The right hon. Gentleman very naturally wishes to make progress, but surely the course proposed by him is not the one best calculated to expedite business. To expect that hon. Members can conveniently enter upon this discussion at so late an hour of the night is absurd. I warn the Government that if they enter upon it they will not finish the clause, even if they sit all night.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I was in consultation with my hon. Friend, and I know he abstained from making any observations upon Clause 4 because he thought the Irish case could be raised more properly upon Clause 6. I, myself, was prepared to make a few observations on the subject, but, holding the same opinion as my hon. Friend, I abstained from doing so. I also wish to assure the right hon. Gentleman that we did not divide on the last question because of the distinct assurance conveyed to us that the Government would consent to report Progress.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: By whom was the assurance given?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I will use the usual language employed in such cases. The information was conveyed to us by the ordinary channels by which such information is conveyed.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There was no authority whatever for such information.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I think there has been some misunderstanding between my hon. Friends below the Gangway and myself. It was thought desirable by my right hon. Friends on this Bench that the Government should not be put to the trouble of a Division on the 5th clause. I did my best to convey that view to hon. Members below the Gangway, and said that if that Division were not taken my right hon. Friends on this Bench would support the Motion for Progress. From my own point of view, and on my own authority, I also said I did not doubt that right hon. Gentlemen opposite would not persist in pressing the Bill further at so late an hour.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I think I may very properly make an appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury on the part of those Members who, like myself, have been sitting on Select Committees during the day. It is now 1 o'clock, and, unless there is a case of imperative public necessity, it is unfair and unreasonable to ask hon. Gentlemen to sit up longer after they have been here for 13 hours. Is there a case of imperative public necessity? There is a Rule of the House that only one stage of a Money Bill can be taken in the same day. Consequently, if the Government get Clause 6 to-night, they will still have to take the Report stage on Wednesday, and they cannot get the Third Reading before Thursday. The right hon. Gentleman has said he is prepared to ask the House to give him the whole of to-morrow and the whole of Wednesday. That will be a large appropriation of the time of private Members. The Government can thus secure the Third Reading on Thursday. They are, therefore, not entitled to put an unfair pressure upon a large section of the House, who are doing their duty to the best of their ability.

*(1.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: If the right hon. Gentleman and his friends will promise to assist the Government in getting the Bill through Committee to-morrow, I will at once consent to the Motion to report Progress. I have no desire to put undue pressure on hon. Members in any part of the House. But the Government are bound to endeavour to get this business through before Whitsuntide. As I say, if we get the promise I have suggested, I shall be exceedingly glad to fall in with the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman.

(1.1.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I protest against any species of bargain being entered into. This is an old plan of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. He takes important business in the middle of the night and then says, "I will allow you to go home immediately if you will make a bargain with me to agree to pass the Bill in a certain number of hours." I ventured to interpolate a remark when the right hon. Gentleman was speaking, which he at once took up. It was a simple remark, but it was a practical one. It was, "Let us fight it out." Why did

I say that? I said it because I am an old bird at this game. I knew what was going to happen. I saw the right hon. Gentleman come in ready to protest against our Motion to report Progress, and I saw hon. Members behind him who had returned from evening and dinner parties. I heard their shouts. I heard them calling upon their Friend the First Lord of the Treasury to put the Bill through by force. It is evident the right hon. Gentleman came in stolidly and obstinately determined, as far as possible, to get the 6th clause passed; and hon. Members had mustered in force to support him in that purpose. In vain did Gentlemen who represent Scotch and Irish constituencies point out that the matters raised by that clause would take hours to legitimately discuss. I can only repeat "Let us fight it out." It is no use appealing to the First Lord of the Treasury. I advise hon. Members around me to enter into no arrangement, but to fight this matter out.

(1.3.) COLONEL NOLAN: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that our constituents take very great interest in this subject, and may I ask him if it is fair at 1 o'clock in the morning to invite them, wearied and fagged as they are, to enter into a discussion upon this important question? How can we preach law and order to the people in the West of Ireland when the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chief Secretary insist on taxing them at such an hour of the night, and when it is totally impossible that the speeches of their Representatives can be published? I say that this is a most un-Constitutional act on the part of the Government, and that the people of Scotland and of Ireland will consider that this Conservative Ministry is acting in a most un-Constitutional manner in pressing the clause through at this hour.

*(1.6.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I and a large number of Irish Members took no part whatever in the discussion on Clause 4, because we preferred to reserve ourselves for the Debate on Clause 6, the proposals contained in which are causing great anxiety and a sense of injustice, both in Ireland and in Scotland. Hon. Members opposite who have not been in attendance during the Debate may be under the impression that we have been discussing the points raised by this clause during the whole of the evening, but we have been doing nothing of the kind. We have simply reserved ourselves for this clause. I hope the first Lord of the Treasury will listen to the voice of reason and will not try to carry this measure by force.

(1.8.) MR. CONYBEARE: Hon. Members opposite may cry "Divide," but if they had been here instead of dining out they would know I have not taken up much time in discussing this question to-night. I object to voting taxation at this late hour of the night and in this improper manner. I think it is a most improper practice, and I shall consider it my duty on all occasions, while I have the honour to occupy a seat in this House, to protest to the utmost of my ability against allowing Money Bills to come on at these irregular hours. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is very fond of appealing to the interests of the country, but I should like to know if he thinks he will be serving the best interests of this country by forcing us into an all night conflict? All night Sittings do not tend to the transaction of any real business. They simply raise up difficulties which confront the Government at later stages of the Bill. I appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury to assent to our very reasonable demand, and not to insist upon prolonging this wrangle. I refuse to lend myself to any bargain between the two Front Benches. I do not like bargains. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has clearly pointed out in his very forcible speech that there is nothing likely to prevent this Bill being got through before the Whitsuntide Recess, and I do trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman, now that we have spent three-quarters of an hour in discussing this question, will agree to the Motion.

MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(1.15.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 195; Noes 126.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

Question put accordingly, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

(1.25.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 127; Noes 194.—(Div. List, No. 96.)

(1.37.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I wish to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the majority of Scotch Members who are particularly interested in Clause 6, which raises a question affecting the imposition of the duty in Scotland, and which they are of opinion is grossly unfair in its character. I do not refer to the objects to which the tax is to be devoted. I refer merely to the comparison of the charge on the English, the Scotch, and the Irish people which is involved in the imposition of this duty. I believe most of us would not be unwilling to see an increase in the Spirit Duty, if accompanied by an increase on the liquor consumed in other parts of the United Kingdom. The Scotch Members think that the article of commonest consumption in Scotland—and this also applies to Ireland—is being taxed under this Bill to an extent very much in excess of the tax imposed on the article of the commonest consumption in England. The Scotch Members are prepared to lay their case before the Government and the country, but they cannot possibly do so at this hour of the night. It is absolutely necessary to the proper vindication of their case that the discussion shall take place at an hour when the Debate can be reported. If the discussion is taken now nothing will be gained, because I fear the arguments will be repeated on the Report stage; so that no time will be gained. I do not intend to move a dilatory Motion, but shall simply make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman.

*(1.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I fully recognise the conciliatory spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has made the appeal. If the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends are prepared to support the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton the Government will be most ready to meet those views. I think that view is exceedingly reasonable, and I shall be glad to meet it by reporting Progress, and taking the discussion to-morrow.

(1.41.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the people of Scotland take a deep interest in this question, and we shall not be doing our duty to our constituents by presenting our case at 2 o'clock in the morning. I beg to move that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Esslemont.)

(1.42.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The difference between the Government and the Opposition is not now very marked. It is understood that the Bill will be passed before Whitsuntide, and in those circumstances I cannot see that the Government have anything to gain by keeping the House longer. The clause in dispute may be discussed and disposed of on the following day. Besides, there is nothing said about the time of adjournment for the holidays on Friday.

(1.45.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, N.E., Rossendale): I think the hon. Member has introduced a practical consideration by suggesting that the time of adjournment for Whitsuntide is left open, and if sufficient progress is not made with the Bill it may be that the Motion for adjournment will not be made on Friday. I can quite understand Members below the Gangway objecting to anything in the nature of a bargain between the two Front Benches, and I do not think any bargain has been entered into. Still, I think that, as no one on the Front Opposition Bench has risen to support the suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton with reference to what may be done to-morrow, it is rather unreasonable to expect the Government to consent to proceed no further to-night. There ought to be some concession on each side.

—(1.47.) MR. SEXTON: I am entirely unaware of any reason why the Government should press us so urgently to agree to a time bargain. I have been a spectator of the proceedings throughout this discussion, and have heard speeches from this side of the House and replies from the Ministerial Bench, and I have discovered nothing obstructive—or even dilatory—in the proceedings. May I refer for a moment to the Debate on the Second Reading of the Local Taxation Bill. I should like to ask how many Irish Members took part in that Debate? Is it not a fact that not a single word was uttered by Irish Members on that occasion; and is it not equally a fact that in the present Debate no Irish Member has spoken who has not contributed serious matter for the consideration of the Committee? I have given close attention to the speeches from the beginning to the end; they have been dictated by a desire to bring before the House matter worthy of its consideration; therefore, I am at a loss to understand why the Government should press us for a time bargain. We are entitled to a fair and liberal construction of our motives in continuing this Debate, and I think we are justified in refusing to enter into any arrangement. It is understood that the Motion for the adjournment for the holidays will be moved on Friday; and I think, in view of that fact, the Government have every prospect of getting that adjournment carried without in any way jeopardising the Bill now under discussion. If there is any difficulty let them take the necessary steps to ensure that the Bill is carried. I shall assent to no time bargain, and I may say for my Colleagues as well as for myself that we shall continue to conduct ourselves, not with any desire to unduly prolong the Debate, but with a view to securing a fair, adequate, and exhaustive discussion on a point affecting the interests and fortunes of our country.

(1.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Does the noble Lord expect everybody on this Bench to rise and express an opinion as to what should be the progress of this Debate? This may be an interesting proceeding, but it is also a new method of procedure in the House of Commons. I have been cautious to give no pledges in this matter, because the other day the leader of the House and the Chancellor of the Exchequer charged me with having broken pledges which I did not consider I had given, or indeed that anybody had given. I do not intend to expose myself to such a charge hereafter. The action of the Government is calculated to make it impossible for any flag of truce to be held out from these Benches with a view to facilitating business. That is the reason why I have given no pledge. But if it is desired that I should rise and express concurrence with the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton I readily do so, because I fully agree with it, although I wish to be cautious about entering into pledges.

(1.52.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member for Longford has said there is not much difference between the views of the Government and those of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I do not know how far to interpret what the hon. Member for Longford has said to mean that to-morrow will suffice for the discussion of the remaining clauses. That is understood to be the view of the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Wolverhampton. But the hon. Member for Northampton has said that he will be no party to any kind of bargain. From the attitude of the hon. Member the Government may fairly expect that to-morrow hon. Members may discuss one or two Amendments, and in the evening the Committee may find itself in the same position as we are in at this moment. The hon. Member for Northampton has said, "Let us fight it out," and in that sentiment he was cheered by a section of hon. Members opposite. The Government think that, on the whole, the hon. Member is more in command of this warfare than some other older Members; but if the Government obtain a reasonable hope that the Scotch and the Irish Members may be able to present their case to-morrow then they will be disposed to report Progress now. If, however, there is no indication to that effect, the Government must act on the principle enunciated by the hon. Member for Northampton.

(1.56.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I have no objection to the right hon. Gentleman entertaining any expectation that he chooses. How is it possible for me to say that the Debate will come to an end to-morrow? All this is in the womb of the future. I protest against the system which the First Lord of the Treasury adopts of saying, "You must go on until an unreasonable hour of the night unless you enter into some agreement that you will only debate the question until a certain time next day." I have already said let us fight it out. I did not think there was the slightest chance of coming to terms with the First Lord of the Treasury. There is only one way out of the difficulty, and that is for the Government to be reasonable and surrender.

*(1.59.) Mr. LENG (Dundee): As a new Member of the House I am not accustomed to these untimely hours. Before I came here my constituents, knowing that I was not over strong, advised me to take care of my health. I promised that I would do so; but I am afraid that on this, the first occasion of temptation, I have yielded, and have broken my promise. I rise to support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, because it appears to me that at this moment we are not a deliberative Assembly. How can we, at 2 o'clock in the morning, enter into a discussion on a series of clauses of the utmost importance to Scotland and Ireland? I agree with what the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire has said that the people of Scotland are intensely interested and feel great anxiety with regard to the two clauses that have to come before the House, and the attempt to force their consideration on the House at 2 o'clock in the morning, after many Members have been here from 11 o'clock on the preceding day, and we are to have a Morning Sitting to-day, is a thing against which I, for one, enter my strongest protest.

Mr. CONYBEARE: I appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury on behalf of his Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am quite certain that, if the Government go on in the way they propose, they will be the death of the right hon. Gentleman.

(2.5.) Mr. HALSEY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

Mr. CONYBEARE: If one's sympathetic expressions are to be met in this way this is the last time I shall ever express my sympathy with anyone on the opposite side.

Mr. Labouchere

DR. TANNER: I concur with the argument just addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury. I have been in this House since 2 o'clock yesterday, and I am supposed to come here again at 11 o'clock to-day. It has been shown that other Members have been here since 11 o'clock yesterday and that the House is to meet again at 2 o'clock this afternoon. It will be absolutely and physically impossible that hon. Members should perform their duty if called upon to sit so many hours together, and I think the country will expect from the Government something more than the silly way in which they are treating the wishes of the Representatives of Scotland.

(2.12.) Mr. AIRD rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

DR. TANNER: I have spoken very seldom on this measure, and on the occasions when I have spoken to-night it has been simply on medical matters with which I am acquainted, and then I so condensed what I had to say that even the Chancellor of the Exchequer was satisfied. I ask only for fair play, the standard of which ought to be upheld by the English Members. I think the Government ought to assent to the request made on behalf of the Scotch Members. In this case, the Government are occupying the undignified position in which they allow the "tail to wag the dog." But I will not speak at any undue length, and will conclude by expressing a hope that the Government will consult the wishes of the large minority of this House, and allow the further consideration of this question to be postponed.

Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

(2.20.) Mr. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Courtney, I confess I do not understand what it is the right hon. Gentleman is any longer waiting for. The proposal of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Fowler) he acknowledged to be very satisfactory, and the noble Marquess invited Members of this Bench to express their opinion upon it. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir. W. Harcourt) gave an expression of his opinion, to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I understood, did not object. But what the right hon. Gentleman is expecting is an assurance from every part of the House that Clauses 6 and 7 will be passed to-morrow. He is experienced enough to know that he cannot get such an undertaking; therefore he must look to the probabilities of the case. Clause 6, I understand, chiefly affects the interests of the Scottish and Irish peasantry. It is not likely that Irish Members will interfere with the discussion of Clause 6, but what will happen, as the result of the unconciliatory attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will be that to-morrow, when the Motion is made for taking the whole time of the House for this Bill, the discussion will be prolonged, and it is perfectly certain, after what has happened to-night, that the discussion on Clause 7 will be prolonged even beyond what its importance demands. I do not, like my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, demand the surrender of the right hon. Gentleman, but I appeal to him to take a business-like view of the situation, and extricate the matter from its difficult position by not insisting upon going on with the clause.

(2.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: What I think we can ask is that from the various sections of the House there should be some kind of a promise given. If we could get from the hon. Gentleman for Northampton, and from one or two of the leaders of the Irish Party, language similar to that which has been used by the right hon. Gentleman, that would be sufficient for the Government. But we have no kind of distinct hope that hon. Members will do their best to bring this matter to a determination. What we want is a fair assurance, not an absolute promise, from sections of the House chiefly interested, that we shall be able to make progress if we stop to-night. But it must be clearly understood by hon. Members that until this Bill has been passed the adjournment cannot be moved. It is for that reason that we are anxious to be tolerably certain that the Bill will pass through the Report stage to-morrow, and not be left in precisely the same position as it is to-night. If we are met by the Members for Ireland and Scotland in the same spirit as that shown by the right hon. Gentleman, I dare say we should consent to report Progress.

(2.25.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentlemen is quite right in believing that what is desired is that we should come to a reasonable understanding, but the right hon. Gentleman has said that he is not going to move the adjournment until the Bill has passed, and he addressed that observation to hon. Gentlemen on this side, as if they, and not hon. Gentlemen on his own side, were to be deprived of a holiday—rather a novel proceeding, though I do not suppose that is what he contemplates. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) said that if we on this Bench expressed concurrence in the proposal of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Fowler), he and the Government would be satisfied. We have done so, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is putting my noble Friend in the wrong by not taking the opportunity to come to a settlement on the subject. Instead of that he goes round the House and says he wants an undertaking from here and from there, without specifying anyone, until we do not know at the present moment whose statement will satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. What the right hon. Gentleman wants is a business-like expectation of passing the Bill. He has got it. Why does he not accept it? He will not. It is not our fault. The further assurance which he desires to get I say is not business-like.

MR. GOSCHEN: If I understood the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, I understood him to say that he would be bound by no kind of bargain. He held out no hope whatever.

MR. SEXTON: I think it is humiliating under the duress of the Closure that a promise should be extorted. I object to the endeavour to extort these bargains from Members of this House, who are here in until a certain time next day." I have already said let us fight it out. I did not think there was the slightest chance of coming to terms with the First Lord of the Treasury. There is only one way out of the difficulty, and that is for the Government to be reasonable and surrender.

*(1.59.) MR. LENG (Dundee): As a new Member of the House I am not accustomed to these untimely hours. Before I came here my constituents, knowing that I was not over strong, advised me to take care of my health. I promised that I would do so; but I am afraid that on this, the first occasion of temptation, I have yielded, and have broken my promise. I rise to support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, because it appears to me that at this moment we are not a deliberative Assembly. How can we, at 2 o'clock in the morning, enter into a discussion on a series of clauses of the utmost importance to Scotland and Ireland? I agree with what the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire has said that the people of Scotland are intensely interested and feel great anxiety with regard to the two clauses that have to come before the House, and the attempt to force their consideration on the House at 2 o'clock in the morning, after many Members have been here from 11 o'clock on the preceding day, and we are to have a Morning Sitting to-day, is a thing against which I, for one, enter my strongest protest.

MR. CONYBEARE: I appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury on behalf of his Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am quite certain that, if the Government go on in the way they propose, they will be the death of the right hon. Gentleman.

(2.5.) MR. HALSEY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. CONYBEARE: If one's sympathetic expressions are to be met in this way this is the last time I shall ever express my sympathy with anyone on the opposite side.

Mr. Labouchere

DR. TANNER: I concur with the argument just addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury. I have been in this House since 2 o'clock yesterday, and I am supposed to come here again at 11 o'clock to-day. It has been shown that other Members have been here since 11 o'clock yesterday and that the House is to meet again at 2 o'clock this afternoon. It will be absolutely and physically impossible that hon. Members should perform their duty if called upon to sit so many hours together, and I think the country will expect from the Government something more than the silly way in which they are treating the wishes of the Representatives of Scotland.

(2.12.) MR. AIRD rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

DR. TANNER: I have spoken very seldom on this measure, and on the occasions when I have spoken to-night it has been simply on medical matters with which I am acquainted, and then I so condensed what I had to say that even the Chancellor of the Exchequer was satisfied. I ask only for fair play, the standard of which ought to be upheld by the English Members. I think the Government ought to assent to the request made on behalf of the Scotch Members. In this case, the Government are occupying the undignified position in which they allow the "tail to wag the dog." But I will not speak at any undue length, and will conclude by expressing a hope that the Government will consult the wishes of the large minority of this House, and allow the further consideration of this question to be postponed.

Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

(2.20.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Courtney, I confess I do not understand what it is the right hon. Gentleman is any longer waiting for. The proposal of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Fowler) he acknowledged to be very

(242.) MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I have not yet had an opportunity of speaking on this measure. I would dissociate myself from the spirit of the remarks of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, that we have been making an appeal to the Government. For my part, I would not be a party to making an appeal to the Government; I would ask them to look at themselves as others see them, and they will be surprised at the sorry figure they cut. The First Lord of the Treasury has gone home, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems anxious to make as peddling a bargain as ever took place over an emergency pig in Ireland. We repudiate all these bargains, and would impress upon the Government that it would redound to their credit if they accepted this reasonable Motion, and agreed to report Progress. If they do not do that, let them agree to sit continuously until the end of the week, without an adjournment. I would say to the Government, as a friend, speaking on the Irish question from an Irish point of view, said—

"We have a hand to hold in friendship,
And another to make you quake;
And you are welcome to whichever
It pleases you most to take."

(244.) MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman is asking us to bind ourselves down by agreements; but I remind him that we are here tonight in the interests of our constituents, and I may tell him that I, myself, would never enter into a disgraceful bargain which would practically be a dereliction of duty. There is another point to which I would call attention. It has been assumed that only Scotchmen and Irishmen are interested in this discussion; that is an entire illusion.

(245.) Mr. TOMLINSON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. CONYBEARE: I shall be very much surprised, as this Debate goes on, if it does not become evident that much has to be said on the question from the point of view of the English Members. As an English Representative myself, I shall have no hesitation in adding my quota to the discussion on this clause when we get to it. I am perfectly ready to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer this assurance, that, as far as I am personally concerned, I will confine myself to the discussion of every clause of this Bill only as fully, and fairly, and intelligently as my limited capacity will enable me, and my duty to my constituents will require me.

(247.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): A few minutes ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer was on the point of saying that he understood from the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that he might reasonably hope that at the end of a certain period the House might come to a conclusion on Clauses 6 and 7. Since then, in consequence of some slight interruption, the right hon. Gentleman has remained silent. It is perfectly plain that the silence of the right hon. Gentleman is altogether due to dudgeon; his attitude is one of sheer obstinacy. The Government can keep us here dividing until morning, but it is perfectly impossible to make any progress with business. Surely they have sufficient courage to come forward and admit that for the last two hours they have been delaying the Committee and obstructing the public business. I cannot, for the life of me, understand why Money Bills should be favoured more than other Bills, and that it should be competent to discuss them at a time when any other opposed Bill cannot be taken.

*(250.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen): I am surprised that in addressing his remarks to the Scotch Members the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not perceive that he was inflicting as deadly an insult upon them as it was in his power to inflict. He talked to us as if we were a set of disorderly schoolboys, and said that, if we would promise to be of good behaviour he would be graciously pleased not to ask us to begin the the discharge of their duties. I repeat what I did say, that to-morrow the Government would be able to calculate whether or not they could move the adjournment on Friday, and I, for my part, see no reason to doubt that they will be able to do so.

MR. CLANCY: I rise to move, Sir, that you report Progress and ask leave to sit again. The attempt to discuss anything at this hour of the night is an outrage and a farce.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Clancy.)

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I beg to second the proposition, and in doing so, I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has not seen many a wrangle of this sort, and whether he has ever seen the Government with such a minority on this side succeed in doing any business after a wrangle of this sort? I would go further, and ask him what he expects to get if he does win? Will he get a calm discussion of questions upon which the Scotch Members have appealed to him time after time for opportunity for full discussion. I second the proposition, but I do hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see that he has been met on this side of the House in an amicable spirit, although we have been compelled to refuse to bind ourselves by pledges.

(231.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): As a Scotch Member, I desire to join in the hope that the Government will not force us to begin a discussion upon a question of so much importance to Scotch Members at this unseemly hour of the morning. It is after half-past two, and as many of us have to meet at half-past 11 to-morrow it is ridiculous to suppose that we can start upon an important discussion now.

(232.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I think the Scotch Members have really humiliated themselves quite enough. We have appealed to the Government; we have not detained the House; we have a strong case; the question is one in which our constituents are deeply interested; and at this hour of the night we cannot be reported. Under the circumstances, we think it is not unreasonable that we should desire an adjournment. I do not know what opportunity we shall have of discussing these matters on Report, but I must say that if the Government think that they are facilitating business by the measures they are adopting they are very much mistaken. I do not think it would be reasonable or dignified of Scotch Members to beg favours any longer at the hands of the Government. If they think they are doing justice to Scotland in endeavouring to force on the Debate at this hour, let them do it.

(238.) MR. DILLON: The idea seems to have got abroad that it is only the Scotch Members who are interested in this matter, but nothing could be further from the truth. I myself have materials in my hand which would enable me to speak upon this question for fully three-quarters of an hour, and I should have done it ere this had I not been ruled out of order. The question is one of the utmost importance to the Irish people, and I can assure the Government that directly the Scotch part of the question has come to an end the Irish Question will begin. I would suggest that if we are to continue this Debate someone should be asked to take your place, Sir.

(239.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Supposing the Motion is withdrawn, and we go on with business, will the Government give us a guarantee that, if we sit—although we may astonish the country—from now until Thursday next, we shall be allowed to go on with the discussion, and shall not be closed? I am quite prepared to go on with the Debate, but would propose a short adjournment for a half-hour for refreshments. If the Government take a strong view on the matter, and insist on having their way, I am quite prepared to sit up all night. I understand the subject so thoroughly that I am quite prepared to discuss it now and always.

(242.) MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I have not yet had an opportunity of speaking on this measure. I would dissociate myself from the spirit of the remarks of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, that we have been making an appeal to the Government. For my part, I would not be a party to making an appeal to the Government; I would ask them to look at themselves as others see them, and they will be surprised at the sorry figure they cut. The First Lord of the Treasury has gone home, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems anxious to make as peddling a bargain as ever took place over an emergency pig in Ireland. We repudiate all these bargains, and would impress upon the Government that it would redound to their credit if they accepted this reasonable Motion, and agreed to report Progress. If they do not do that, let them agree to sit continuously until the end of the week, without an adjournment. I would say to the Government, as a friend, speaking on the Irish question from an Irish point of view, said—

"We have a hand to hold in friendship,

And you are welcome to whichever
It pleases you most to take."

(244.) MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman is asking us to bind ourselves down by agreements; but I remind him that we are here tonight in the interests of our constituents, and I may tell him that I, myself, would never enter into a disgraceful bargain which would practically be a dereliction of duty. There is another point to which I would call attention. It has been assumed that only Scotchmen and Irishmen are interested in this discussion; that is an entire illusion.

(245.) MR. TOMLINSON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. CONYBEARE: I shall be very much surprised, as this Debate goes on, if it does not become evident that much has to be said on the question from the point of view of the English Members. As an English Representative myself, I shall have no hesitation in adding my quota to the discussion on this clause when we get to it. I am perfectly ready to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer this assurance, that, as far as I am personally concerned, I will confine myself to the discussion of every clause of this Bill only as fully, and fairly, and intelligently as my limited capacity will enable me, and my duty to my constituents will require me.

(247.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): A few minutes ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer was on the point of saying that he understood from the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that he might reasonably hope that at the end of a certain period the House might come to a conclusion on Clauses 6 and 7. Since then, in consequence of some slight interruption, the right hon. Gentleman has remained silent. It is perfectly plain that the silence of the right hon. Gentleman is altogether due to dudgeon; his attitude is one of sheer obstinacy. The Government can keep us here dividing until morning, but it is perfectly impossible to make any progress with business. Surely they have sufficient courage to come forward and admit that for the last two hours they have been delaying the Committee and obstructing the public business. I cannot, for the life of me, understand why Money Bills should be favoured more than other Bills, and that it should be competent to discuss them at a time when any other opposed Bill cannot be taken.

*(250.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen): I am surprised that in addressing his remarks to the Scotch Members the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not perceive that he was inflicting as deadly an insult upon them as it was in his power to inflict. He talked to us as if we were a set of disorderly schoolboys, and said that, if we would promise to be of good behaviour he would be graciously pleased not to ask us to begin the discussion of an important Scotch question at 3 o'clock in the morning. I claim that Scotland has a right to a fair share of the time of the House, and to have her business discussed at reasonable hours, and I leave the Committee to judge whether 1, or 2, or 3 o'clock in the morning is a reasonable hour to begin a discussion of this kind. By this Bill the Government are taking from Scotland £60,000 a year. Is it reasonable or fair that such a Bill should be debated at this hour? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to go to war with the Scotch Members he is taking the right course; but, as far as I am concerned, under no consideration would I degrade myself by making any promise whatever to him.

(2.53.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I agree that this is not altogether an Irish or a Scotch question; it affects every English Member, and it affects everyone who cares for the honour and dignity of the House, and who does not wish to have the House of Commons exposed to ridicule by absurd and preposterous proceedings. There must be a means of bringing this wrangle to a reasonable and honourable conclusion. The Government have had from this side every assurance that can possibly be given that an endeavour will be made to prevent protracted Debate on succeeding stages. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has suggested that assurances should be given to him from other quarters. Surely that is hardly desirable; we do not want to recognise a vast variety of different sections in this House. There will be no end to it if we do. The leaders of sections in this House are not responsible as are leaders sitting on the Front Benches. As for the Front Opposition Benches the country looks to them to do their duty quite as much as hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Ministerial Bench. I maintain that they are doing their duty to-night, but that while they are responsible the leaders of sections below the Gangway are not responsible. Seeing that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received such friendly assurances from this side of the House, even if he thinks he is making sacrifices, I would urge him to accept the proposals made. He should not be too rigid in this matter—someone must give way on one other side or the other, and it seems to me that that desire is very strong on both sides of the House. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will devise some means of extracting us from our present difficulty.

(2.59.) DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): On sanitary grounds I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to hon. Gentlemen on both sides to bring this unseemly wrangle to a conclusion—I say on sanitary grounds, for I see a Member sitting behind the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a thoroughly collapsed condition. The fact is that we have been bamboozled into passing the 5th clause. I could have discussed the question of chloroform for two and a half hours; and if the right hon. Gentleman forces us to discuss this clause now I will find some means of slipping the chloroform into the spirits, because I do not think the 5th clause has been adequately discussed. The Government are endeavouring to rob Ireland at 3 in the morning, but we do not mean to be robbed. We simply want to discuss these important clauses to-morrow or the day after, or the day after that, because we do not want to go for a holiday at all. We have been sent here to do the business of the country, and it appears to me that it is the business of the Times newspaper that the Government are doing. The sooner we proceed to business the better.

(3.2.) DR. TANNER: There is no doubt in the world that the Government has entered into what is known in Ireland as a criminal conspiracy—

MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(3.3.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 167; Noes 107.—(Div List, No. 98.)

(3.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 167.—(Div List, No. 99.)

(3.24.) COLONEL NOLAN: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he thinks it will conduce to his character as Chancellor of the Exchequer to pass the most important part of his Budget scheme after having silenced those who represent the majority of the people? I would also ask him whether he has any regard for his own health or that of other men's? I beg to move, Sir, that you do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Colonel Nolan.)

(3.25.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I would really ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has not carried this lesson in Home Rule for Scotland and Ireland far enough? For a first lesson, I think this is sufficient to show what is the time of night at which the Parliament of Westminster thinks fit to do the business of Scotland and Ireland. The assertion of principle the Chancellor of the Exchequer desired to make has now been made, and I do not think it will be advanced any further by sitting for three or four hours more. I think this measure for the endowment of the publicans ought to be resisted in every possible way. He has resolved to carry it, and we are resolved, if we can, to prevent his carrying it. We believe we are supported by the majority of the country. That is a matter of opinion; but it is a matter you can decide. If you would like that decision, the sooner you invite it the better. In the meanwhile we are satisfied and convinced that in resisting your legislation we are supported by the majority of the country. That being so, the only question is how many days and nights the right hon. Gentleman chooses to proceed? I should have thought he had done enough to-night. If that is so, let us go in and discuss the matter to-morrow in a reasonable way. Would it be possible for anybody to state now his case on this clause in a manner which would be reasonably satisfactory to the country? I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer must feel that, and, therefore, I cannot understand what advantage he can hope to gain by continuing the contest to-night.

(3.26.) THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps the Committee will allow me to support the appeal made to the Government by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. I do not do it precisely on the same grounds; but I do it from another, and, I think, a sufficient ground. You, Mr. Courtney, have, in the exercise of your discretion, allowed, I think, several—I do not know whether three or four—dilatory Motions to be put in succession.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Mr. Courtney, I rise to order. I wish to ask you whether it is in order for the noble Marquess to cast aspersions upon your conduct?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not understand he has done so.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Nothing was further from my intention than to cast any aspersion. I am not certain whether a dilatory Motion is a proper term; but a Motion to report Progress, or that the Chairman do leave the Chair, is generally known by the name of a dilatory Motion. It is entirely within the discretion of the Chairman to refuse to allow such a Motion to be put, and it is within his power to allow such a Motion, without in the smallest degree questioning the motive which actuated it. But I was saying that you, Sir, have permitted these Motions to be put, and it is probable, as time becomes more and more inopportune for the discussion of serious matters, you will continue to allow them. That being the case, the probability is we shall only spend two or three hours more in discussing Motions of this kind, and not come any nearer the discussion of the clause. In these circumstances, and also considering that there is still a large amount of time at the disposal of the Committee to consider the further clauses of the Bill before the holidays, I hope that the Government will not think it necessary to push matters to an extremity this evening, and that, if necessary, they will postpone the all-night conflict to another occasion.

(3.31.) MR. GOSCHEN: Two appeals have been made to the Government. The right hon. Member for Derby asks how the Government expect to carry their Licensing Bill or this Bill. The Government do intend to carry their Bills, and if they cannot pass them to-night, they will pass them later.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No threats. That is for the House. The House of Commons will carry them; not you.

MR. GOSCHEN: That is rather a technical interruption. The House of Commons will pass them.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: We shall see.

MR. GOSCHEN: Those interruptions are scarcely fair.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do beg hon. Members to restrain themselves. All those interruptions are quite unnecessary.

MR. GOSCHEN: In answer to the appeal of the right hon. Member for Derby, I say that, whatever may happen to-night, we are absolutely determined to carry the Bills, and we are not weakened by one whit on account of the opposition offered to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the country; we, too, shall leave the country to judge. We shall see whether they approve such proceedings. I have been silent while I have heard repeated over and over again the statement that the length of the speeches has been extremely moderate. In the earlier part of the evening there was repetition after repetition. Argument after argument was repeated again and again, and certainly if every point is to be discussed at the same interminable length at which some points were discussed this evening, we shall never arrive at the end of our discussions.

DR. TANNER: Keep your temper.

MR. GOSCHEN: My noble Friend made a very different kind of appeal, which the Government must consider with a desire to meet it. My noble Friend explained how dilatory Motion after dilatory Motion has been put from the Chair, and how it has been impossible to arrive at the substance of the discussion. The country will mark those dilatory Motions, and the manner in which they have avowedly been made, and we are not in the slightest degree afraid. On the contrary, we are glad to be able to mark them; but after the appeal which has been made we assent now to report Progress.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 20th May, 1890.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 85.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, before this Bill goes into Committee I wish to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India whether he has taken into consideration the Petition of the Salford School Board in reference to it. I am told that their Petition was very reasonable, and I would refer him particularly to Clause 5, which represents the undesirableness of placing juvenile offenders under the police. The other point to which I wish to call attention is that offenders sent to day Industrial Schools should be detained there for three years as in the case of Truant Schools; they say that detention there for one year is not sufficient to make the desired improvement in offenders.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): With reference to the Petition from the Salford School Board it has been presented to your Lordships' House, and is now, I believe, on the Table. A copy of it has been forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, I have no doubt, will give me his views as soon as he has considered it. I will put down the Third Reading of the Bill for the 12th June, and I may say that for the same date I shall put down for Third Reading the Juvenile Offenders Bill and the Reformatory Schools Bill.

Bill reported without further amendment, and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Thursday the 12th of June next.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE EXTENSION (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 74.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD DENMAN: My Lords, I have postponed moving the Second Reading of this Bill until to-day, as there was some delay in the printing of it, and I very nearly had a somewhat similar Bill thrown out on a former occasion on account of its not being in the hands of Members of the House. This Bill is drafted from a small Local Government Bill for Belfast. Before the time of the introduction of that measure, there was, I believe, a system of cumulative voting. People had not in that part of the Kingdom rights such as are possessed in England, and the Earl of Erne introduced into that Bill a clause that women should count in the same proportion as men as voters. That measure was passed. If the Bill which I have now laid before your Lordships were carried the women would have more votes than the men, but that is very far from my wish in this or in any proposal I have ever made for extending the franchise to women. Your Lordships remember the play of Aristophanes, in which the women robbed the men of their clothes, appeared in them, and outvoted their husbands, and the poor men were left to put on the women's clothes. I do not wish the women to have any undue advantages. I only contend that this is a measure of justice. As the Duke of Buckingham said to me on presenting my Bill applying to women, "It is a step in the right direction, but the country is not yet ripe for woman suffrage." The principle of this Bill has, I believe, been the foundation of the Local Government Bill of England—the right of voting given to women both in England and in Scotland is founded upon this small, piece meal measure. As ratepayers, they have as much right to vote as men. I find that the right to vote extended to married women in Scotland is not exercised by them, and that very little enthusiasm has been excited amongst them at the possession of that right. My Lords, if you pass this Bill you can do no injury to anyone. I would urge your Lordships to do away with prejudice and grant the Bill a Second Reading, as an innocent measure, a small instalment of justice, and something of which you may be proud rather than ashamed. We have great facilities for bringing forward and passing measures in this House; whereas in the other House of Parliament, where I am told there is a similar Bill pending at the present time, there are great and constant obstacles.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, in the somewhat general observations which the noble Lord has addressed to the House he did not say much—hardly anything at all—about the Bill he has introduced, or the clauses it contains. I think it would probably be in accordance with the wish of the House, and probably of the noble Earl himself, that I should implicitly follow his example. As far as I have seen, the Bill is almost identical with that which he introduced last year. I told him on that occasion that his method was merely fragmentary, dealing with but a small though, perhaps, not unimportant portion of the much larger subject of the Municipal Franchise in Ireland, and I also told him that the subject was not one which could be dealt with in a Bill of the character introduced by the noble Lord. I have nothing to add to the answer I gave on that occasion, and I am afraid I am under the painful necessity of again moving the rejection of this Bill. I move that the House read this Bill a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months") (The Lord Privy Seal [E Cadogan]): On question that ("now") stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative: Bill to be read 2<sup>a</sup> this day six months.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, this Bill is one of a sort which is commonly known as Money Bills, and I need not therefore trouble your Lordships with the details of it. I may state generally that it is for the purpose of assisting the drainage of a large district in the counties of Galway and Roscommon. The Drainage Board was established in 1878, and under the powers which they then took they were not enabled then to entirely complete the system of drainage which it was proposed to establish. Since then they have found that if further funds were not granted all the monies which had been expended would be wasted. Therefore the object of the present Bill is to provide additional funds, partly as a free grant and partly as a loan from the Board of Works. A Private Bill had been introduced upon the subject; but as it was not thought right to make a free grant of public funds under a Private Bill it was found necessary to draft the present Bill in order to enable the Treasury to grant the £50,000. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

"CITY OF PARIS" S.S. ACCIDENT.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON: The noble Earl de la Warr, being obliged to leave the House, has asked me to put the question of which he has given notice, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the inquiry into the case of the steamship "City of Paris" should be held in open Court to which the public will be admitted?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH): My Lords, I gave the noble Earl an assurance in private that the usual course will be followed, so that this inquiry would be held in open Court to which the public will be admitted. I should like to add that the inquiry cannot be commenced until after the middle of next month, because some of the material witnesses will not have returned from their present voyage until that time; but I may state that no unnecessary delay shall take place.

THE SUPPRESSION OF PUBLIC HOUSES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*VISCOUNT BARRINGTON: My Lords, in rising to ask the question of which I have given notice, first let me crave the greatest measure of forbearance and indulgence which your Lordships always grant to Members of your House who address you for the first time. I trust that you will think there is sufficient importance in the question to justify me in trespassing upon your time and attention for a few minutes. There is no question but that at the present time people's minds are very much exercised with regard to the licensing question. It is generally assumed and asserted that there are far too many public houses in the country. The deduction drawn from that is that there is greater encouragement to drinking habits, and a larger amount of drink consumed than would otherwise be the case. Now, to both proposition and deduction I very much demur. I can give the result of my experience as a Magistrate of Buckinghamshire. For many years before I had the honour of sitting in your Lordships' House I found it necessary from circumstances to live almost entirely in the country; since that time, from other circumstances, that it is almost essential I should live in London. For 30 years, or thereabouts, I lived in Buckinghamshire, and during the whole of that time, I think I may say, I was a tolerably active Magistrate in the county. I acted for many years as Chairman of our Petty Sessions, and I served on most of the County Committees, especially on the Licensing Committee. I recollect, and it will also be fresh in your Lordships' recollection, for it was not many years ago, Sir William Harcourt, when Secretary of State for the Home Department, fulminated certain thunders against the County Magistrates, saying that it was in consequence of their granting new licences annually to the various public houses established that drunkenness went on to the extent it did in the country. Well, my Lords, at the first meeting of our Licensing Committee we discussed that question very carefully. I may say there were present men whom you all recollect: the Duke of Buckingham, then and formerly your Chairman of Committees, and Lord Cottesloe, a man of the highest judicial character, and I may say that at that time he was nearly a total abstainer. I know it was very much against his family's wishes that he should be so, and I think he was advised eventually by his doctor to drink a little, for very much the same reason that Paul said to Timothy, "Drink a little wine for thy stomach's sake." We considered the number of houses and the class of houses, and we were of one opinion, that there were a good many houses in the county doing very little business indeed, and that if they were only let alone they would die a natural death from inanition; but with regard to houses which might be said to be doing a profitable business, we came to an almost unanimous conclusion that if we suppressed some of the houses we should only be adding to the value of those remaining, and that the quantity of drink consumed would not be lessened. Now, I think that opinion was a fair and just one. We were also of opinion that the custom which had prevailed for so many years, of renewing the licences where there was no complaint against the houses, could not be broken without doing gross injustice to the proprietors. Then I asked our police superintendent what he thought of the matter, and his reply was, "Well, you see, sir, there are men who drink, and who will have drink, and if you shut up the 'White Lion' they will go to the 'Red Lion';" and he said that in the view of the police it was certainly much better for the benefit of the public that the drinkers should be distributed in small numbers about the towns rather than that they should be collected together in a few places. I also consulted upon the matter a clergyman, whom I congratulated upon having no public house in his parish, and he said, "Well, I don't know about that; I know I have a good many drinking people in my parish who will go out and get drunk somewhere and who get very drunk indeed." A good deal of argument has been based upon the temptation offered to the working-man. Some people are always thinking about working-men and making proposals for their regulation and guidance; but I think they might be allowed to think and act a little for themselves. It is said of the working-man, who is always paraded on these occasions, that he is so weak in character that he cannot resist so much temptation, that he may perhaps struggle to pass one or two public houses, but when he comes to the third he can resist no longer, but must go in and quench his thirst with potent libations of intoxicating liquors. On the other hand, it is said that the public house is the working-man's club, and, in that regard, I have sometimes tried mentally to put myself in the place of the working-man. Probably many of your Lordships belong to not one club alone, but to several. I do not know that your Lordships are affected by that circumstance; but I can say for myself that I do not feel any inclination to go in and drink whenever I pass one of the clubs in London; nor do I suppose that the spiritual Lords, when they ascend the classic steps of the Athenæum, feel any necessity to consume spirituous liquors. But, my Lords, I think it is impossible for us to put ourselves in the place of the working-man in this matter, for the temptation, however it may appear to us, is limited with them by the necessities of their employment and means. Though not a total abstainer myself, I yield to no man in the desire to promote habits of temperance and sobriety among my fellow-countrymen. I am asking this question of Her Majesty's Government both for my own guidance and for that of the County Council of which I have the honour of being a member, and which will probably before long have to deal with these matters. My Lords, I heartily endorse the principle of compensation as followed in the Compensation Clauses of the Bill before the other House of Parliament; for I consider that, if it is necessary to close a house which has hitherto been well conducted, it is only fair that the owner of the licence should receive proper compensation. I cannot help thinking that the craving for drink which seems to be ingrained in the habits of sections of the people cannot be combatted by Act of Parliament, but that it can only be combatted by the force of example, persuasion, and public opinion. I will state, before asking the Government for an answer to the question which I have placed on the Notice Paper, that I have received a communication, and have also read to-day in the Times a most interesting letter, from the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), to the effect that County Councils are by no means compelled, if these powers of compensation are given to the County Councils, to put them into force, or to use the money which they would receive from the State for the purpose of buying up licences if they do not feel so inclined. That, I think, is extremely satisfactory; but it does not, of course, afford an answer to the question which I am asking. I have just received another letter which is illustrative of the kind of argument used by some very well-meaning people. It is from a lady, and she says, that having read that I intended asking a question in Parliament upon the subject of whether drinking is greater where the number of public houses is largest, she wishes to mention what one of the greatest drinkers in her neighbourhood had said to her, namely, that he wished most of the public houses were closed, as he and others were too weak to resist so much temptation, as in that district there was a public house at almost every corner of the streets; and she adds—

"It is the working classes who see and feel the evil of drunkenness, and who would hail any action which would reduce that evil."

That is a class of argument which is very much used, and which I confess I do not altogether hold with. But, my Lords, I will refer to another letter which I have received from the Chief Constable of Chester. It is very interesting indeed. He sends me printed statistics of what was the state of drunkenness in England in 1875. These statistics are very remarkable. It appears that the cases of drunkenness in Durham were 16,700, or equal to 1 in 41 of the population. In Essex they were only 464, or equal to

1 in 961. Those are the two extremes throughout England. Now as regards the number of public houses, Durham by no means stands at the head of the list. It stands 7th or 10th only. There is there one public house to every 210 of the population. In Essex there is one public house to every 160 of the population. That seems a very high average, and the numbers range from Cornwall where there is one public house to every 360 of the population down to Huntingdon where there is one in 104. At the end is appended this note—

“In comparing the two lists it will be found that it by no means follows, as is popularly supposed, that drunkenness increases with the number of public houses in a district.”

My Lords, I adopt that statement, and venture to say that it does not appear to me to at all follow that that is the case; and I have only now to put the question to Her Majesty's Government, whether they are in possession of reliable statistics tending to prove that the amount of intemperance in districts under reasonably similar conditions varies in an approximate ratio according to the number of licensed houses in those districts?

*LORD DE RAMSEY : My Lords, the information which is at our disposal I most willingly give to the noble Viscount. I only wish it had been carried up to a more recent date than it is. I entirely agree with those concluding words, that as far as any information on the subject goes there is nothing to prove that where there is a large number of licensed public houses there is a proportionately greater amount of intemperance. Unfortunately our Returns do not quite tally in regard to date. The first part of the noble Lord's question is in regard to the extent of intemperance. Upon that head the Return, which is called the Drunkenness Convictions, is only up to 1889, and includes the years from 1885 inclusive. It extends down to the 29th July, 1889, but the figures for the remainder of the year are not yet collected. The second part of the noble Viscount's question has reference to the Intoxicating Liquors (Licences) Return. That is made up to March, 1890, and, therefore, it is rather difficult to compare the two Returns. I think, however, if the noble Viscount will place one beside the other he will be able to obtain approximately the information he requires in regard to any particular district he may be interested in. The number of convictions for drunkenness appears to be really the only available test that we have of the amount of intemperance in any specified districts. Taking those two Returns together, the ratio of the amount of drunkenness to the number of licensed houses in counties and boroughs can be calculated in the way I have suggested, allowing for the difference in the dates. There is, however, a second difficulty which I must mention to the noble Viscount. One of the Returns is compiled from the areas of the Petty Sessional Divisions, and the other from the Police Districts. I have no doubt, though I have no reason for saying so, that the noble Viscount had in his mind in asking the question that the information might, perhaps, assist the Committees of the County Councils if they should have to deal with proposals which the Government hope to pass into law. If that is so, I am exceedingly grateful to the noble Viscount for putting the question; and I may say that being myself a County Councillor I have for my own information drawn out a few test cases from these two Returns which, if the noble Viscount desires, I shall be glad to show him and confer with him upon.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I think we are indebted to the noble Viscount for moving for these Returns, which will, no doubt, be found very interesting. But I think it will be found very difficult to draw any conclusion from them. The Committee upon the Temperance Question, on which I sat some years ago, had the whole subject before it; and if there was one thing more than another of which we were fully convinced it was that there was nothing to show a ratio of proportion between the number of public houses in a district and the amount of drunkenness existing there. In the first place, the convictions are not a certain guide, because their number depends upon the practice of the Magistrates and the vigilance of the police in the particular districts. It also appeared to us that there was something to be taken into consideration in regard to climate and latitude, or the health and habits of the people. It appeared clear that as you go North the amount of drunkenness increases—that a line could be drawn across England North of which the drunkenness was far greater than to the South, notwithstanding that other conditions appeared to be the same. I will take the case of the large ports in the North. As a rule, there is a much greater amount of drunkenness in those places than in the large ports in the South. But there, again, you must know the habits of the population before you can draw any conclusion. Certainly there have been some remarkable statistics, showing that although the number of public houses may be large the number of convictions for drunkenness may be small. In my own district in the town of Norwich there was shown to be a larger number of places for drinking in proportion to the population than in most other towns in England, and the convictions were fewer than in most other towns. But I am afraid we must not conclude from that that there was a great absence of drunkenness in Norwich. I only mention that to show how singular these statistics are. I think that might be a useful subject of consideration upon this interesting question in deciding the weight to be attributed to arguments which may be advanced before coming to any conclusion upon the matter.

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I have given notice of my intention to move the rejection of this Bill.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Then it will be put down for to-morrow.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I trust that it will not be taken to-morrow. I intend to oppose the Second Reading; but I shall be unable to be present to-morrow, as I am engaged upon a Royal Commission.

*Mr. SPEAKER: As it is opposed it is necessary, in accordance with the Standing Orders, that it shall be put down for to-morrow; but the Second Reading can, by arrangement, be deferred until a later day.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: Upon that understanding I have nothing more to say.

*Mr. SPEAKER: By the Standing Orders, objection being taken, it must go down for the next day.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: I do not know whether the President of the Board of Trade has charge of the Bill or not; but I hope it will not be taken to-morrow. I have a special objection to urge against the Bill, on account of the way in which it deals with the Scilly Islands, and especially with the matter of market rights and tolls, upon which a Royal Commission has been sitting, which will report in a very short time.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): It will not be taken to-morrow; I will put it down for this day fortnight; and, in the meantime, I shall be glad to communicate with the hon. Member.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I have the strongest possible objection to this Bill on other grounds than those which have been mentioned by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). I shall certainly offer it the strongest possible objection unless it is considerably altered.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question cannot be discussed now.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will put it down for this day fortnight.

Second Reading postponed until June 3rd.

QUESTIONS.

CAPITAL SENTENCES IN SCOTLAND.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that the Magistrates of Glasgow have been required to make arrangements for carrying into effect the death sentence passed on John Finlay, for a murder committed in Kirkintilloch, entirely outside of their jurisdiction; and whether, taking into consideration the extremely repulsive nature of such a duty, and the fact that it has only recently been imposed on the Magistrates of the larger towns in Scotland in the case of crimes committed outside of their jurisdiction, through the closing of a number of county prisons, the Government will consider the propriety of altering the present rule, either by re-imposing the responsibility for carrying out capital sentences on the Magistrates in whose jurisdiction the crimes have been committed, or by imposing the duty of arranging for all executions upon some Government officer?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): It is unnecessary for me to answer the first part of the question, as the sentence passed on Finlay has been commuted to penal servitude. As regards the second part of the question, it is impossible in all cases to provide that the Magistrates in whose jurisdiction crimes have been committed should make arrangements for an execution; and where there is no prison within a district in which a murder has been committed, the responsibility in respect of prisoners under sentence of death must rest with the Magistrates in whose jurisdiction the prison is in where the convict is confined. It is not proposed to alter the prison rule.

*DR. CAMERON: As the responsibility is felt to be a great hardship I beg to give notice that I will take an early opportunity of calling attention to the subject.

THE INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPHIC CONFERENCE.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is correct, as announced in the Manchester Courier of the 13th instant, that it has been arranged that a motion fixing an international telegraphic tariff at 12½ centimes, or rather more than 1d. a word, shall be brought before the International Telegraphic Conference, which commenced its sitting last week at Paris, and that the motion will have the support of the English Representatives; and if correct, and the Conference should adopt the motion, will he endeavour to arrange with the respective Governments that the same rate of 12½ centimes should also extend to Denmark and Russia, as those countries are not members of the International Telegraphic Congress, and would not be affected by its decision?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I do not feel myself at liberty to disclose the proposals which have been brought forward for discussion at the International Telegraph Conference by the Representatives of the Governments; such a course would be unusual. Both Denmark and Russia are members of the International Telegraph Union, and are represented at the Conference; and they will, therefore, be affected by the decisions arrived at. I may mention that the charges for telegrams from this country to France, Belgium, Holland, and Germany were only lately reduced to a uniform rate of 2d. per word with a minimum of 10d.; and I may assure the hon. Member that it is certainly my desire that the Representatives of this country should endeavour to bring about such further reductions in other directions as, having regard to the interests of all the parties concerned, seem to be called for.

AIRDRIE LICENSING COURT.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is true that, at a recent Licensing Court for the Airdrie District of Lanarkshire, Sheriff-Substitute Mair acted as Chairman, and, in the case of an equal vote for and against granting a new public house licence at Swinton, gave his casting vote in favour of its grant; whether it is true that, when the new certificate came before the Licensing Committee on the 2nd instant for confirmation, Sheriff Mair was present, and spoke in support of the application; whether Sheriff Mair is a member of the Licensing Committee of the district; and whether it is customary for Sheriffs, or Sheriff-Substitutes, to sit as Judges ex officio in Licensing Courts in Scotland, or to interfere at confirming Courts?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is the case that Sheriff-Substitute Mair was Chairman of a recent Licensing Court at Airdrie, having been voted to take the chair by the other Justices. He gave a deliberative, and not a casting vote on the question of the licence at Swinton. It is not the case that Sheriff Mair spoke in support of the application before the Licensing Committee, but merely corrected an erroneous statement that was made of what took place before the Court of which he was Chairman. There is, so far as I am aware, no doubt that Sheriffs and Sheriff-Substitutes are entitled to sit in these Courts; and I am informed that, though it may not be the universal practice, it frequently happens that these officials do sit in the Licensing Courts.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. C. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether any case of foot-and-mouth disease has occurred in Schleswig-Holstein since 17th April last; whether those Duchies have been since then officially declared free from foot-and-mouth disease; and whether it is the intention of the Board of Agriculture now to redeem the promise given last year by Lord Salisbury, and to permit the importation of cattle from Schleswig-Holstein?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The last case of foot-and-mouth disease reported to the Department was on April 6, and it is true that the Province of Schleswig-Holstein was declared free on April 23, rather less than a month ago. I may remind the hon. Gentleman that a similar declaration was made in August last which was followed by a fresh introduction of disease into Schleswig-Holstein in March of this year, of which we did not receive notice until several days after the outbreak. Foot-and-mouth disease, I regret to say, prevails extensively in Germany at the present time, and at no great distance from the Schleswig-Holstein frontier; and the fact that that Province was declared free on April 23 does not afford any guarantee that it may not be again re-introduced at any moment as it was in the spring within the limits of that Province. Under these circumstances, and taking into consideration the prevalence of the disease in Germany, it would be impossible, in my opinion, to permit the importation of live animals from Schleswig-Holstein at present with any regard to the precautions which it is my duty to take against the introduction of disease. I may add that the statements referred to on the part of Lord Salisbury were made under circumstances which were wholly different from the circumstances of the present time.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN LANCASHIRE.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been called to a statement that a letter addressed to a resident in Edenfield, Lancashire, and posted in Manchester on Saturday the 19th April, did not reach its address until 44 hours after the letter was posted; and, if so, whether he can see his way to provide the increased postal facilities for which the inhabitants of Edenfield have petitioned the Department?

*MR. RAIKES: My attention has not been called to the particular instance of delay to which the hon. Member refers; but I sanctioned arrangements for the improvement of the postal service at Edenfield some months ago, and quite recently I have authorised an extension of the evening delivery there. The arrangements now appear to be quite satisfactory.

ACCIDENTS IN COLLIERIES.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the case, as has been alleged, that fatal accidents on the last of the nine hours work per day in many Welsh collieries are 100 per cent. in excess of the fatal accidents during the whole of the remaining eight hours; whether he has any reason to believe that fatal accidents are at all more numerous in the last hour of a nine hour shift than they are in any other hour of the shift, or than they would be in the last hour of an eight hour shift in the same district; and if he will grant a Return showing for the years 1888 and 1889 at what hour of employment of persons killed in collieries underground the accidents which resulted in their deaths happened?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Inspector for the district informs me that the statements in the first two paragraphs of the question are not correct. In 1889 out of 126 fatal accidents it appears that 12 occurred in the first hour, nine in the second, 14 in the third, 18 in the fourth, 17 in the fifth, nine in the sixth, 12 in the seventh, nine in the eighth, 18 in the ninth, seven in the tenth, and one in the 11th. I have no reason to believe that it is the fact that the last hour of a shift is accompanied by more danger to life than any other hour of the employment. I will inquire whether it is possible to give generally the information asked for in the last paragraph of the question, and if it is I will direct the Inspectors to include it in their Annual Reports.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that so few miners work into the 11th hour that the Return is misleading without that explanation?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given the figures as they have been given to me.

MR. BRUNNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly make inquiry?

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the deaths resulting from miscellaneous underground accidents in coal mines are annually from two to three times as numerous in the South Wales district as in the Newcastle district, although the number of persons employed is only fractionally greater; whether his attention has been drawn to the following statement made by the Inspector of the South Wales district, in his Report for 1887, in reference to fatalities arising from miscellaneous accidents underground:—

and what steps, if any, have been taken since 1887 to enforce stricter discipline?

MR. MATTHEWS: The deaths resulting from miscellaneous underground accidents in South Wales are rather more than twice as numerous as compared with those occurring in the Newcastle district; but the number of persons employed in South Wales is 30 per cent. more than in the Newcastle district. I am informed by the Inspector that his observations with regard to the fatalities had reference to the better enforcement of the special rules by colliery officials, and that he takes every opportunity of calling the attention of owners and managers to their responsibilities under the Act of Parliament, and of urging them to use the powers given them by law to enforce a strict observance of the special rules. The Inspector has, whenever he could procure evidence, instituted prosecutions against owners and managers for not enforcing the observance of the general rules.

THE LATE GENERAL SIR WILLIAM JONES.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to that part of the Queen's Regulations of 1889, which specifies that—

“Officers are not interred with military honours unless they are at the time of their decease on full pay, or employed on the Staff, or in the exercise of some military command or office;”

whether General Sir William Jones, G.C.B. (who was in command at the capture of Delhi, the turning point of the Great Mutiny), was, at the time of his decease, Colonel of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, and in receipt of the pay of £1,000 a year; and whether he was, therefore, entitled to a military funeral?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Sir William Jones was the Honorary Colonel of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry. An officer holding such an appointment is not on full pay nor in the exercise of any military command or office, and is, therefore, not entitled to a military funeral. I may mention that Sir Archdale Wilson commanded the forces at the capture of Delhi.

*SIR E. WATKIN: Is, then, the doctrine that unless an officer is on full pay he is not entitled to a military funeral?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir. He was not entitled under Military Regulations.

THE SCOTCH FISHERY BOARD.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is competent for the Scottish Fishery Board to allocate any of the funds at their disposal for harbour construction and improvement as security for advances to Harbour Authorities in Scotland by the Public Works Loan Commissioners; and, if such is the case, whether the Secretary for Scotland would consider the expediency of recommending this course to be adopted by the Fishery Board in the case of Eyemouth Harbour, where £25,000 advanced by the Public Works Loan Board has been expended in improving the harbour without any improvement to the harbour entrance, which is impracticable to fishing boats during large periods of each tide?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the question. The matter is somewhat complicated, and I have not been able to get a satisfactory answer.

COUNCILS OF CONCILIATION.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will give directions to the Labour Correspondent to inquire and report as to the extent of the establishment and working of Councils of Conciliation under the 30th and 31st Victoria, chapter 105, and of Boards of Arbitration under the 35th and 36th Victoria, chapter 46, as amending the 5th George IV., chapter 96; and, further, to inquire and report as to the causes, if any, prevailing either amongst employers and employed, which have hindered the utilisation in any, and what, trades, of either of such Councils of Conciliation or Boards of Arbitration?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No use was made of the Act of George IV., and its existence seems to have been forgotten. When it was enacted the necessary organisations for its successful working did not exist, and its compulsory features and penalties were alike distasteful to employers and employed. Before the Act of 1867 was passed, industrial arbitration was frequently and voluntarily applied. The tribunals proposed by these Acts did not provide for the settlement of future but only of actual disputes. The Act of 1872 was intended to give further powers in this direction; but so strong a preference has always existed in this country for the voluntary system, that neither of the Acts referred to has ever been called into operation. The two later Acts have only followed, not preceded, the establishment of voluntary Councils, and have only given the sanction of law to a system already largely adopted. Under these circumstances, no special inquiry seems necessary.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is it the case that nothing has been done under the Statute?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is so, I believe. The fact is that people prefer to manage their own affairs in their own way.

THE TRANSVAAL DEBT.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the present condition of the debt of £250,000, bearing interest at 3½ per cent., and repayable by means of a 25 years' annuity, due by the Government of the Transvaal to the Imperial Government; and whether these payments have been suspended, and for what reason?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for calling attention to this point. The payments in respect of the Transvaal debt of £250,000 have been regularly made. They have until within the last year been applied in discharge of a debt due to the Treasury Chest Fund of £61,073 15s. 3d., and now that that debt has been discharged the payments are made into the Exchequer, the first of such payments having been made in April last year. The note at page 136 of the Finance Accounts should, I think, have been fuller, and I propose that it shall be more explicit in future.

ZULU AFFAIRS.

MR. HANBURY: I had intended to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table the two telegrams of 23rd January and 1st February, 1889, referred to in Sir A. E. Havelock's Despatch of 11th February of that year, on Zulu affairs; and whether he can state exactly what proposal is referred to in the following paragraph of Lord Knutsford's telegram to Sir A. Havelock of 5th February, 1889, which paragraph has been omitted from that telegram as printed in the Blue Book, but appears incidentally elsewhere:—

"In answer to your telegram of the 1st February proposed removal of Dinizulu by force or surreptitiously undesirable;"

and by whom such a proposal was made? I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

SILVER PLATE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state if those sending in silver plate to be weighed, &c., next Thursday, are likely to receive the full amount of the drawback, or if the quantity of plate sent in is likely to lead to a considerable pro rata reduction?

MR. JACKSON: It is hoped that the sum of £120,000 will enable the full drawback to be paid on all plate, sent in next Thursday to be weighed, &c.

LICENSED PUBLIC HOUSES.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will grant a Return of the number of public houses which have a certificate licence from Licensing Justices, but whose owners, in respect to whom the certificates have been granted, have not applied to the Excise for an Excise licence?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): The information can be given.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS BILL.

MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether a Memorial (unanimously passed by the London School Board on the 20th March this year) has been received by the Education Department, in favour of the London School Board Elections Bill, which proposes to assimilate the present Electoral Divisions to those used for Parliamentary and County Council Elections; and whether the Education Department can, by Section 37, Sub-section 2, of "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," which gives them power to determine the boundaries of the different Divisions, and the number of members to be elected for each Division to the London School Board, make this necessary change under the present law; and, if not, whether the Vice President will give effect to the Memorial of the London School Board by assisting in the passing of the London School Board Elections Bill, which is down for Second Reading this (Tuesday) evening?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have seen the Memorial referred to. The Education Department have no power by order to assimilate the present Electoral Divisions to those used for Parliamentary and County Council elections. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to support the hon. Member's Bill, which will have the effect not only of altering the method of voting in the Metropolis, but also of removing the securities which at present exist for the due representation of minorities.

MEETINGS OF POST OFFICE EMPLOYÉS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the police have recently received instructions from the Post Office Authorities to make inquiries and report as to meetings of Post Office employés about to be held; whether such instructions have been issued to the police generally, or in what districts; and if he will state to the House why the police have in this respect in any case been substituted for, or added to, the Local Postmaster?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; no such instructions have been given either generally or in particular localities.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Then the inquiries which have been made in the County of Bucks by the county police have been made without the instructions of the right hon. Gentleman?

*MR. RAIKES: Certainly, Sir; I have given no instructions.

POLICE WATCHING IN NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the fact that on the 21st April last, when Father Humphry stood talking with Mr. Gill, of Nenagh (in streets of New Tipperary), the policeman, who is alleged to have told them rudely to "move on" and was asked his name, gave the name of Moran though his true name is Leonard; did he refuse to state where he was stationed, and why; what are the regulations of the Force as to giving their name and address when asked; is it the fact that, on the 22nd April, a policeman followed Father Humphry, and whistled after him in an insulting manner, and refused to give his name, but on another occasion gave it as Wilson Williams, though in a prosecution in Court swore his name was William Welsh; has the duty been especially assigned to this constable, William Welsh, to walk by Father Humphry's side and keep step with him, whilst another constable walks a few feet behind keeping step with them; and what is the name of the second constable?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone this question.

THE CONGO.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the proposals made to the Anti-Slavery Congress for the imposition of Customs duties on the Congo, whether, before the Government commits this country to that policy, this House will have an opportunity of an explanation of the reasons which may exist for adopting such a policy, and of expressing its opinion thereon?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): There would be obvious inconvenience in any discussion taking place in this House while the Conference is still sitting; but British interests in connection with this matter will not be lost sight of.

CONVICTIONS FOR DRUNKENNESS.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of convictions for drunkenness, with and without violence, in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales respectively for the financial year, April 1889 to April 1890?

MR. MATTHEWS: The judicial statistics for England and Wales give the Returns of convictions for drunkenness classed together under the heading, "Drunkenness and Drunk and Disorderly Conduct." The number of such convictions for England and Wales for the year ended September 29, 1889, was 156,634. I am not yet in possession of the figures for the period ended April 1890. For figures relating to Ireland and Scotland application should be made to the Scotch and Irish Offices respectively.

MR. SCHWANN: If the right hon. Gentleman has the figures separately for each county, will he give them in a future Return?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will consider that question.

THE ROYAL SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is prepared to accept on oath the evidence of several gentlemen concerning the transactions of Messrs. Metcalfe at the Royal Small Arms Factory; and will he cause an inquiry to consider that evidence?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: If the hon. Member will furnish me with the statements to which he refers I will consider them, with a view to see if further inquiry should be made.

FOREIGN PLATE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if instructions have been given to the Customs House Officials at Harwich, and the other out-ports, as in London, that, notwithstanding the remission of the duty, foreign plate cannot be delivered to an importer without subjection to assay, according to the superior standard in force in this country?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that there has been no change made in the instructions to Customs officers as regards foreign plate.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will now state his intentions with regard to extending the time allowed to licensed dealers in plate to send in their claims for drawback?

MR. JACKSON: Intimation has been given that if, in any case, from unavoidable delay, the detailed Reports are not in the hands of the Inland Revenue to-day, their cases will not be prejudiced.

LABOUR PROCESSIONS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why a procession of barge builders and gas stokers was broken up by the police on Mile End Waste on Friday last?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that no intimation of this procession was given to the police, and that the time chosen being night, and the night on which there was a function at the Guildhall and a demonstration of postmen on Clerkenwell Green, it was anticipated that inconvenience and possible danger to the public would result from obstruction caused by the march of such a procession, which proceeded through the streets from Mile End Waste. The police, accordingly, informed the processionists that their march could not be permitted, and prevented it taking place.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the procession was proceeding to Mile End Waste and not through it?

MR. MATTHEWS: My information is the other way.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the estimated annual cost of the Drill Instructors and Adjutants of the Volunteer Force, also of the Colonels commanding Regimental Districts in Great Britain and Ireland?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The estimated annual cost, exclusive of non-effective charges, is as follows:—For Adjutants of the Volunteer Force, £108,700; and for the Drill Instructors of the same Force, £142,400; for the Colonels commanding Regimental Districts in Great Britain and Ireland, £35,900.

ROUMANIA—MURDER AT KUSTENJE.

MR. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsay): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can give any further information concerning the murder of Private E. E. Page, Royal Marines, at Kustenje, Roumania, on 10th March?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A Roumanian lawyer has been retained by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires to act as interpreter and unofficial legal adviser at the Court-Martial. Until after the finding of that Court I shall not be in a position to give any further information on this case.

THE PLATTERS ROCKS.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the London and North Western Railway Company have offered, on certain conditions, to contribute the whole, or a part, of the cost of removing the Platters Rocks in Holyhead Harbour; and whether the offer has been accepted; and, if not, would he state on what grounds?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I can only refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to a similar question by the hon. Member for Anglesey (Mr. Lewis) yesterday.

"MITCHELL v. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the report of "Mitchell v. Regina" in the London Times, 13th of May, and the remarks in the Evening Standard of that day; and whether, in consequence of the decision of the learned Judges, he is prepared to introduce a Bill to conserve to officers the promises conveyed to them in Her Most Gracious Majesty's Royal Warrants, which are signed by the Sovereign?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There is no necessity for introducing any Bill with the object suggested in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question. The decision of the learned Judges has not deprived officers of any rights or promises conveyed to them by any Royal Warrant. The Courts have held, in accordance with former precedent, that the decision of the Secretary of State, in a case in which it is his duty to interpret the Warrant, cannot be reviewed in a Court of Law.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has noticed the extent to which the action of the weather has corroded Cleopatra's Needle so that many of the hieroglyphics appear to be becoming effaced; and whether any steps can be taken to remedy the mischief?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Clerk of the London County Council, who have charge of this obelisk, that in May of last year the acting engineer made an examination as to the condition of the Needle, and reported that its present state was not unsatisfactory; that the surface of the stone does not seem to have been affected by the weather to a greater depth than a quarter of an inch, and the hieroglyphics are in many places more than two inches deep. The granite does not seem to have deteriorated since the Obelisk was examined 16 years ago.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Cannot something be done to protect the Obelisk in the same way as the Mosaics in Italy are protected?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will draw the attention of the London County Council to the matter.

THE RIFLE BRIGADE.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 4th Battalion Rifle Brigade, which returned from India in January, has since remained unfit for service for want of serviceable arms and equipment?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: On the return of this Brigade from India it was found that their arms and equipment were in bad order, but new arms and equipment have been issued.

HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION IN IRISH BARRACKS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government to provide suitable hospital accommodation, constructed in accordance with modern sanitary rules, in connection with the barracks that are to be rebuilt in Ireland; and, if so, what particular hospitals are intended to be thus renovated?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The hospital accommodation at the Curragh and at Belfast will be enlarged in accordance with modern sanitary rules; and wherever barracks are constructed, any hospital accommodation which may be required in connection with them will be built after the most approved modern methods.

DR. TANNER: What steps are being taken in regard to the hospital of the Royal Barracks in Dublin?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The sanitary arrangements in connection with the Dublin Royal Barracks are being thoroughly overhauled.

THE COMMISSION OF THE PEACE IN SLIGO.

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether a gentleman named Gethin has been recently appointed to the Commission of the Peace for the County Sligo; if so, what were Mr. Gethin's qualifications for the office; has he a residence in the county; is he a landholder or landlord's agent, or does he hold any official position in the district; and, if he does not possess any of these qualifications, on what grounds did the Lord Lieutenant of the county recommend him to the Lord Chancellor?

MR. MADDEN: The Lord Chancellor of Ireland informs me that Mr. Gethin is neither a landlord nor a land agent; but is a gentleman of education and position residing within the County Sligo, in which county members of his family have property. He having been recommended by Her Majesty's Lieutenant of the county as a fit and proper person to be a Magistrate, was appointed in the usual course, and to meet the necessity for an additional Magistrate in the Ballymote district, in which he will attend.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this gentleman has no residence in the county nor anywhere else; and that he is simply a lodger in his brother's house?

Mr. MADDEN: No, Sir; I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that he resides in the County of Sligo.

Mr. SEXTON: That answer conveys a fallacy. Is he not simply a lodger in his brother's house?

Mr. MADDEN: The information supplied to me officially is that he resides in the County of Sligo.

Mr. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether this gentleman has really a residence or property in Sligo?

Mr. MADDEN: Yes, Sir.

Mr. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the officials of Dublin Castle to supply him in future with such information as will not be misleading to the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

EMBARKATION OF TROOPS FROM INDIA.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will direct an inquiry to be made into the circumstances under which H.M.S. Malabar recently arrived in England with 500 invalids on board, of whom 100 or more were very ill, and about 40 were absolutely helpless; whether the actual hospital accommodation on board consisted of a cabin capable, when absolutely crammed, of holding 35 berths arranged in two tiers, and whether, under these conditions, erysipelas spread so rapidly that it was necessary to leave some cases behind at Aden, with the view of trying to stop the further progress of the disease; whether the surplus sick had to be put up in cots slung along the port side of the main troop deck, where they were insufficiently protected from cold, and exposed to the dust and dirt of coaling; and whether he will try and arrange that in future invalids shall be conveyed in troop ships properly adapted for the care of the sick?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The embarkation of these troops from India is entirely regulated by the Government of India. I have requested the Secretary of State for India to give the matter his consideration, and an investigation is now taking place.

COUNCIL BILLS.

Mr. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the amount of Council Bills sold since the commencement of the present financial year; what proportion is this amount of the whole of the current year's estimate; under whose advice has Her Majesty's Secretary of State forced on the market so much larger a proportion of the year's drawings than is needed for the current requirements of the India Office; and what is the present amount of the cash balances in the Home Treasury of the India Office?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GOSST, Chatham): The amount of Council Bills and Transfers sold since the commencement of the present financial year is Rs. 5,32,34,000; being 24½ per cent. of the estimate for the year. The sales have been made under the advice of the Finance Committee of the Council of India. It is incorrect to say the large amount sold has been "forced on the market"; the demand has been abnormally large. The present cash balance of the Home Treasury is £6,000,000.

THE WELSH FUSILIERS.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Second Battalion Royal Welsh Fusiliers was, on its return from Burma in 1887, sent to Lucknow instead of to a hill station, although it had suffered severely from the effects of the climate in Burma; if he can explain why it was that, although this corps was very sickly during the autumn of 1887 at Lucknow, and that the Local Medical Authorities strongly advised that it should be sent to a hill station in the spring of 1888, no notice was taken of this recommendation; whether during the trooping season of 1888-9 more men were invalided from this corps than from all the other troops then at Lucknow, consisting of two regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and two battalions of Royal Artillery; will he lay upon the Table the Reports of the medical officers at Lucknow; and whether the corps is now at Peshawur, or under orders for that station, which is notoriously a sickly station?

*SIR J. GORST: The statements contained in the question are substantially correct, except that the battalion is the 1st and not the 2nd Battalion of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers. The 2nd Battalion is much more happily circumstanced. It is at present quartered in Galway. The Secretary of State is not aware of the reasons why the recommendation of the Local Medical Authorities was not attended to. Such matters are, I believe, in the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain if it was the fact that the Commander-in-Chief did communicate with the Medical Authorities and was in favour of their recommendation, but that afterwards that recommendation was set aside on representations which were made by other authorities? If that is so, I would also ask what is the use of having Medical Officers at all?

*SIR J. GORST: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman alludes to. I may, however, say that no recommendation from the Commander-in-Chief has been set aside by any orders from home.

MR. CONYBEARE: I did not mean that. What I meant to say was that the Commander-in-Chief was in favour of the recommendation of the Medical Authorities, but that his decision was reversed in consequence of representations made from another quarter.

*SIR J. GORST: Inquiry shall be made.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Consolidated from the PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL, AND THE URBAN SANITARY AUTHORITIES BILL.

Bill reported from the Select Committee.

Mr. Conybeare

EAST INDIA (BENARES TEMPLES).

Address for—

“Reports of the Commissioner of Benares to the Government of India of the 14th day of February, 1889, and the 4th day of April, 1889, as to certain Property and Trust Funds belonging to the Temples of Gunesch, Shiva, and Anpura, and the Chattra of Benares; and of any Despatch from the Government of India relating thereto.”—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the proceedings on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill have precedence of the other Orders of the Day and the Notices of Motion this evening and at every sitting for which it may be appointed.”—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(252.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think we are entitled to complain of this very peculiar proceeding, on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury. I do not profess to be so well acquainted with the procedure of this House as some other hon. Members; but I must say that I think it is somewhat extraordinary to find that the Government are desirous of taking up the whole time of the House for Government business before Whitsuntide. Only this afternoon we have gone through the farce of putting down our names for a Ballot, in order that we may be able in a Constitutional manner to ventilate grievances. Why does not the right hon.

Gentleman propose that all this shall be done away with at once, so that we may be spared the trouble of coming down here on Tuesdays and Fridays in order to obtain a favourable place? The position we find ourselves in at this moment is all due to the gross bungling of Her Majesty's Government. Looking at the past records of Parliamentary Government I fail to find any instance in which an Administration has succeeded in getting the business of the country into such a tangled skein. They have had their Irish Land Purchase Bill read a second time, together with the Tithes Bill, the Allotments Bill, and the Bill dealing with Registration; but when they had succeeded in getting those Bills advanced to a certain stage, with almost insane infatuation, they brought in their compensation scheme, knowing full well that it was bound to meet with the most strenuous opposition, and that it was one of the most contentious measures they could bring before the House. They have taken this course without solicitation either by the Temperance Party, or the publicans, or the general public, and with complete knowledge of the feeling which was created throughout the country when a similar course was projected two years ago, and the only way in which they propose to get out of the difficulty in which they find they have placed themselves is by proposing to sacrifice the whole of the time of private Members. Having obtained the first place to-night, I cannot abandon it without a serious protest, and certainly not without dividing the House. Personally, I have not been able to discover whether the Government really want the time of the House for this Bill, or simply to do a kindly action towards those who are assailed by the Motion I proposed to move this evening, dealing with the system of faggot voting which exists in London. There may, however, be another reason, because, when my Motion was disposed of, it would have been possible to have afforded facilities to the hon. and gallant Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes) to bring forward the Motion dealing with the dockyards which stands in his name—a Motion which the Government, by a piece of sharp practice, succeeded in staving off on Friday night. It is a singular fact that the three questions which have precedence for the evening sitting all affect the people of London, and yet Her Majesty's Government avail themselves of the opportunity for telling the inhabitants of this Metropolis, "No matter what your grievances are, we, by our automatic majority, will vote you down and take up the whole time of the House." If private Members are to have any rights at all, the conduct of the Government must be resented, and it is our duty to let the country know that if there ever was a Government which succeeded in mismanaging its business it is the present. I intend to divide the House against the Resolution.

(3.0.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I sympathise very strongly with the remarks of my hon. Friend in regard to the business which stands on the Paper for to-night. Only the other night the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, by a manoeuvre, got rid of the Motion of one of his own supporters—the hon. Member for Woolwich—with regard to the bad pay of men employed in the Public Service of the country. Only this morning I received a note from the hon. and gallant Member, in which he says, "My Motion as to the very low wages paid to labourers in the Government establishments in London is down for to-night, and will be divided upon. I shall feel obliged if you will extend to me the same kindness you did on Friday night in making and keeping a House." I have no doubt that my hon. Friends have received a similar letter, and there are very few who would not be in their place, in order to secure an opportunity of discussing the question. And now it appears that the hon. and gallant Gentleman is to be unfairly deprived of all opportunity of discussion by his own Government. I do not know whether I am in order in alluding to the scenes which kept us here until 4 o'clock this morning, but I wish to draw attention to the fact that the Government are pursuing a deliberate plan of throwing dust in the eyes of the nation. About 1 o'clock this morning, with an assumption of seriousness, they proposed, in the absence of the members of the Press, and surrounded by hon. Members who had been in attendance for nine or 10 hours, to begin the discussion of two of the most important clauses of the Budget Bill. We resisted that proposal, and I hold that we were justified in resisting it; but we offered to discuss the question adequately, as we thought the interests of our own constituents demanded. We made an offer of that kind to the Government over and over again, but offer after offer was refused, and it was only in sheer self-defence that we were obliged to shield ourselves behind the Forms of the House. I am glad to say that the course we pursued had the countenance and support of the able and impartial right hon. Gentleman who presides over the Committees of this House. His refusal to be a party to the gagging of Members drew upon him, I regret to say, something like an intentional insult, and a complete misapprehension of his motives. And what is the position of the Government? In the short recess which is about to take place if the First Lord of the Treasury makes a speech it will be to denounce the conduct of the Opposition as factious and obstructive. I entirely share the opinion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) that the present Ministry is a lawless, an immoral, and a profligate usurpation. They hold office in spite of the constant and unmistakeable condemnation of the constituencies, and under such circumstances I regard Her Majesty's Government as just as much an usurpation as if they were an oligarchy, who had established themselves by a coup d'état. For my own part, I think the House are justified in refusing to grant a single penny of the public money to a Government which has ceased to represent the nation. Upon one or two occasions we have endeavoured to call the attention of the House and the country to some of the proceedings of the Government with regard to foreign questions.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now transgressing the limits of the Motion before the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I will not pursue the subject further. I was only illustrating my argument that the Government have no right to complain of the action of the Opposition. As a matter of fact, the Government do not want this time, which properly belongs to private Members, seeing that the Budget Bill of 1885, which led to the defeat of the Government, did not reach a Second Reading until the 8th of June. The only reason for pressing forward the Bill now is to divert public attention from the mismanagement of the Government, by making an unjust and unfair attack upon the Opposition. It is part of a scheme to push through the House legislation against which the country has indignantly revolted.)

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid: As the First Lord of the Treasury is now seeking to appropriate the whole of the time of the House, may I ask him if he proposes to afford facilities this Session for the discussion of the Eight Hours' Bill for Miners, seeing that early in the Session 134 Members of the House, representing all Parties, signed a requisition to him expressing a hope that time would be found for the discussion of the measure? As the right hon. Gentleman is now proposing to appropriate the time of private Members before Whitsuntide, and as he is certain to ask for further encroachments after Whitsuntide, I think the time has arrived for asking what his intentions are with regard to a measure in which the miners of the country are intensely interested, and in which those of Scotland are unanimous? I should also like to ask when the remaining Votes for the Navy are to be taken?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not discussing the Motion before the House. Nor do the subjects to which he refers come within the period of time for which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take the time of the House.

MR. PHILIPPS: I only wished to point out that one of the questions upon the Paper for to-night would raise a discussion as to the condition of labour in the Government establishments, and if such questions as this cannot be discussed to-night, I should like to know when they can be brought on?

(3.10.) MR. SEXTON: I should like to know upon what ground the First Lord of the Treasury considers himself entitled to present a Motion attacking the rights of private Members without offering a word of explanation. The onus lies upon the right hon. Gentleman of proving that the Motion is necessary, and that at this early period of the Session it is desirable to extinguish the rights which the hon. Member for East Finsbury (Mr. J. Rowlands) and the hon. Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes) have succeeded in obtaining for the Motions which stand in their names. The House cannot forget that the hon. Member for Woolwich was on Friday night deprived of his right by something very like a trick. I strongly protest against a manœuvre by which the Government are seeking, for the second time within a week, to deprive the hon. Member, who is one of their own supporters, of an opportunity of bringing to the notice of the House the grievances of a body of persons who are in the employment of the State. I should have thought that it was, at any rate, incumbent on the right hon. Gentleman to show that the Budget Bill is of such extreme urgency as to demand the appropriation of the time required. We have not yet reached the end of the month of May, and we are entitled to inquire why it is necessary that the Budget Bill of 1890 should be passed earlier than in any previous year? I have been 10 years in the House of Commons, and certainly I have never known the business of the country to be in such a state, owing to the chronic incompetence and spurts of tyranny of the Government. I beg to move, as an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, after the word "proceedings," to insert the words "in Committee."

Amendment proposed, after the word "proceedings," to insert the words "in Committee."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(3.20.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I intend to support the Government, although representing a dockyard constituency. I regret the abandonment of the Motion of the hon. Member for Woolwich relating to the low rate of the wages of dockyard labourers; but I quite recognise that in view of the unparalleled obstruction which has been offered, Her Majesty's Government have taken the only course open to them. The hon. Member for Finsbury spoke of the farce of coming here to put down Motions for Tuesday and Friday. I do not agree that it is a farce; but, at the same time, I feel that we are sent here to do the business of the country, and not to discuss the fancies of private Members.

MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I should like to point out that, although a large number of questions of the deepest interest to London constituencies have been placed upon the Paper, not a single opportunity has been afforded for bringing them before the House. Having the honour to represent a London constituency, I think it is high time for the Metropolitan Members to make a protest against the action of the Government in seeking to deprive them of the only opportunity they are likely to have of making some of their grievances known.

(3.25.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I listened to the remarks of the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen), and I absolutely deny that there has been any obstruction whatever. If the business of the country is not in a satisfactory condition the Government are alone responsible for it. At the very earliest period of the Session the First Lord of the Treasury has come down and made a demand upon the time of the House of a most extraordinary character, but he has very prudently and wisely made no attempt to justify the demand he makes. The Government would have had their Budget Bill passed before now if they had refrained from introducing contentious clauses into it. As a matter of fact, they have introduced bills of a highly contentious character, which it would be utterly impossible to pass this Session, even if the Sittings were prolonged until Christmas. So far as the Irish Members are concerned, they know that the licensing proposals of the Government are regarded by their constituents with hate and detestation, and they feel that it is their duty to oppose them by every means in their power. The Government have tacked on to the ordinary business of the country propositions that are perfectly novel, and which raise great issues of policy upon which the constituencies have a right to pronounce an opinion. That, and that alone, is the real reason why we are making such little progress. If there has been obstruction of public business it has been the result of the unprecedented proceedings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury. We have simply done our duty in opposing these proposals, and what I suggest to the Government is that they should now take out of this Budget Bill the clauses which introduce this new policy. If they do that, the Budget Bill will pass as quickly as the Forms of the House will permit; the Government will be able to make progress with Supply, and to clear away other business of the country, and then the remainder of the Session can be devoted to the interests of Irish landlords and English publicans. It is uncandid and unfair to seek to blind and deceive the country by endeavouring to lay the blame upon our shoulders of delaying or obstructing public business when, in reality, we are simply opposing a great and novel policy which the Government are seeking to introduce under the cloak of doing the ordinary business of the country. Supposing the Government succeed in carrying out this policy, I suggest that, for the convenience of Members, they should now get up and announce to the House what is their real programme of business for the remainder of the Session, and what they propose to throw overboard, and what they intend to carry. I would suggest, too, that in order that there should be a clear week's holiday, the House, if necessary, should sit on Saturday.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Member has told us that it is the bounden duty of the Opposition to resist the policy of the Government by every means in their power. [Mr. DILLON: The policy of the endowment of publicans.] If any reasons were wanting why, as proposed by the Motion, special facilities should be given to the Government for carrying the Bill through, the hon. Member for East Mayo has himself supplied them. He has not called it obstruction, but he has admitted that the policy of the Government has been opposed by everything in the power of the Opposition—

MR. DILLON: I am afraid I must interrupt the right hon. Gentleman—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. DILLON: That is absolutely false.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order! If the right hon. Gentleman does not give way he is in possession of the House, and has a right to continue his remarks.

MR. DILLON: It is customary for hon. Members to give way under such circumstances.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is entirely optional with the right hon. Gentleman whether he gives way.

MR. DILLON: It is customary.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the majority of the House will acquit me of being in the habit of making false accusations.

MR. DILLON: You said exactly the opposite of what I said.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am content to take the judgment of the House as to whether I have put an unfair interpretation on the hon. Member's words. I made the Motion now before the House because it is imperative in the judgment of the Government, upon whom the responsibility rests, that it should be made. In the discussions which have taken place on the Bill there has been a considerable and a needless repetition of arguments. The hon. Member for East Mayo has invited the Government to take these particular clauses from the Bill. Recommendations of the same character have been made over and over again on the Opposition side of the House, and there surely must be some limit at which even the most reasonable recommendations must cease, if the majority of the House make it clear that those recommendations cannot be accepted. I am most anxious to carry on the business of the House so as to suit the convenience of private Members; but the legislation of the Government must be passed, and it is not the fault of the Government that by unduly protracting discussion private Members have deprived themselves of their opportunities. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Woolwich, he will have an opportunity of making it on going into Supply. Both the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty will give careful consideration to any matters brought before them by hon. Members with a view to remedy grievances. I will not now enter into the Programme of the Session, because the Motion before the House is an extremely limited one. If it becomes necessary for the Government to make proposals for a further extension of time, then the views of the Government with regard to the future progress of business may be properly put forward. On the present occasion we simply ask the House to give precedence to a Bill which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, ought to be passed without further delay, and as to which there has been very considerable and protracted discussion. I hope the House will now come to a decision on the question before it.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): There is no doubt the demand of the Government is a most unusual one at this period of the year. When such a demand is made it is the duty of Members of the House to examine the grounds upon which it is based. The greater part of this Bill, that which makes provision for the finances of the country, is unopposed. That could be passed to-day, and might have been passed last week. But the opposed part of the Bill has no relation to the Imperial finances, and is part of a scheme the discussion of which the Government have admitted ought to be postponed till after Whitsuntide. This is said to be a part of the business of the Government, but it formed no part of the recommendations in the Queen's Speech. It appeared all of a sudden as an accident and an incident, and as a secondary and independent part of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have heard astonishment expressed equally on both sides of the House at the madness which has inspired the Government to flash upon Parliament, encumbered as it is already by the immense demands of the Irish Land Purchase Bill and the Tithes Bill, this question of compensation to publicans. Sheridan is reported to have said that he had heard of a man 'breaking his head against a brick wall, but he had never heard of a man building a brick wall to break his head against it. Yet practically this is what has been done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in making a proposal which is no part of his Budget, but is rather an unwholesome excrescence upon it. If the Government choose to fight out this question of compensation to the liquor interest I have no objection, if only they will give time to the country to form and pronounce an opinion upon it. The Opposition is ready to fight it out; but we will not have it closed. If the Government imagine the question is going to be disposed of on a side issue they are entirely mistaken. The proceedings of yesterday were inaugurated by a rescript from the Times, in following whose advice on a previous occasion the First Lord of the Treasury came to disaster. The Times is in the confidence of the Government, and the Government enjoys the friendship of the Times. That paper yesterday—a meeting of the Cabinet was held on Saturday—announced what was to be the policy of the Government on this measure and what treatment the Opposition was to expect. The words of the Times have been endorsed by the subsequent action of the Government. They have been advised to make the best possible use of their majority without the least regard to the hypocritical outcries of the minority, because "what the country believes in is success." That is the morality of the Government policy; but whilst it is true that "nothing succeeds like success," it is also true that nothing fails like failure. The Times says—

"If work is done the Opposition may go about the country whining or howling about the arbitrary use of a majority or the stifling of discussion until they are hoarse. Nobody cares a straw though they are closed 10 times every night, nor will their complaints excite anything but amusement."

I venture to denounce language of that kind addressed to the House of Commons as a brutal and insolent outrage. [Laughter.] The First Lord of the Treasury laughs at the idea of being guided by his old friend. The House can see that what the Times has said is an exposition of the policy of the Government. There is one sentence in which I can entirely concur:—"Sir W. Harcourt and his friends have not the least apprehension of being called to account for obstructing business." Later on the Times says:—"There are far too many speeches" [Ministerial cheers];—yes, Sir, I waited for that cheer—"far too many speeches from the Government Benches." Now, the Government have difficulties. "It may be a little difficult" says the Times, "to curb the loquacity of their supporters;" but it adds that this can be done if they are made to see that business is really to be advanced by their self-denial. I was glad to see that the first lesson in self-denial was learnt by Gentlemen opposite last night. There was an attempt to carry out the policy indicated in the Times, and it was followed by as humiliating a disaster as ever befel a Government when engaged in an un-Constitutional and unscrupulous attempt to override free discussion in the House of Commons. What I protest against is what took place last night when, in the most material part of a most important policy, the Government endeavoured to gag the House of Commons, and in the dead of night to pass measures which most materially affect the interests of every part of the United Kingdom, without discussion, or in a manner of which the country could have no notice. The First Lord of the Treasury was not in the House at 4 o'clock this morning, and perhaps he would like to know what happened. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen opposite would like to forget it; but it shall not be forgotten in the House or in the country. Well, what took place? There was a scene—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to refer in detail to what took place in Committee last night, of which the House has no cognisance when I am in the Chair; but within a certain limit, which no doubt the right hon. Gentleman knows, he can allude to it in a general way.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I will follow your ruling, Sir. I was only about to say that certain incidents of the Sitting reminded me of the story of the battle of Waterloo. When we had been pounded all night, and had stood our ground, there appeared on the scene a foreign force, which the Napoleon of the night supposed to be Grouchy, but which turned out to be Blücher. Then the force disbanded, amid a general cry of "Sauve qui peut!" and the Napoleon fled. I hope that course will not be repeated by the Government. The Government, I understand, are determined to go on with their compensation scheme and with these clauses in the Budget Bill. Very well, I, for one, will not refuse them the time they ask even at the sacrifice of the interests of private Members. I regret that the interests of the people of London should be deliberately sacrificed in order to forward the compensation to publicans policy of the Government. I am very sorry that, by the brushing aside of the Motion of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Colonel Hughes), the interests of the working men, whose cause he has espoused, should be sacrificed. But if the Government are determined to make this afterthought on their part the first and most prominent portion of their policy we are ready to meet them, and will grant the time necessary to discuss their proposals. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has charged us on this Bench with weakness in our resistance to the Government. I will expose myself still further to the charge by giving the Government all the time they can get for the fair discussion of their policy. It ought to be, however, on the understanding that their proposals are not hastily forced through by the Closure. The difficulty in which the Government find themselves is due to the character of their measures, which are repugnant to the feeling of the nation—Bills for buying out Irish landlords, compensating English publicans and brewers, and aiding parsons in Wales. That is not a popular programme, or one that recommends itself to the country. If, however, they choose to occupy the whole time of Parliament for the discussion of these particular topics we cannot help ourselves, and must meet them as best we can. In order that we may have ample time to discuss their policy, we will not oppose their present demand.

(4.4.) SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I do not wish to use any of the epithets which have been used against the Government to-day. They have received a severe castigation. They have been called lawless, immoral, and unprincipled, and the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to their having suffered a humiliating disaster. I wish to appeal to them in a friendly spirit. On one point the Government and myself are at present in cordial accord, and that is in the desire to promote temperance. They seldom make any speeches without saying that the earnest desire of their hearts is to promote some temperance measure. In fact, I look upon them now not so much as a Government as a great temperance league. It is not for me on this occasion to discuss their mode of promoting temperance, but I think they must admit that there are other people who have the interest of temperance at heart almost as much as Her Majesty's Government. To-morrow there is on the Paper a Bill which embraces the views of an enormous number of the people of this country in regard to what should be done towards diminishing the evils of the drink traffic, and I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he thinks it ought not to be discussed. It is a Bill based on three Resolutions of this House, and there are more people interested in it, I feel sure, than are interested in any other Bill before the House at the present time.

(4.6.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): If I could hope that by giving the Government the time they ask for we could obtain from them time for adequate discussion, I should not have the slightest objection to granting them a certain amount of time, on the principle of giving them enough rope; but I am afraid the rope would be used to strangle us. They would take the time of private Members, and, instead of giving us full opportunities for discussing the compensation proposals, they would Closure us. I should, therefore, like some Member of the Government to be good enough to break that remarkable silence which has fallen upon them since they received the orders of the Times, and explain the intentions of the Government with regard to the future. The First Lord of the Treasury has put himself forward as a very able man of business. I shared in the opinion that he was an able man of business, but I own I have been disappointed. I think now that not only is the right hon. Gentleman not a good man of business, but that he does not understand the House of Commons. He seems to be under the impression that he should come down here as a sort of schoolmaster and treat us as a sort of school children. It is all bullying and bartering on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. He is constantly telling us if we do not do this or that we shall not have a holiday—as if we were children. That, Sir, is not the way to treat the House of Commons. We know we are absolute worms in the right hon. Gentleman's eyes, but by the course he has adopted he has induced us to turn and protest against his proceedings again and again. An hon. Gentleman opposite spoke of us as having been guilty of unparalleled obstruction. I must explain that the word obstruction is used in two senses—a good sense and a bad sense. Of course, all opposition is obstruction in a certain sense. The First Lord of the Treasury pointed to the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) as having announced an intention to obstruct, because he said he would delay and oppose. Why, every speech in opposition to the proposal of the Government naturally delays that proposal being passed, and opposes it. In that sense, no doubt, we do obstruct, but, in an improper sense, we never obstruct in this House. I have heard this playing on the word obstruction time after time. The ins always complain of opposition as obstruction, whilst the outs maintain that it is legitimate opposition, although immediately the outs become the ins, their view of opposition changes, and they begin to charge their opponents with obstruction. If the present Government should go out, its Members would be found to act just as we are acting at this time. ["No, no."] Well, we shall see. On the Land Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, the Conservatives did not obstruct—God forbid that I should charge them with anything of the kind—but they took 38 days to consider the clauses in Committee. When we have occupied 38 days in Committee on a Bill of the First Lord of the Treasury, perhaps he may be justified in complaining of obstruction, but I deny that he has any ground for complaining of it now.

(4.12.) Mr. W. H. SMITH rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

*MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the House that the subject under discussion is the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for West Belfast to insert in the Motion after "proceedings" the words "in Committee." I do not think there is any disposition to unduly delay the decision on that Amendment.

(4.12.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think I may say, Sir, on behalf of my Colleagues, that you have fairly interpreted the feeling which prevails on this side of the House, and I thank you for allowing us to continue for a few moments longer the Debate raised by my hon. Friend. It is a remarkable thing that the First Lord of the Treasury has so little regard for the rights of private Members that, even at the moment he is depriving them of the time which the Rules of the House allow them for bringing on business, he endeavours to prevent them from expressing an opinion upon his action by the Closure. In spite of the violent interference of the First Lord of the Treasury, I will say that which I rose to say, namely, let us fall in with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Let us agree to give the Government the whole time of the House, let us not take a Division against the present proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, on the understanding that now that he proposes to take private Members' time, he shall not, at least in the time he so takes, attempt to use the Closure. Let the Government take, in addition to their Morning Sitting, all the time of the House after 9 o'clock to-night, and let them have all to-morrow, in addition, but let private Members be protected in their own time from the violent measures of the First Lord of the Treasury. It will go forth to the country that the right hon. Gentleman has met the proposal of the Member for Derby by an attempt to apply the Closure; but, at any rate, let it also go forth that private Members are not to be closed during the time they surrender to the Government—that they are not to be strangled by their own rope, so to speak. I think the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is a good one. We are entitled to an answer to it, and also on another matter. This Motion will give the Government an additional day and a half. Surely, therefore, hon. Members are entitled to have a day and a half added to the Whitsuntide holiday. I entirely repudiate any charge of obstruction. There is, indeed, no need for obstruction, as we are not now in the position we occupied in former times. We have nothing to gain and everything to lose by obstruction. The game of obstruction, if it ever was played in this House by private Members, is at an end. All we desire is to have a reasonable opportunity of expressing our views and of arguing questions with the Government.

*(4.15.) MR. W. H. SMITH: It is the intention of the Government to use the time of the House in a proper and reasonable way. In regard to the holidays, if the hon. Member will put a question to me on Thursday on the subject, I hope I shall be in a position to give him an answer.

(4.16.) MR. SEXTON: If the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Derby, supported by my hon. and learned Friend, is accepted, we shall understand that the proceedings on this Bill only occupy the time usually at the disposal of private Members, and be free from the operation of the Closure Rule.

*(4.17.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member must see that I cannot give any general pledge on that point. There is an expectation held out by the right hon. Gentleman himself that the proceedings in the Committee on this Bill shall terminate within a certain reasonable time. I say no more than this—that the Government will endeavour to conduct the Debates in a just and reasonable spirit.

(4.19.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I should like to explain that what I intended to say was, that if the Government receive a large accession of time from private Members, it will be unreasonable on their part to insist upon forcing on Debates at late hours of the night to the inconvenience of all parties in the House, and when it is impossible that the Debates could be reported. I say that that will be unreasonable, and I accept the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman that he intends to act in a reasonable manner. Consequently, I understand that we are to consider ourselves safe from being called on to continue these discussions at an unreasonable time of the night. In these circumstances, I hope we need not go to a Division.

*(4.23.) MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be remembered that I alluded to the reasonable expectation held out by the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Members opposite that the Bill will pass through the Committee to-morrow.

(4.23.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope that reasonable expectation will be fulfilled, but I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that when, at the instance of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), I made that offer to the Government last night, it was rejected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I consider I should be at liberty to recede from that offer if I desired to do so. I do not desire it however. I hope that expectation will be fulfilled.

(4.24.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): We, too, are to indulge in the expectation that we shall not be kept up to an unreasonable hour, and that we shall not have the Closure applied to us. Our position with respect to this Budget Bill is this. It has been a surprise to us from first to last. It was not in the Queen's Speech, and must have been the result of a sudden decision—either that, or the Government have kept it in their minds without saying anything about it. We have heard from the Government, over and over again, that they do not desire to compensate the publicans, but this is a measure to give compensation, and the conviction of the overwhelming majority of the people of this country is that if the Bill passes in its present form an enormous burden will be thrown upon the shoulders of the taxpayers through this compensation. Our constituents—and I can speak for my own—are most anxious that we should press the Government for an explanation of the scheme. We cannot do this with the fear of the Closure hanging over us.

(4.25.) MR. SEXTON: I understand it to be affirmed that the proceedings on the Bill are not to be pressed forward at an unreasonable hour of the night. Upon that understanding I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

(4.25.) The House divided:—Ayes 306; Noes 137.—(Div. List, No. 100.)

Ordered—That the proceedings on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill have precedence of the other Orders of the Day and the Notices of Motion this evening and at every Sitting for which it may be appointed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—(No. 231.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Postponed Clause 6.

(4.40.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move, in line 34, to leave out the word "gallon" and insert "hogshead." The object of this is to reduce the taxation on the shoulders of those people who are least able to bear it. The amount of taxation raised from the Alcohol Duties is £21,649,448, and this presses very unequally on the rich and poorer classes. For three glasses of British spirit, the poor man pays, say, 1s., and out of it he pays 9d. on duty, but suppose a man consumed a bottle of wine that cost 1s. 6d., the only payment to the Exchequer out of that is a 1d. This increased taxation now proposed means increased adulteration, and it means an increase in illicit distillation, and consequent loss to the Revenue. I cannot say that I should be prepared to condemn this illicit distillation, though technically it is against the law, because I know the taxation upon the article is unjust and is unequal in its incidence between the rich and the poor. I know it is urged that the heavy taxation will conduce to temperance, because it will act as a check upon consumption, but I am quite sure that those who have studied the question will come to the conclusion that this is all nonsense. If you were to take all the taxes off, I do not believe there would be a whit more drunkenness, and, indeed, I believe there would be less. There would be less of the habit of men treating each other, for it would be a cheap and common means of refreshment, and there would not be heavy drinking bouts alternately with periods of total abstinence. The very heavy duty on spirits stimulates the manufacture of spirits from unwholesome materials, bad spirit impregnated with fusel oil finds its way into consumption, and Excise officers can tell you that a large amount of spirit is made from molasses and other substances. I am not greatly impressed by the statement made in the Times that a similar Amendment to this, devoted to the Customs Duty, was a foolish and meaningless Amendment. It is simply a protest against the working classes being robbed, as practically they are, with every glass of liquor they take, and being compelled to bear taxation which, if fairly adjusted, should fall upon the landed class and the richer classes in the community.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 34, to leave out the word "gallon" and insert the word "hogshead."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'gallon' stand part of the Clause."

* (4.43.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I really have nothing to say more than I said yesterday in regard to a similar proposal. The whole argument of the hon. Member goes for a total abolition of the duty. It would be far better to make a total remission of the duty than to reduce it to a 54th part of 6d., which would be a ridiculous conclusion.

(4.43.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): My hon. Friend has explained the principle upon which he makes his proposal, he finds that opinion is adverse to it, and I would suggest that he should not put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

(4.44.) MR. BLANE: Yesterday I had three Amendments, only one of which I actually moved, and did not take a Division, but all the same I am met with a charge of obstruction. Neither yesterday or to-day has the right hon. Gentleman convinced me that there is any, absurdity in my proposal, but though the Government have not showed themselves worthy of much consideration, yet, in deference to the request of my hon. Friend, I will not insist on the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.45.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I take the liberty of moving the Amendment of which I have given notice, to insert in line 34 the words—

“Of spirits which shall not have been in bond for a period of at least one year the duty of 6d. per proof gallon, and so in proportion for any less quantity.”

This raises a very important question on which we have had no defence of the Government proposal, and, indeed, a somewhat qualified assent to my view from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It may be objected that it raises the whole question which was raised on a former occasion upon the “Bonding of Spirits Bill,” but that is not quite the case. The Amendment reduces to a minimum the ill effects of the proposed new tax as regards Ireland and Scotland, and will, I think, largely tend to diminish the annoyance the tax will cause. If there is one thing more than another in connection with the Spirit Duties upon which all parties are agreed, it is that it is highly desirable, if it is practicable, that new spirits should not find their way into consumption, or, at any rate, that no facilities should be offered for such spirits finding their way into ordinary consumption. Where my Amendment differs from the proposal to bond all spirits for 12 months, is in giving a Differential Duty of 6d. a gallon in favour of spirits that have been bonded 12 months, favour being shown to the better article, which is not likely to produce the injurious effect on the consumer that new spirit does; whereas the Bill to which I have alluded proposed to apply the 12 months restriction to all spirits. In 1879 that Bill passed its Second Reading without Division, and why it was not carried to a legislative enactment I do not understand. I have read the Debates on that and other occasions, and I find that any argument used against the bonding of spirits for 12 months could not apply to this Amendment, because here the bonding for that time is optional and is not absolutely demanded, but the Preferential Duty will encourage dealers to put the same mellow spirit on to the market. There is an abundance of testimony to show the injurious effects of new spirits, and all authorities are agreed that, at the present time, a large amount of new spirit, containing fusel oil in large proportion, finds its way into general consumption, with, of course, great injury to the health of the consumers. The Committee appointed to hold the inquiry in reference to the Adulteration of Food Act of 1872 reported unanimously on this very subject. They said there was a singularly unanimous expression of opinion from scientific witnesses as to the perfectly maddening effect of the consumption of new spirit. Dr. Cameron, a well-known scientific authority, said that fusel oil was highly pernicious, even in small quantities, and he went on to express an opinion that it would be well if new spirit were not allowed to be removed from bonded stores until after the expiration of an appointed time, say a year. That is exactly in the direction of my Amendment, which is, however, not compulsory. Another authority, Dr. McAdam, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry at Edinburgh University, said—

“I have not the slightest doubt that the fusel oil in whisky is injurious to health, and I believe in most cases the maddening effects attaching to whisky drinking are due to the presence of fusel oil.”

That Committee arrived at its opinion upon testimony which was overwhelming to the same effect. Last night we had an expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he undertook that this question should be considered, not only from a Revenue point of view, but as it concerns the health of the community. That being so, I suggest that my Amendment is well worthy of attention, and is a step towards a solution of the difficulty. If we bring in a Bill to provide that all spirits shall remain in bond for 12 months, we shall meet with opposition from certain distillers, who will urge that it is unfair to ask them to lock up their capital for 12 months, thereby handicapping them in their competition with importers of foreign spirits, but my proposal, acting in a permissive way, will give the home distillers the benefit of the difference in duty if they give the public a more wholesome article. I hope I have made my meaning clear, and I believe there would be no Excise difficulty in carrying out my suggestion. The consumption of spirits in England, Scotland, and Ireland, is on the increase, and how far that increased consumption is made up of new spirits it is impossible to ascertain. I have endeavoured to find out, but I have been unsuccessful. I do not know whether the Government have any means of ascertaining the respective proportions of new and of matured spirits sold, but I think one would be safe in arguing that, if this additional tax of 6d. per gallon is imposed, and if the Government entertain the idea that its imposition will bring about an increased Revenue, the actual result will be that a greater quantity of new spirits will be put on the market. I think it would be better by far to offer an encouragement to distillers to keep their spirits in bond for a good period. I am not concerned, either directly or indirectly, in the trade, but I am making this Motion in the interests of the good character of both Scotch and Irish whiskies, because I know that, under the present absurd system of Excise collection, a large quantity of maddening new spirit is now put on the market, and I am anxious to restrict the sale of such spirit. Those who are jealous of the reputation of whisky should support this Motion. I have been told by some hon. Members of this House that they would prefer to see whisky abolished altogether. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth, who makes such interesting speeches on the subject of temperance, said, that instead of keeping spirits in bond for one year he would prefer to see them kept in bond for two hundred years. But we must approach this subject as sensible men. If whisky is made to be drunk, surely it is an advantage that it should be given to the public in a form in which it will not produce bad effects. I know of some parts of Ireland where it has produced most terrible effects; and if we refer to the Constabulary Returns, and to the evidence of those who are interested in the subject, we shall find that the new whisky that is sold in many parts, both of Scotland and of Ireland, produces these bad effects, both on the morals and on the health of the community, and leads to a very large amount of disturbance and disorder. If anything could be done to diminish the terrible evils of intemperance, which undoubtedly arises from the consumption of new spirits, I think it should be done; and I believe that the Amendment which I have proposed would be a step in the right direction, and one which ought to command the sympathy both of the Committee and of the Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 34, to leave out all the words after "gallon," and insert the words "of spirits which shall not have been in bond for a period of at least one year the duty of sixpence per proof gallon, and so in proportion for any less quantity."—(Mr. Flynn.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(5.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: I can assure the hon. Member that I have devoted a portion of the short time which has elapsed since last night's Sitting to a study of this particular question. I have been in conference with distillers from Scotland, and, although I desire to deal seriously with this question, I am not prepared to accept this Amendment in the form in which the hon. Member has put it. We must proceed with considerable caution in the matter. I can assure the hon. Member, however, that it is receiving most careful consideration. It would be necessary, for instance, to define the class of spirits which ought to be kept in bond. It is not all spirits that should necessarily be so treated. The Amendment may be desirable in the interests of whisky, but I am told that in the case of gin that spirit is as good, as far as health is concerned, immediately after manufacture, as it is after keeping it for a considerable time. I propose to have a scientific examination made on this question, and I, therefore, hope that the hon. Member will not press his Amendment.

(5.9.) MR. SEXTON: I am glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has determined to pay attention to this very serious question. But what he has stated in reference to the difficulty is a matter which, I think, might be dealt with in Committee. Of course, if gin stands in the position stated by the right hon. Gentleman, it could easily be excepted from the operation of this Amendment. I contend that the interests of the Irish whisky manufacturers are seriously damaged by the lack of a provision such as is contained in this Amendment. This question has been a long time before the House. It is a complicated question, and I trust that now the right hon. Gentleman has entered upon an investigation he will be able to put a stop to the practice of which my hon. Friend complains, and I also hope that before next year's financial proposals are made we shall have communicated to us the decision at which the right hon. Gentleman has arrived.

*(5.11.) MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir. I certainly will undertake before another year's Budget to announce my decision, but I hope to be able to deal with this matter even before then. I shall place myself in communication with the distillers of Ireland in the same way as I have communicated with those of Scotland.

5.12.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire to say I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has gone the right way to work in making inquiries into the matter if he has consulted only distillers.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have consulted others than the distillers, and am in communication with scientific authorities who may be able to throw some light on this subject. I desire to communicate with anyone who may be able to assist in this investigation.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I am glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that he is in consultation with authorities other than distillers. I have a very great regard for distillers, but the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I impress upon him the serious importance of this subject, so far as the Irish people are concerned. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the character of Irish whisky, when it gets fair play, is very high indeed. I do not know whether it is within his knowledge that very recently a great and distinguished monarch was kept alive for a very long period by the use of this stimulant, medically applied. I am told, on the highest authority, that the late Emperor Frederick was almost fed on Irish whisky during the latter months of his life. Experience proves that Irish whisky, when properly dealt with, possesses very valuable characteristics, but I am sorry to say that its character at the present time is very low indeed. In fact, the distillers and manufacturers have been driven out of the market by the adulteration of the article. Irish distillers, unfortunately for themselves, have a habit of selling all their productions in a new and raw state. The whisky is made from the very best materials, and it is able to resist the largest amount of adulteration; but when it gets over to England it is so mixed up with deleterious commodities that its character is destroyed. I have noticed that, as a result of this, in the great refreshment houses in the Metropolis, the demands for Irish whisky are only about one-ninth of those for Scotch whisky. That is a revolution which has been brought about in the trade during the last 15 years.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is surely straying very far from the Amendment before the House. This Amendment does not affect any particular whisky. It only provides for the keeping in bond of spirits for one year.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I only want to point out that if Irish whisky is taken out of bond before it is 12 months old it is more liable to adulteration with deleterious compounds, and I believe if this Amendment were carried it would be an encouragement to Irish distillers to keep the spirit until it is perfectly matured. I am speaking, also, in the interests of the Irish barley growers. The population of Ireland is largely engaged in agricultural pursuits, and I believe that one effect of passing this Amendment would be to give the agricultural population a little better opportunity of meeting the many and weighty engagements which they are already under, and which they are about to enter into with the State. I have still another reason, and that is in connection with the health of the people at home. I am sorry to say, from my knowledge of the trade in Ireland, that the people engaged in distributing this drink to the poor buy, in most cases, the very newest and the very rawest spirits. They then reduce it to a very low degree—far below proof—and subsequently add to it a quantity of deleterious spirit in order to give it a strong flavour, and to make it so that the customer can feel it going down his throat. Now, the spirit thus provided has a very bad effect on the health and on the morality of the people. New whisky taken out of bond is able to resist this reduction to a much greater degree than old spirit, and I think that the adoption of this Amendment would have a beneficial effect on the Irish people at home, by securing the destruction of the power to add to the spirit these deleterious compounds. We should get a more wholesome and a better article for the consumption of the people. I have for a great many years observed the evil effects produced on the people in Ireland by the use of new whisky, and I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Committee would confer great benefit on the people if they accepted this Amendment.

(5.21.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire) : This question affects Scotland as well as Ireland. I have among my constituents a considerable number of distillers. Of course, I do not claim many supporters among them, because I have never opposed the increase of the Spirit Duties. But I have had communication with many distillers, who have urged me to support this Amendment, I desire particularly to draw attention to the use of the German potato spirit. I am informed that it is no uncommon thing for the spirits to be blended in the Custom House, and for the German potato spirit to be used for this purpose. I am informed also that if Scotch whisky is kept in bond, for 12 months this adulteration with German spirit would become impossible. I, therefore, ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an assurance that he will put a stop to the custom of allowing Scotch whisky, adulterated with German potato spirit, to be sold in the open market as genuine Scotch whisky. I think the principle of Trade Mark legislation might very well be applied to the whisky trade, and I shall be glad to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he will not overlook this point.

*(5.23.) MR. GOSCHEN : Proposals have already been made for preventing this practice, but I am afraid they have not been practical ones. I have asked the authorities at Somerset House to investigate this matter. I agree with the general principle that Trade Mark legislation ought to apply to spirits as well as to other articles of commerce, and I hold that Scotch or Irish whisky which is largely composed of German potato spirit should not be sold as Scotch or Irish whisky.

(5.25.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I think that, after the expression of opinion by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it will not be necessary for us to divide on this Amendment. We are aware, from what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said on previous occasions on this matter, that he has a not unsympathetic mind. He has stated that he is examining into this question. We know that he has enormous sources of information at his command ; information which is largely of a Departmental character ; but I would suggest that he should come into more direct contact with the distillers. There is now a Committee sitting upstairs to consider the Trades Marks Amendment Act of last year, and I would suggest whether it would not be desirable to refer the question to that Committee, or to a Special Sub-Committee, in order to go fully into the matter. I am strongly in favour of temperance, and I think it is to the interest of everyone that pernicious spirits should not be sold. It is in the interest of temperance men, as well as moderate drinkers, among whom I number myself, that we should have reasonable and legitimate protection from the adulteration of Scotch and Irish spirits. I am very glad to think this question has made great progress since it was first brought forward by the late Mr. O'Sullivan. I think the Government are entitled to great credit for the action which they have taken in connection with the Merchandise Marks Amendment Act. It is a valuable measure to the commercial community, and I would urge on the right hon. Gentleman that this question of the blending of whisky, and the keeping it in bond, is one which, being as it is of an entirely non-contentious character, might very well be referred to a Committee, which could have before it rectifying distillers and others interested in the trade. I think an inquiry by such a Committee would very materially strengthen the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in dealing with the question of the importation of foreign spirits.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I may state that the idea has passed through my own mind as to whether it would not be wise to refer this subject to a Committee upstairs. I thought it my duty to make the necessary inquiry into the matter myself; but I should be very glad to share with or pass over the responsibility to a Committee of this House. I will, however, communicate with my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury on the subject, but I think it right to add that, in my opinion, it would be well to refer this question, together with other similar matters in relation to the group of questions connected with the manufacture of whisky and other spirits, to the same Committee, should one be appointed; but, at the same time, it must be understood that this is not to interfere with the question of taxation.

(5.31.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I think the right hon. Gentleman will be doing well in referring this question to a Committee, and I hope it will be a Special Committee, and by no means a large one. After what the right hon. Gentleman has said, I do not think it necessary to refer to another matter I was about to urge upon him with reference to the question of branding; and therefore I will only suggest the employment of a brand or mark, such as the letter B, on any blend, which distinctive mark should be continued up to the moment the Customs receive the goods.

*(5.32.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I am extremely glad to have heard the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I have no doubt that his promise will greatly facilitate the passage of the Bill.

(5.32.) MR. FLYNN: I feel grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the statement he has just made. I would suggest that in the inquiries he may make he should consult the Irish distillers, who are fully competent to furnish every information as to the character the Irish whiskies hold in the general market and the disadvantages to which they have been subjected by a long course of unfair treatment. I am glad of the reception given to my Amendment, and I wish to express my agreement with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tipperary that it would be better to have a small than a large Committee, and also that it would be better to have a Special Committee than to send the questions to be considered to the Merchandise Marks Committee. After what has now taken place, I ask leave of the House to withdraw my Amendment.

(5.34.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I venture to say that the statement made on behalf of the Government as to the appointment of a Committee to consider this question will materially reduce the number of Amendments to the Bill, but I should like to make one suggestion. We must, of course, recognise the enormous experience of hon. Members now sitting on the Merchandise Marks Committee; and, though I think we ought to have a separate Committee to inquire into this question, I would suggest that if the experience of some of the Members of the Merchandise Marks Committee can be brought to bear on the new Committee it would be a distinct advantage.

(5.35.) Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FLYNN: I now rise to move, as an Amendment to this clause, the omission from page 2, line 35, of the words "United Kingdom," in order to substitute the word "England," the object being that the proposed increase in the duties on spirits should not fall on Scotland or Ireland. We say that this increase of the Spirit Duties is unnecessary, unjust, and uncalled for. It is uncalled for because there is no precedent for raising the Spirit Duties at a time when the Budget has shown a surplus. There was a rise in the Spirit Duties five or six years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was Prime Minister, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh was Chancellor of the Exchequer; but at that time there was a deficit, which is not the case now. Again, we say that whisky is the national beverage both of Scotland and Ireland, though in Ireland it is not consumed to such an extent as in Scotland. Still, it is proportionately much more largely consumed in Scotland and Ireland than in England, and, therefore, the duty presses more heavily on the Scotch and Irish than on the English people. Looking at the Return furnished by the Secretary to the Treasury, I find that taking the heads of the Customs and Excise Duties on spirits, together with those on wine and beer, in England, the amount is £20,140,000; in Scotland, £3,805,000; and in Ireland, £3,222,000; the average per head of the population being, in England, 14s.; in Ireland, 13s. 6d. and in Scotland, 18s. 10d. But when we turn our attention to the Excise Returns on spirits alone, we find that England pays 5s. 6d. per head; Ireland, 8s. 6d.; and Scotland, 14s. per head; while the amount of Excise Duty on spirits retained for consumption in the three countries, as compared with the total amount of duty from all sources, is 31 per cent. in England, 65 per cent. in Ireland, and 76 per cent. in Scotland. I would remind the House that when the then Government was defeated on this subject by a majority of 12, in 1885, on the Amendment moved by the present President of the Board of Trade, that Amendment declared—

“That this House regards the increase proposed by this Bill in the duties levied on beer and spirits as inequitable in the absence of a corresponding addition to the duties on wine,” and so forth. How do the right hon. Gentleman and those who supported that Amendment reconcile that proposition with their present attitude in regard to this question?

*(5.45.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I may answer that question at once, and the answer is that since then the duty on wine has been increased.

(5.45.) MR. FLYNN: It is hardly necessary to stop to inquire how far the votes and speeches of that time were animated by political and Party considerations, but I find that among those who supported the Amendment denouncing the increase of the Spirit Duties was the hon. Gentleman the sometimes Civil Lord of the Admiralty.

(5.46.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman should address himself to his own Amendment which proposes to allow the duty in England, but not in Scotland or Ireland.

Mr. Flynn

(5.46.) MR. FLYNN: Every Member of this House is anxious to have your experienced guidance, Sir, in matters relating to the business before the Committees of this House; and I shall not, therefore, go further than to express my surprise that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side can be found supporting the present proposal when they voted against a similar one in 1885. Looking at the question as a whole, we have this undoubted fact before us that the proposed increase of the Spirit Duty is viewed with great disfavour and dislike both in Ireland and Scotland. I think the Government are bound to make out to the satisfaction of the country that this increased duty is required. This they have failed to do, and, therefore, seeing the strong feeling which prevails in Ireland and Scotland against the proposal, I beg to move the Amendment I have placed on the Paper.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 35, to leave out the words “United Kingdom,” and insert the word “England.”—(Mr. Flynn.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘United Kingdom’ stand part of the Clause.”

*(5.48.) SIR J. M’KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I think the case is much stronger than it has been put by my hon. Friend, because not only does this increased duty affect England, Ireland, and Scotland unequally, without any corresponding duty being imposed on foreign wines, but between 1885 and now a considerable reduction has been made on the duties on foreign wines.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the Amendment is against the imposition of the new tax in Scotland and Ireland, while it allows it with regard to England; but it is not directed against the tax altogether.

*SIR J. M’KENNA: I am endeavouring to show that this additional tax is altogether unjust.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to speak against the tax altogether.

*SIR J. M’KENNA: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and would therefore now merely point out that the duty on the national beverage of Ireland is as 10s. compared to 1s. 10d. on the alcoholic equivalent in the national beverage of England—beer.

(6.12.) MR. FLYNN : The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Blane) would reduce the tax to 1-54th of the sum proposed in the Bill, and would, therefore, be a reductio ad absurdum. Perhaps he was not altogether wrong, but he cannot use that argument against the Amendment I now move, as it is of a very moderate character. I trust the Party opposite who say that they put this additional tax on spirits in the interests of temperance really have those interests at heart. If they have I think they will find no difficulty in accepting my proposal, which is to make the new duty 1d. instead of 6d., so as to proceed gradually. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made out no case for the 6d. It is not justified by the state of public finances, for his Budget shows not a deficit, but a large surplus. The Scotch and Irish Members do not consider that a case has been made out for the 6d., and if the motley group who call themselves "Unionists" would only remember that this matter, after all, is really a Scotch and Irish one, and that the proposal of the Government is not necessary, I think they would find no difficulty in agreeing with us. Let the Committee consider what a large proportion of the Revenue on spirits is raised in Ireland and Scotland. We have a Return showing the incidence of taxation, and from that I will extract a few figures for the information of the House. I find that in 1881-1889 the number of gallons of spirits on which the duty was paid in Ireland was 4,826,352. The proposed increased duty, payable in Ireland upon this—supposing the consumption this year is about the same as last—would be £121,700 ; but if my Amendment were adopted that would be reduced five-sixths, leaving the increased revenue at £20,000. That, I maintain, would be a considerable addition to the taxation of Ireland, especially in view of the fact that you propose to put up the money for some years to come. The increase in Scotland under my proposal would be £27,000, which is a large sum to extract from such a poor country. The increase in England under the right hon. Gentleman's proposal amounts to £572,807, a very respectable sum wherewith to commence this experiment. I do not adopt an extravagant view or speak in terms of unqualified censure of the scheme of the Tory Party. They defend this increased charge on broad and general principles, and I go with them to a great extent ; but I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should advance slowly and steadily on the road he wishes to follow—that he should begin with an extra impost of 1d. instead of 6d. ; then, if he finds it work well, and finds that the people gradually get reconciled to the tax, he will be able to advance by progressive steps. In time the right hon. Gentleman would have no difficulty in getting the whole 6d., but the country would have faced the tax gradually, and we should have had experience in the way in which the money should be applied. I think the Government will be the first to acknowledge the reasonableness of the manner in which we are discussing these various Amendments and clauses, and I would urge on their attention the desirability from every point of view of accepting this proposal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should forget for the moment that he is a Party man, and should remember only that he is the guardian of the Public Purse. If he does that, I think he will see the advantage of proceeding in this matter by gradual steps.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 37, to leave out the word "sixpence" and insert the words "one penny."—(Mr. Flynn.)

Question, "That the word 'sixpence' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

*(6.22.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I have to move the rejection of this clause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to put a new tax on whisky without putting a new tax on beer. He has repeatedly told us in the course of these discussions that he is imposing a new tax of 3d. on beer, that the extra 3d. was last year put on beer on the understanding that it would be taken off on the earliest possible occasion. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer argues that he has carried out any such undertaking he is playing with the brewers—he is deceiving them. He is taking off a tax with one hand and putting it on with the other. As a matter of fact, the relative taxation of beer and of spirits is an important factor in the international incidence of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman will not dispute that the relative taxation was arranged as far back as the year 1868, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian raised the duty on spirits to 10s. per gallon. You then had a Malt Tax. That Malt Tax has since been converted into a Beer Tax, intended to be its exact equivalent. The brewers made an outcry on the occasion of the change, saying that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would mulct them to the tune of some £800,000 a year, and the consequence was a change was made in favour of the brewers' contention. Subsequent experience, however, showed that the remission had been made in consequence of statements which were found to be incorrect, and, consequently, in 1889 the right hon. Gentleman re-imposed the duty on the basis on which it was originally proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and in order that there might be no mistake on the subject his words were quoted last night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). It is clear that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) intended to go back to the original scheme of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. The right hon. Gentleman tells us he imposes this new tax on spirit in order to rectify an unfair advantage which Scotland and Ireland are obtaining at the expense of England, owing to the distribution of the Probate Duties. When, however, the right hon. Gentleman made the allocation of the Probate Duties, he gave us not the smallest reason to think that the arrangement was not to be permanent. As a matter of fact, he anticipated an increase in the Probate Duties, and he put forward that anti-pation as an additional inducement to Local Authorities to accept his scheme. The right hon. Gentleman wants not only to take the increase back from us, but to impose a heavy fine upon us.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not take it back. I do not understand the hon. Member.

\*DR. CAMERON: Well, the right hon. Gentleman does not take it back; but he leaves us a benefit of £56,000 and imposes a new tax, of which we shall have to contribute £76,000 more than we shall receive back, leaving us minus £20,000. The right hon. Gentleman has laid before us a Return which is very ingeniously drawn up so as not to show this. We shall benefit to the extent of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the Beer Duty; but, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own Return, Scotland is called upon to pay £76,000 a year more than she will receive in connection with the new tax. This, I say, is a grossly unfair proposition. We have nothing to do with the increase in the Probate Duty, as the proportions of that duty were settled three or four years ago, and the right hon. Gentleman knew very well what he was about when he settled that proportion. The right hon. Gentleman challenged us with the alternative suggestion that the respective duties raised in the different countries should be allocated to each country in proportion to the amount obtained from them. I should accept the right hon. Gentleman's challenge gladly, because if his suggestion be adopted, Scotland will be £7,000 or £8,000 a year better off than she is now. According to the right hon. Gentleman's Return, while Scotland will only receive out of the Probate Duty a benefit of some £69,000 a year, she will have to pay under the Whisky Duty some £76,000 a year. Of course, the same argument would not apply to Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman knows his offer could not possibly be accepted, inasmuch as we have no right to give up the Probate Duty as fixed. I move the rejection of the clause.

(6.40.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I hope we shall be allowed an opportunity of discussing this question properly. It is a question greatly affecting Scotland. I have repeatedly challenged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us the figures to show what proportion of the Probate Duty is paid by the Metropolis, and England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. We have the figures with regard to the Income Tax, and it is important we should have those relating to the Probate Duty. In the meantime, I do not wish to repeat the arguments used, but I think this clause will work great injustice to Scotland.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I deny that there is any injustice to Scotland in the allocation of the new tax. What we propose is that we should follow the same principle in dividing this particular tax as we followed in respect to the Probate Duty.

*MR. CHILDERS: What is required is a division in proportion to the extent to which each country contributes to the tax.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not possibly have picked out a tax which is so unfair to Ireland as the Probate Duty. I deny that the Returns upon which the money has been allocated are fair. Ireland, for instance, gets a less share of money than she would get if the Returns, which you signed when Secretary to the Treasury, had been adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The hon. and gallant Gentleman is now entering upon the subject of the next clause—the question of the distribution of the money.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not entitled to say that there has been a real increase in the Beer Duty, when it has been proved out of the right hon. Gentleman's own mouth by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton that he has said that the transaction is a mere rectification of the mode of levying the duty.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I have no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will claim the credit of giving Ireland a greater amount than her contribution entitles her to, but I desire to point out that, whatever benefit Ireland derives from some remission of taxation, it is taken from her with the other hand. It is true that in the whole scheme of the right hon. Gentleman Ireland is benefited, to some extent, by the reduction in the duty upon tea, but then Ireland will lose in regard to the manufacture of whisky a greater amount than that which she will save by the remission upon the Tea Duty. We shall save by the reduction in the Tea Duty something like £105,000, but the right hon. Gentleman proposes to impose an additional tax of 6d. per proof gallon upon what I may call the native manufacture, namely, whisky. [MR. JOHNSTON: There is linen.] Yes, but the linen manufacture is confined to one corner of the country, while whisky is manufactured all over the country, even in Belfast. The increase that will accrue to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's next Budget will be something like £106,108, and that will more than counterbalance the benefit we derive from the remission of other taxation. This additional tax is put upon an article that is already overtaxed.

MR. FORREST FULTON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but THE CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: If the hon. Member makes the same Motion later on—at 12 or 1 o'clock—I do not think the Chairman will oblige the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. J. O'CONNOR: If the hon. Member had been paying attention—

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 241.)

SECOND READING

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Johnston.)

DR. TANNER: I would not object to the Second Reading of this Bill if the hon. Gentleman would consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. There are many debateable points, and I think the best way of satisfying the claims of all parties would be to refer the measure to a Committee.

MR. SEXTON: There are, no doubt, debateable points, but I do not think it necessary to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. I would suggest that the Committee stage should be delayed until we have had an opportunity of considering all the points dealt with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I hope the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time. I have carefully gone into the details of the Bill, and I believe the Bill will afford a means of settling the question upon a satisfactory basis.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday 11th June.

Postponed Clause 6.

Question again proposed, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

(9.2.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: When you rose from the Chair, Sir, I was about to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the proposed tax upon whisky as contained in this clause presses with unequal incidence upon the two sections of the population in Great Britain and in Ireland, and I alluded to the fact that it is a tax on what is essentially an article of Irish manufacture, and this may also be said of Scotland. The duty per proof gallon on beer, the drink of Englishmen especially, is 1s. 8½d; upon wine, it is 3s. 10d.; on whisky, it is 10s. Now, this is one of the grievances of which we complain, that the alcohol used by the richest of the three countries is taxed in the lightest manner. It is, I believe, a maxim of finance that taxes ought to press heaviest on those best able to bear them, and there can be no doubt that the people of England are, of the population of the three Kingdoms, best able to bear heavy taxation. England is more wealthy, her people are engaged in manufactures and industries of the more profitable kind, and occupy a more favoured position than do the people of Ireland. Yet the national drink of Ireland is taxed nine times more than beer, and three times more than wine. Wine is essentially the drink of the wealthy, yet it is taxed but a third of the rate falling upon the drink of the poorest people. A gallon of whisky costs, I believe, 3s., so that the tax upon it amounts to 333 per cent., and I maintain this is both unfair to producers and consumers. There is another phase of this branch of the question. Beer and wine cannot be adulterated in the same manner as whisky. There is an article introduced into this country called Hamburg sherry, and the importation is allowed with a Customs Duty of 2s. 6d. It contains 42 degrees of spirit of the worst and most deleterious character, and is a mixture of potato spirit and water, and yet this deleterious compound is allowed to come into the country with a Customs Duty of 2s. 6d., while on the same quantity of whisky at the same strength we pay 4s. 2½d. But that is not the worst of the case in regard to Hamburg sherry. You cannot adulterate your beer with it or mix it with your wine, but it may be blended with the best whisky produced in Ireland and Scotland, and there is always a temptation to those engaged in the rectification and distribution of spirits to use this deleterious compound to mix with the wholesome spirit, because of the lighter duty paid upon it. Before I part from these facts I wish to point out another anomaly which appears from this Return supplied on the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Provand). From this Return I observe that the revenue derived from Customs and Excise Duties on wine and beer in England and Wales amounts to £28,379,567, and that number of pounds sterling about equals the population of England and Wales; that is to say, the amount derivable from Customs, Excise, and licences equals £1 per head of the population. I also find that the amount derivable from these sources in Ireland amounts to £4,689,814, which is exactly equivalent to the number of population, and £1 per head of population. Here is another injustice to the poorer country, in contravention of the maxim I have alluded to, that a tax should fall lightest on the weakest shoulders. These figures should have had the close attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and when he made his proposal for this extra tax Ireland at least should have been exempted. Amendments have been proposed having for their object the exemption of both Scotland and Ireland; but I am confining myself to the question of Ireland, and I maintain these figures afford strong argument for such exemption, as they do for the omission of the clause altogether. If Members would disregard the claims of Party, and study this Return and the incidence of this tax, I am sure they would see the justice of my argument in support of my proposition that the proposal of the Government is unjust in its inception, and particularly unjust in its application to Ireland. One result of this clause of the Bill will be increased adulteration, by water or by the unwholesome spirit I have mentioned. When, in times past, whisky was taxed at only 2s. 8d. per proof gallon, there was no temptation to use bad grain in the manufacture or to adulterate the spirit; but the increased duty gave rise to the temptation, and by this addition the temptation will be increased. Not content with this increase of duty, you have proposed by legislation, to increase the cost of the dealers' licence, to restrict his hours of sale, and you render his right to renewal of licence insecure; and, as a climax, you add 5 per cent. to the tax on the chief article of his trade. This must inevitably lead to adulteration of the article sold. And now, to turn to another portion of the subject, the effect this proposal will have on an important industry in Ireland. I do not oppose this tax as it affects whisky simply; you impose this taxation on agriculture, the staple industry of the people of Ireland. The farmers of Ireland have many drawbacks, and have many heavy claims upon their agricultural profits. Already you have imposed a tax on the growth of barley of £80 an acre—a crop which is especially suited to the light soil of Ireland and the conditions of Irish agriculture. I know many parts of Ireland where the soil is suited only for barley and oats, and in those districts are distilleries where the farmers get fairly good prices for their grain, upon which your tax of 10s. a gallon on spirit is equal to £80 an acre. The Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles at this, and probably the right hon. Gentleman has in his mind that the public pay the tax; but if we had a lighter tax we should be able to produce whisky for export trade under more favourable conditions and double our output and our commerce. But you make an additional impost equal to £4 an acre on barley. Hitherto we have been able to maintain our own in the growth of barley; we have had serious competition from Canada and other large grain-growing countries, but notwithstanding, the barley grown in Ireland has had the preference from Irish distillers, and soil and climate are favourable to its perfection. But by this tax you encourage the foreign importation and increase the difficulties of the native grower. But this branch of the subject will be dwelt upon probably by some hon. Member better able to deal with it than I am. It is stated that this additional 5 per cent. tax on whisky is to be used for buying out publicans in Ireland. I should not be in order if I dwelt upon this matter, and I will only express my objection to any publicans being bought out in this manner. In the future, if promised legislation should take effect, we will provide other and more suitable means of accomplishing this object than the method provided in the Bill. We believe that our publican friends have an equitable right to renewals of licences, and we will find some more equitable means of compensating them than that of adding to the taxation of the principal article of their trade. For these reasons I oppose this clause and shall support the hon. Member for Glasgow, in the belief that the clause is vicious in principle and will work evil to the interests of those I have the honour to represent.

(9.30.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I address myself to this clause from a wholly different point of view to that of the hon. Member who has just spoken. So far as Scotland is concerned, we have no desire whatever to press the point that we should, on account of our poverty, be taxed in any way less than those who constitute the taxpayers of the three Kingdoms, and I may state at the outset that, looking at it from our point of view, we have no objection per se to an additional tax upon alcohol. Our objection to the tax is founded on the injustice of the tax to Scotland. We find from statistics that are not contested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that although of the three Kingdoms Scotland is the most sober, that is to say, our people take the smallest quantity of alcohol, yet for this small quantity we pay a rate almost equal to that paid by Ireland. We take exception to this clause upon the fundamental ground that it is wrong to utilise Imperial taxation for local purposes. But admitting that there are two purposes for which the money is intended, our contention is that in equity it would be right to give this 6d. a gallon upon alcohol to Scotland; and if the sum raised upon alcohol is insufficient for the purposes of the United Kingdom, it would be just both to Ireland and to Scotland to put an additional tax upon beer and wine and not upon whisky. May I point out that the distillation of alcohol gives the least amount of employment in comparison with any other industry. I had intended making these remarks on the Second Reading of the Bill. I may add that I think the tax is unnecessary in another respect. We have contended that we might dissociate this Bill altogether from the increase of the duty upon alcohol, by putting a duty, if necessary, upon the licences themselves. This would entirely obviate the difficulty we are placed in in taking this money which is raised from the tax upon alcohol, and placing it, as far as Scotland is concerned, to a purpose which is obnoxious to the whole of the Scotch people. Therefore, we contend that even if the tax were necessary for a subsidy for these local purposes, it is entirely unnecessary if we impose the tax equitably for the purposes for which it is intended. In this respect I shall not continue the argument further, because it has been admitted (and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not denied) that, so far as Scotland is concerned, the amount collected is unjust and inequitable. No one could read the speeches delivered from this side of the House without admitting the justice of the argument that we are taxing the poor man in the interests of the rich; and when we consider the purposes to which this money is to be applied, then this injustice becomes more apparent. Beer is, undoubtedly, consumed by a large class of the people in England who are better able to pay than the Irish taxpayer. As far as I am individually concerned, many of those whom I represent have no objection to this tax in the interests of temperance. But the question is, will it contribute in any large extent to the relief of local taxation? I should be sorry to represent to this House that we object to this tax upon other grounds than that it is inequitable, and that it is altogether unnecessary. The latter point is proved by the evidence of those who are imposing the tax. We are told that it is the direct result of the equalisation of the Death Duties in 1885, when the Conservative Party had in view self interests more than the interests of the poor. Well, the highest form of flattery is imitation. We contend that they are still putting this tax on unfairly, in the interests of the well-to-do, and applying it to purposes which, so far as Scotland is, concerned, are obnoxious and extremely objectionable to the great bulk of the people. I shall feel it my duty to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division of Glasgow, and to oppose this tax as unfair to Scotland and unnecessary and objectionable in its incidence.

(10.40.) Mr. SEXTON: The Preamble of the Bill is the most daring work of fiction I have ever met with in the whole of my Parliamentary career. It recites that—

"The Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled, towards raising the necessary supplies to defray Your Majesty's public expenses, and making an addition to the Public Revenue, have freely and voluntarily resolved to give and grant unto Your Majesty the several duties hereinafter mentioned."

With regard to the clause at present before the House, not one word of that is true or resembles the truth. The fact of the matter is that those of the Commons who happen to be in the minority, so far from "freely and voluntarily" giving their votes, have them demanded by force and by Closure, and by all night sittings. The supplies which the Government are now asking for are not even an addition to the public revenue, for they constitute no part of the Imperial Budget, but are merely local expenses, which have nothing to do with Imperial matters. I need not point out that the few hundred thousand pounds that are to be applied this year represent what will be only a drop in the ocean of an ultimately accruing liability. I protest against the alienation of Imperial revenue in this manner as an evil innovation, and as a dangerous mode of applying Imperial resources. What is the genesis of the clause under discussion? Before the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to levy this increased tax upon the United Kingdom, and in a particularly burdensome manner upon Ireland, did he ask himself the question whether the whole contribution of Ireland to the revenue was enough at present? Did he ask—"Is it as much as she can bear?" "Is it too little or is it too much?" No; he never wasted a thought upon the question. He merely said to himself, "I want a million of money for England." Why did he want it? Because he was tormented by the English County Councils, in consequence of the limitation of their resources, owing to his failure to pass the Van and Wheel Tax. We now find ourselves in the position that Ireland is called upon to pay for the Parliamentary reversals of the right hon. Gentleman. Having first obtained as much money as he requires for English interest, he allows Ireland to have the balance. I greatly regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not consented, pending the establishment of Local Government in Ireland, to strike out this country from the operation of the clause. I can show him in a moment that he might have agreed to suspend the question of fresh taxation in Ireland, pending the introduction of Local Government in Ireland, without any dislocation of his financial scheme. The gross produce of the additional tax to be imposed on spirits and beer would be £1,300,000. Ireland's total contribution would be £154,000, and if the right hon. Gentleman consented to forego the application of the scheme of increased taxation to Ireland, it would only decrease his resources by £154,000. He would still be enabled to spend £300,000 upon the superannuation of the police, £350,000 upon licences, and to give to the County Councils £356,000. But there are other reasons which justify them in giving their strenuous opposition to the clause. In the first place, out of the money to be raised in Ireland one-fourth will never be given back; secondly, the whole of the remainder of the fund will be appropriated to the purposes of the guarantee under the Land Purchase Bill (if it should ever pass), which we most emphatically condemn; and, in the third place, the sum of £40,000 a year, to be raised by this tax from Ireland, is to be locked up for an indefinite term of years. It is to be placed in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. It is entirely a matter of speculation whether the present Government will ever attempt to pass a Local Government Bill for Ireland, and I shall protest in the most emphatic manner against the raising of £40,000 a year from Ireland to be left for some indefinite number of years in the hands of the Commissioners referred to, until this Government or some successive Government are pleased to pass a measure of Local Government for Ireland. I shall also take exception to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, because it has been elaborated without consultation with any Irish Member of Parliament.

*MR. GEDGE (Stockport): I rise to order. I ask you to rule, Mr. Courtney, that the hon. Member is not now in order.

THE CHAIRMAN: Undoubtedly the hon. Member is diverging from the subject, but not to such an extent that I can rule him out of order. He is only referring to these matters in passing.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to add to what I have already said, with reference to that portion of the scheme dealing with the money to be appropriated for the national teachers, that it is in my opinion a scheme which confers the least possible benefit in quarters where relief is most required. Another point entitled to attention is the contingent injury that will be done to Irish agriculture. It is true that the continual increase in the duty upon Irish whisky has grievously hampered the cultivation of Irish barley, but the present proposed impost will be a further hardship to the Irish farmer and to those who are dependent upon him, and it will still further grievously burden an Irish agricultural industry which has already a sufficiently hard struggle for life. I protest against any increase of the Spirit Tax in Ireland for any purpose whatsoever, because already the tax is grossly inequitable and oppressive in Ireland. I will go back as far as the year 1852. How did the Spirit Tax stand then? In Ireland it was 2s. 8d. a gallon, and in England 7s. 10d. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer argues that the proposal to differentiate upon the tax on whisky in England and Ireland is not business; but he cannot now see that not so many years ago it was business. For the last forty years Ireland, a country of decreasing population and of decreasing capacity to bear this fiscal burthen, has been the victim of a long and steady course of the most wanton fiscal aggression. In England during those years the tax has been increased from 7s. 10d. to 10s., but in Ireland it has been quadrupled. It was Mr. Disraeli who equalised the tax on spirits in England and Ireland, beer being the drink in England. And what is the result? The poor man who drinks whisky, which is the ordinary drink in Ireland and Scotland, pays six times as much on what he drinks as the man who drinks beer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer taxes alcohol to the utmost limit when he finds it in the whisky. Why does he not tax it to the same extent when he finds it in the wine and in the beer? There ought to be established some equitable relation in the principle of taxation. Upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's principle that there is no equitable relation between the taxes on the different liquors, he may abolish the tax upon beer altogether, and make the Englishman altogether free; or, on the other hand, he may raise the money now wanted by putting a tax of another shilling on beer. Certainly Englishmen would not tolerate such a tax. Or he might raise the money by putting another shilling on whisky, which would prove intolerable to both Irishmen and to Scotchmen. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is very fond of saying that it is not because people drink hard that he ought to be expected to lighten taxation upon what they drink. The argument would perhaps be sound if it represented the fact, but as it stands it conveys a complete misapprehension. If there is hard drinking anywhere it must be in England, because the records show that in England the consumption of beer, wine, and spirits is 6½ gallons per head; in Scotland it is 4½ gallons per head; while in Ireland it is only 3 gallons per head. If the taxation were fair it would bear some relation to the consumption. But what is it? In England it is 14s. 1d., in Scotland it is 18s. 10d., and in Ireland it is 13s. per head, whereas it really should be, in England 14s. 1d., in Scotland 9s. 4d., and in Ireland only 6s. 3d. So long as the present disproportion exists I shall feel it my duty to continue to protest against this mean, aggressive, and disgraceful fiscal policy, which weighs down on the two poorer members of the Imperial partnership for the benefit of the richer party. My second reason for my opposition is that the Government have in the present financial year a surplus out of which they ought to have provided for the purposes to be met by this tax. When the right hon. Member for Edinburgh proposed to increase the tax in 1885, it was to make good a deficit. He had no surplus. But this year the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus of £3,500,000. He might have increased the duty on foreign spirits and raised £200,000. He might have transferred the 3d. a barrel on beer from Imperial to local revenues, and raised £326,000, giving a total of nearly £600,000. In order to make up the requisite £1,300,000, he could have taken £700,000 from the surplus. Ireland has been cheated out of her fair share of the surplus. According to a Return presented to Parliament, Ireland yields about 1-12th of the whole of the Imperial Revenue. The different partners in the United Kingdom ought to have the benefit of the surplus as nearly as possible in proportion to their rate of contribution, which would give Ireland, contributing 1-12th of the whole Revenue, £300,000. But this surplus is, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, raised in the main from the taxation on spirits, of which Ireland provides one-sixth; so that she is entitled, contributing, as she does, 1-12th of the whole Revenue and one-sixth of the entire taxation, to something between £300,000 and £500,000. What does Ireland receive? There is £300,000 for barracks, about which I am very careless. We can always have barracks. There is £120,000 for the Volunteers; but the Volunteers are a forbidden force in Ireland. There is £180,000 for cheapening the postage between this country and India and the colonies; but Ireland's commercial relations with India and the colonies are not very extensive. Ireland's interest in the Plate Duty is nil. Her interest in the Currant Duty is represented by £5,000 a year. The House Duty is a cypher. It is idle to argue as to the contributions to education and police. The cost of the police is great, because it is maintained as an Imperial and Military Force.

*MR. GEDGE: I rise to order. I ask the Chairman to rule that the hon. Gentleman is out of order in discussing these matters on the question whether the Excise Duty on spirits shall be made equal to the Customs Duty.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to use these arguments.

MR. SEXTON: I argue that double as much is taken from Ireland as she can afford. A part of it is spent in Ireland upon Imperial establishments, which are bloated establishments, which are always costly, which are often corrupt, and which are maintained in Ireland at a strength and upon a scale which would not be necessary if the system of government in Ireland were in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people. The only benefit Ireland derives from the surplus is in relation to the Tea Duty. At first I thought this would represent £150,000. But I find by a Treasury Return that the Tea Duty paid in Ireland was about £300,000 a year, the remission of one-third of which would represent £100,000. My last point is—what does Ireland contribute, and what is Ireland obliged to contribute, in excess of her real capacity? I should like to guide myself by the light which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will throw on taxation of this kind, and I should like to ask him respectfully whether he has formulated in his own mind any principle to guide him with regard to the relative capacity of the countries, which are partners in the United Kingdom, to contribute to the common purse. We shall have to press the question and get a practical conclusion upon it. - Mr. Giffen has calculated that if you take England and Ireland, and if you test the relative capacity of the two countries to contribute to Imperial taxation by the relative wealth of the two countries, the amounts of amassed capital in England and in Ireland, the capacity of Ireland is only 4 per cent. of the capacity of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian proposed in 1886 that Ireland should contribute 1-15th of the Imperial Revenue, but I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to consider that provision in his Bill had it reached Committee in a just spirit; but, at any rate, the Irish Members were prepared to argue that the proportion was excessive. I ask attention to the Return of the incidence of taxation of May the 7th. It appears by that Return that England contributes slightly in excess of four-fifths of the whole Imperial Revenue. Ireland contributes 1-12th of the whole. What test does this enable him to apply to ascertain whether or not the contribution of Ireland is fair? I cannot apply the test of indirect taxation, because indirect taxation, though nominally of the same amount in both countries, might be made to press unfairly upon one of them by being directed against one particular article. So that, though the two countries are placed together in fiscal partnership, the whole burden might be placed upon one. This was, I think, a clear and conclusive argument to the fallacy urged that a tax must be fair because it is the same in both countries. The Returns afford a very instructive test in the matter of direct taxation. England contributes 81 per cent. of the whole Imperial Revenue. The Return shows four heads of direct taxation. The first is Probate Duty. By the calculations for the current year England yields to the Imperial Revenue 87 per cent. of the whole Probate Duty. That she yields 81 per cent. to the Imperial Revenue and 87 per cent. of the whole Probate Duty, and therefore her contribution to the Imperial Revenue, judged by the Probate Duty, is light. The second head of direct taxation is Excise Licences. Under this head England contributes 86 per cent., and, judged by this, it is plain that her contribution to the whole Imperial Revenue is light. Under the head of stamps the contribution of England is 89 per cent. and her contribution under the head of Income Tax is 87 per cent. These four heads show one concurrent result, that the capacity of England to yield to the Imperial Revenue is greater, as judged by those tests, than her whole contribution—Probate Duty, 87 per cent.; licences, 86; stamps, 89; Income Tax, 87; and her whole contribution, 81. Now, turn to Ireland, and the demonstration is also concurrent and conclusive, but emphatically conclusive, the other way. The contribution of Ireland to the Imperial Revenue is 8 per cent. of the whole of what is her contribution to the Probate Duty, which is a fair test, and means the duty levied upon accumulated wealth left at death by individuals. Ireland's whole contribution under the Probate Duty is only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The contribution of Ireland under Excise Licences is 4·7 per cent.; under stamps a very fair test of the wealth and prosperity and thriving character of a community, her contribution is only 3·7 per cent.; and, more conclusive than all, the Income Tax test, Ireland contributes to the Income Tax only 4·4 per cent. If we take these average tests of the capacity of Ireland to contribute to the Imperial Revenue, we have it plainly demonstrated under the four heads that the contribution of England is the lighter tax. If ever the matter is mathematically demonstrated I think it is demonstrated by those figures. Judged by these four tests the contribution of Ireland to the Imperial Revenue is double what it should be. For this reason I object to any increase of the Imperial charge upon Ireland for any purpose whatever. Steps should be taken to reduce the contribution of Ireland to one-half of its present amount, and I ask for a special inquiry into this subject. I claim, as a matter of right, that a Select Committee of this House be appointed to consider the incidence of Imperial taxation at the present moment in Great Britain and Ireland, and I ask the House to suspend the portion of the proposal in regard to increased taxation, so far as Ireland is concerned, until that Committee has reported whether the present incidence of taxation on Great Britain and Ireland is tolerable or fair, and what steps should be taken if the burden is found to be undue in the case of Ireland to reduce her contribution to such an amount as will appear to be a more just contribution from the relative capacity of each country to contribute to the common purse of the United Kingdom. I can hardly believe that they will venture to support the omission of the clause. I would remind the Committee that we have already passed Clause 4, dealing with foreign spirits, and to that the present clause, dealing with home-made spirits, is a necessary corollary. If Ireland is treated differently from England in this matter she will have to be treated as a foreign country in order to prevent spirits, on which a lower duty has been paid, from being smuggled into this country. The cargoes of Irish ships trading to this country will have to undergo inspection, and the whole process to which foreign vessels are subjected by the Customs.

Authorities will have to be applied to Irish vessels. With regard to Ireland being overtaxed by direct duties, I would point out that assessed taxes and House Duty are not paid in that country, and that Income Tax is 25 per cent. lower there than in England. ["No!"] As to indirect taxation, the remedy is in the hands of those who pay it. For instance, Guinness's stout is made in Dublin and is a favourite beverage in England, and I would suggest that if Irishmen do not like paying the increased duty on whisky they should drink their own stout. It is not the people who are taxed under the system of indirect taxation, but the commodity, and therefore those who object to the tax have only to refrain from the consumption of the commodity.

*(10.40.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: It seems to me that the interesting and elaborate arguments to which we have just listened might have been appropriate to some large proposals dealing with the question of taxation generally, but are hardly pertinent to the clause before the Committee. The point of this clause is to put 6d. per gallon on home manufactured spirits, and, if the clause is struck out, there will be no extra duty on home manufactured spirits, whilst it will remain on spirits of foreign manufacture. Those who support the Amendment, knowing what its effect will be, in reality become Protectionists, and I should hardly have expected to find a proposal to omit this clause supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who pride themselves on being Free Traders. The hon. Member has argued as if spirits were the only drink and whisky the only spirit. The additional duty is to be put on brandy, gin, and rum, as well as whisky, and if the Irish do not like the extra duty upon it, they can avoid payment of this extra taxation by drinking their home manufactured Guinness' stout.

(10.48.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Before I say anything in the nature of hostile criticism upon this clause, I wish to say that the one redeeming virtue of the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, that he recognises in the collection and distribution of these taxes the principle of nationality. It is somewhat remarkable that a gentleman who prides himself upon his antipathy to Separatist tendency, should have introduced the principle into national finance. For the right hon. Gentleman proceeded upon the principle that, in providing assistance to local purposes, he should take not the individual, nor the county, but the unit of the nation; and having ascertained the proportions in which revenue is derived from Scotland, Ireland, and England, he recognised the principle that these nations as nations are entitled to recover in the form of local assistance, as nearly as possible, the sum which they have contributed to the Imperial Exchequer. Under that blessed régime we should have a little annual income of nearly £750,000 in Scotland, which would be most convenient when the time comes, as it will come, when we have a separate Legislature as well as a separate finance. One objection I have to the clause is, that the 6d. duty on whisky is imposed on Scotland for purposes which Scotland does not approve, but, on the contrary, reprobates and condemns. In the Division on the Second Reading, we had an opportunity of ascertaining to what extent Scotch opinion supports the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On that occasion, out of 72 Scotch Members, only 23 supported the Government. Therefore, on the threshold of the controversy, we have the principle of nationality recognised, and it follows that the money ought to be distributed according to the opinion of the people of Scotland. A two-thirds majority having condemned the distribution proposed by the Government, only one of two courses is legitimately open to the Government—either to drop the clause as regards Scotland or to agree to distribute the money according to Scotch opinion. The right hon. Gentleman has achieved the almost miraculous feat of rousing the opposition of every class in Scotland. By this clause he has alienated those who drink whisky; by the proposal to compensate publicans he has alienated the Temperance Party; and by giving the money to buy out licences, instead of giving free education, he has alienated all included in the category of the friends of education. The sum given to Scotland—less by £60,000 than it ought to be—is admitted to belong to the people of Scotland. I have no hesitation in saying that the great majority of the people of Scotland would rather that the £50,000 with which it is proposed to buy out publicans in Scotland were dropped into the sea. I am, therefore, curious to know upon what principle the right hon. Gentleman is first to distribute the money according to nationalities, and then refuse the people of Scotland the application of the money as they desire. I congratulate the Government on having got a splendid cry for the next election. The first cry will be the pensioning of the publicans, and the next will be the cry of spoiling the schools, for the £50,000 is exactly the sum required to complete free education in Scotland. So distributed, you take the money from one class of persons and give it to another, thus robbing Peter to pay Paul. I would point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that there is no Party so much interested in opposing the sort of legislation which has become the characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman's finance. If you raise taxes merely in reference to the annual expenditure of the nation you have some kind of check on the vagaries of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But if you adopt the principle of this Bill you adopt a principle which, as it may be applied some day, will be most disastrous to the institution of private property. I know the right hon. Gentleman may contend that hitherto he has been taking money from the masses and giving it to the classes; but a Government may arise that is constituted on a different principle, and they may say that their duty is to fleece the classes in order to relieve the misery of the masses. They will be able to quote this and other Budgets of the right hon. Gentleman as sanctioning the very dangerous principle of using the power of the State for the direct and intentional purpose of taking money out of the pocket of one man and putting it into the pocket of another. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, by a shrug of the shoulders, appears to indicate that he denies he is taking money from the masses and giving it to the classes. Excepting at the two extremes, the principle of local taxation is extremely fair and just. Then, as to indirect taxation, a man pays in proportion to what he consumes, and, therefore, the taxation falls heaviest on the poor man. It is manifest that, by the enormous extension we have given to the principle of indirect taxation, we are imposing an enormous and excessive burden upon the poorer classes. I, for one, will never vote for the extension of such taxation by a single farthing. I undertake to say that the amount of revenue obtained from spirits and beer alone is more than a fair contribution to the Revenue of the country which the working classes ought to be called upon to make. Therefore, in order to do even-handed justice, we ought to abolish the duty on tea, coffee, tobacco, and dried fruits.

\* (11.2.) MR. GOSCHEN: I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman on the general subject of the amount of taxation which ought to be paid by the consuming classes. That is a very wide subject, upon which I do not propose to embark. But the hon. Gentleman said we are making splendid election cries for the opposite side. He suggests that the Government are spoiling the schools in Scotland by the allocation of this money. But who is it that supplied the funds for making education free in Scotland? The hon. Member and other Scotch Members have forgotten what I, as a Chancellor of the Exchequer, have not forgotten—that Scotland will be entitled to a considerable sum next year when the Government come to deal with assisted education. It will then be seen whether the Government have spoiled the Scotch schools. But I turn from the speech of the hon. Gentleman to the far more important speech of the hon. Member for Belfast. The point of the whole speech of that hon. Gentleman is that Ireland is overtaxed, that her contributions to the Revenue are in excess of what Ireland ought to pay, and that Ireland does not receive back her fair share. The hon. Member wants to know whether the yield from Probate Duty, Income Tax, and stamps is not a fair criterion of the taxpaying capacities of the two countries. Well, it is an element of course, but not the only element. The hon. Member thinks that if the Probate Duty is 88 per cent. in England and 4 per cent. in Ireland it proves that the wealth of England is 88 per cent. and that of Ireland only 4 per cent. According to the hon. Gentleman, if there are in one country 10 individuals who possess £100,000 apiece, and 10 in the other who have only £10,000 apiece, while the rest of the population is very much in the same position in both countries, the proportion of taxation should be as 10 to 1. But it is clear that we cannot take the test only of the upper portion of the population; we must look to the other taxpaying classes. The hon. Member is aware that while the population in Ireland is  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., her contributions are only 8 per cent. There are other matters that go to show the wealth of a country besides its contribution to Income Tax. It does not follow that because there is so great a disparity in the wealth of the upper strata of society in England as compared with Ireland, as shown by the Income Tax payments, that the same disparity exists throughout the population generally. Having regard to bank deposits and other indications, it appears that the population of Ireland is well able to contribute its share to Imperial expenses, from which, as in the case of the reduction in the colonial postage, it will benefit as much as the other parts of the Kingdom. [Mr. SEXTON: Ireland has no commerce.] It is not only the commerce of the country that will gain by the reduction of the postage, but it is individual correspondents; it is the poorer classes who have friends in the colonies, and with whom they correspond. The hon. Member spoke of the Tea Duties, and wanted to minimise the benefit which Ireland will get. Ireland will gain precisely in proportion to the tea she consumes. The only real objection Ireland can take is in regard to the House Duty.

MR. SEXTON: I decline to admit that argument. I say you should not, in the first place, exact from her more than her share.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member not only said he declined to admit that argument, but I think he denied the force of the argument. I have gone through the Estimates clause by clause, and I shall be prepared to lay a Return on the Table, which, I think I may say, will show that without exception in every class of the Estimates Ireland receives a much larger share of the Imperial Revenue than she contributes. I can give the hon. Member one specimen.

COLONEL NOLAN: How about Museums?

\*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, for public buildings. She receives more than her share. For education she receives 16 per cent. instead of the  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. she is entitled to. For school buildings England and Scotland receive 74 per cent. and Ireland 26 per cent.; for reformatory schools England and Scotland receive 73 per cent., whilst Ireland receives 27 per cent. instead of  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. And so it goes on in nearly every item. The hon. Member asks that there should be a Committee to review the taxation of Ireland. I will consult my right hon. Friend, and I think we shall be prepared to grant an inquiry into the financial relations of the two countries. I do not want to exclude Scotland, and I think hon. Members from both countries will see that we are anxious to meet them. I cannot pledge myself without further consulting my leader on the subject, but we shall be glad to throw as much light as possible on the financial relations of the two countries. Hon. Members will see at once that it must be a full and proper inquiry, but of course we cannot consent to hang up this additional 6d. until the inquiry is complete. Of course, if the inquiry should show that injustice has been done to any part of the United Kingdom, steps will be taken to afford redress. I trust that, as I have made this statement, hon. Members will not think me wanting in courtesy if I do not enter at greater detail into the other points they have touched upon. The hon. Member for West Belfast has asked on what principle we tax alcohol in whisky more severely than alcohol in beer. It is not a conclusive answer to say that this principle has been accepted by all Governments hitherto, but that is the case, and we could scarcely raise the whole question of the relative taxation of alcohol on this Bill. We hope the imposition of the additional tax will not cause the illicit distillation which the hon. Member seems to fear; and we hope that, by extending the inquiry to the modes in which whisky is made, we shall get rid of any fear that there will be a further deterioration in the materials used in the distillation. I hope hon. Members will see that my proposal is reasonable, and that I have endeavoured to meet them in a spirit of courtesy.

(11.24.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think we have every reason to congratulate ourselves on one result of the masterly discourse delivered by my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), a result which we have long sought to achieve, namely, the inducing of the Government to consent to the appointment of a Committee to investigate the financial relations of England, Ireland, and Scotland. We are prepared to face such an inquiry, and we believe it will have the very best possible results. I am delighted that an opportunity has at last been afforded me of laying before the Committee my views of the case of Ireland against any increase in the Spirit Duty. My task has been very considerably lessened by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, who most lucidly went over a great portion of the field I had proposed to traverse myself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not satisfactorily answered any of the objections made by my hon. Friend against the distribution of the surplus. One-sixth of the surplus of £1,800,000 was contributed by the Irish people, and, instead of one-sixth, we have got 1-35th part, or less than a fifth of what we are entitled to. It is preposterous to suppose that Ireland will obtain much relief from the reduction in the postage to India and the colonies. I should say that hardly any of the letters passing between this country and India come from Ireland. One remark made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly astounding. He said that the poorer classes in Ireland were more able to contribute to the taxation than the poorer classes in England. Did anyone ever hear a more preposterous idea exhibiting more ignorance of the position of the two countries? If it be true that there is this shocking, this sad distinction, between the upper classes of England and the upper classes of Ireland, that difference is increased threefold when we come to the poorer classes.

Mr. Goschen

I venture to say that if a real inquiry were made before a Committee it would be found that the mass of the labouring people of Ireland are not in a position to pay taxes at all, and that an honest system of taxation would pass them over altogether, for many of them are without the ordinary necessities of life. They are not a population which ought to be taxed for Imperial purposes. The present proportion—and this I conceive to be an argument against any increase of the Spirit Tax in Ireland—the present proportion between the amount contributed to the Imperial Revenue by Ireland and Great Britain is grossly unfair. I need not go at length into an argument which has been so well set out by my hon. Friend; but as some doubt has been thrown on the question, although there has been no attempt to reply to the argument as a whole, I will quote an authority which I think will be generally accepted. Four years ago no less an authority than Mr. Giffen said—

"Ireland is overtaxed in comparison with Great Britain. It contributes twice its proper share, if not more, to the Imperial expenditure of this country."

This and the facts with which Mr. Giffen sustains his statement ought to dispose of the question, and I do not propose to say another word in support of the proposition that it is an admitted axiom that Ireland contributes double her just proportion to Imperial resources.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have not admitted that it is an admitted axiom. It remains a disputed proposition.

MR. DILLON: I do not mean to say the right hon. Gentleman admitted it, but I have quoted high authority for the view we have endeavoured to maintain by argument. Having laid down that proposition I inquire, how has this unequal distribution come about? The machinery by which this has been achieved in an ingenious manner is this Spirit Duty. The fact is, that by the policy of constantly increasing the Spirit Duty, the burden of taxation has been shifted from off the shoulders of the British people on to the shoulders of the unfortunate peasants of Ireland, and the present proposal to increase the Spirit Tax still further is only one more step in a long-continued course of injustice towards the Irish people. What is the history of the Spirit Tax? In 1825 the tax was 7s. in England and 2s. 10d. in Ireland; in 1840 it was 7s. 10d. in England and 2s. 8d. in Ireland; in 1855 it was 8s. in England and 6s. 2d. in Ireland; in 1858 it was 8s. in both countries; and in 1860 it was 10s. in both countries. And note this remarkable fact, which accounts for our persistent opposition to the increase of this tax, that, unlike the Income Tax, once it is increased there is never a reduction subsequently made. We complain that when surpluses occur the Government of this country use them for the purpose of relieving the taxes which weigh on the people of England, while all the time they are increasing those taxes which weigh most heavily on the Irish people. In 1864 there was an important inquiry which, owing to the want of activity on the part of the Irish Members of that day, did not produce the results which might have been expected from it. The facts adduced before the inquiry were most extraordinary. When the Act of Union was passed, the Irish Lords protested against the proportion of taxation which it was sought to impose upon Ireland, and asserted that the utmost Ireland could pay would be in the proportion of one to 13. During the first 16 years after the Union the utmost that the Government of the day, by every form of taxation which human ingenuity could invent, could raise from the people of Ireland was 1-13th of the whole. At that time Ireland had a population of exactly one-half that of Great Britain. At present Ireland's population is one-sixth, while the wealth of Great Britain is threefold higher per head than that of Ireland. From these figures it is clear that Ireland is now paying more than she was at the time of the great wars at the beginning of this century. In 1831 Ireland contributed 1-13th; in 1836, 1-12th; in 1847, the year of the Irish famine, 1-11th; in 1857, 1-10th; and in 1862, 1-9th. When people speak of the poverty of Ireland they should remember that, not only the Irish land system, but this terrible and insupportable taxation is one of the most fertile causes of distress. Taking a period of 50 years, from 1816, the remissions of taxation in Great Britain amounted to £72,000,000, while the new taxes imposed amounted to £35,000,000, leaving a balance of remissions of £37,000,000. In Ireland during the same period the remissions of taxation were £5,488,000, the taxes imposed £4,981,000, leaving a balance of remissions of £507,000, or only £500,000 as compared with £37,000,000 in the case of Great Britain. In other words, there is a balance of remissions in the case of Great Britain of 98-63 per cent., and of 1-37 per cent. in the case of Ireland. Throughout the whole period since the cessation of the great wars the history of the finances of this country displays an almost unbroken course of remission of taxes which weigh heavily on the people of Great Britain, and of increases of taxes which weigh most heavily on the people of Ireland. The consequence is, that Ireland now pays five times as much towards the Imperial Exchequer in proportion to her resources as she did in the time of the great wars. The increases have been made principally upon spirits and tobacco. This year the first duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have been to make some remission of the duty on one or other of these articles, and thereby to redress a monstrous grievance suffered by the people of Ireland. I conclude my observations on this portion of the question by calling the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the observations he made in 1888. He said—

"I am always anxious, apart from political differences, which separate us from many of the Irish Members, to do full justice to Ireland from the financial point of view."

What has the right hon. Gentleman done since then to do full justice to Ireland from the financial point of view? After that statement we find him repeating the very acts which created that financial injustice and imposing a new tax in spite of the Irish Members. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when pressed on this point, takes refuge in the argument that we get back taxes to Ireland in extra grants on the Votes in Supply, on light railways, and draining bogs. The Irish Members repudiate that argument. We want fair-play and justice. We do not want to have money wrung out of the poverty of the people by unjust taxation and then cast back to us as an act of charity. We are not allowed to control the education of our children. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say that the money is spent on criminal prosecutions, on Judges, Resident Magistrates, and the Army in Ireland.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I should never use that argument. I believe if we were to withdraw 20,000 men from Ireland it would be regarded as a fresh grievance. There is always a remonstrance against withdrawal.

MR. DILLON: I know there is a remonstrance, but a remonstrance was never heard from me. The remonstrance is made by certain traders who make a little money by their presence. If you withdraw your whole garrison, they may go, with my blessing. I say the money spent on the military never brought any good to the country. But putting that question aside, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has used the argument that we get more than our share in the Votes of Supply. Those Votes are offered as bribes to keep our people quiet. We do not want these Votes. If you adjust the taxation between England and Ireland we want to pay our just share towards the taxation of the country. If this is done it will not be necessary to give Ireland any more than her just supply in the future. What the Irish people want is to have the control of their finances beyond what you need for the Imperial Exchequer, and we will make it go further than you can.

(11.55.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think that if any justification were needed for the pertinacity with which last night, or rather, at an early hour this morning, we insisted on the discussion of this clause, that justification would be found in the very important, and, I may say, satisfactory announcement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made, speaking, I presume, on behalf of the Government, practically undertaking that this Select Committee is to be appointed, if not this Session, at latest at the beginning of next Session, to consider the vital question of the real nature of the burdens borne by the three Kingdoms. We are amply justified, and I trust that after this nothing will be said about obstruction. Everybody who listened to the extremely able and full speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast must feel how much both Great Britain and Ireland would have lost if that speech had not been made, and this important undertaking had not been got from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member for West Belfast said that on consideration the figure which was fixed in the proposals of 1886 as Ireland's contribution to Imperial charges he believed to be too high. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian at the time thought that the figure which he proposed was one which would need further consideration in Committee. The Irish Members have made out a prima facie case for their proposition that Ireland has been unjustly and injuriously treated, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer admits that they have made out a prima facie case.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I did not say so.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman did not say that; but if he did not think something of the kind, is it to be supposed that he would consent to the appointment of a Select Committee? No further justification is needed for the prolongation of the discussion and the opposition to the tax.

*(12.5.) MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the way in which he has received the Government's concession. He has mainly made use of it for the purposes of political capital in pointing to it as a justification of the transactions of last night. But I could have made my announcement on behalf of the Government equally well at half-past 12 last night, and there have been ample opportunities before for the interesting speeches which have been delivered during the day, and which might have obviated a good deal of unnecessary argument if delivered before. The right hon. Gentleman assumes that a prima facie case has been made out; but surely there are many cases where it is simply desirable to clear up a question, and where those who assent to an inquiry are by no means prepared to assent to the allegations made. I entirely deny that a prima facie case has been made out, but I have long thought it desirable that the sense of injustice which is expressed by Irish Members should be removed.

(12.10.) MR. J. MORLEY: I did not intend to import any unfair spirit into my remarks. My real reason for congratulating the Government on the announcement which has been made is because the first step towards carrying out a Home Rule policy is to obtain a financial adjustment between Great Britain and Ireland which will be accepted by both countries; and such an adjustment can only be arrived at by means of a Select Committee of the House, in which the country will have confidence.

(12.11.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: It is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman did not make his declaration at 12 o'clock last night; it might have saved a long Debate.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I might have done so, but you would not allow us to come to the clause.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: As a matter of fact, we did enter on the consideration of the clause, and if the right hon. Gentleman had made his announcement last night we might have been saved 24 hours' wrangle. But on the principle of better late than never, and of not looking a gift horse in the mouth, I, as a Scotch Member, thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his concession, and I am sure that the inquiry will show that Scotland pays enormously more than her share to the taxation of the United Kingdom.

(12.12.) COLONEL NOLAN: I do not want to reproach the Chancellor of the Exchequer with want of reason last night now that we find him reasonable to-night, but it appears to me that it does not make much difference so long as we have this extra tax put on. Committee or no Committee, we are to have the tax all the same. But I deny the Chancellor of the Exchequer's argument that Ireland gets a return benefit in the shape of Imperial expenditure. For instance, as regards the Navy, compare the expenditure that occurs in connection with the Navy; no share of this comes to Ireland. There are no large public buildings in Ireland on which we get a share of expenditure, unless you can include police barracks in the description; we have no such institutions as the British Museum, South Kensington Museum, and such-like places. In education we get a slightly better share proportionately than England, but it is only slightly better, and the reason is simple. It was part of the English education policy in giving education of a denominational character to stick the schools close together, not putting a proper distance between them, and hence it was that the extension of education became so expensive. I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo, and think we do get some advantage from the expenditure upon the Army in Ireland. I do not mean to say the expenditure is so advantageous as it would be if spent on education; still, we get a certain percentage of the expenditure, though the greater portion of the expenditure is made in England. In Civil expenditure, too, Ireland enjoys but a very limited share, except in expenditure on the judicial system, and this, of course, is the result of the old system of bribery, by means of which the people were governed.

(12.23.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 176; Noes 126.—(Div. List, No. 102.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: We propose to postpone Clause 7; and perhaps hon. Members opposite will allow us to take the remaining clauses, to which I think there is very little objection.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what are the changes he proposes to make in Clause 26?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): There is an Amendment by which it is proposed to add certain words at the end of that clause; but we should prefer to deal with it on the Report stage, and the Amendment is not yet down on the Paper.

Motion made, and Question, "That Clause 7 be postponed," put, and agreed to.

Clause 24.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I beg to move, in page 9, to leave out postponed Clause 24, and insert the following Clause:—

"Where any person shall die after the passing of this Act without having made a return of all his profits and gains chargeable to Income Tax with a view to an assessment thereon in due course, an assessment in respect of the profits and gains which arose or accrued to him before his death may be made at any time within the year of assessment, or within four months after the expiration thereof, upon his executors and administrators, and the amount thereof shall be a debt due from and payable out of his estate."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY : I shall be glad to facilitate the Chancellor of the Exchequer in carrying anything reasonable, but I deprecate the manner in which this clause is brought before the House. I do not think that this clause has been sufficiently considered ; and as it is not a clause on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer can claim any particular urgency, I trust he will allow it to be postponed until that consideration has been given to it. The right hon. Gentleman is only anxious to bring additional gain to his Department, and in the endeavour to promote this object he has not given due consideration to the position of executors and administrators, whose office, at the best, is a very thankless one. I would suggest that this question ought to be hung up until next year. Unless the right hon. Gentleman agrees to postpone this clause, we must oppose it as a whole. I have no desire that the estates of deceased persons should escape their fair share of this duty ; but in this case you practically put a pistol to the head of the executor and call upon him to stand and deliver. The result is, that you may issue an attachment of whatever the form is in England against the executor and send him to gaol. I ask, why do not you make some provision to meet this case ? Why should an executor or administrator be sent to gaol ? I understand the view of the Government to be that the executor is liable to be sent to gaol. The Chancellor of the Exchequer shakes his head, but I would call his attention to the words of the clause he proposes.

*MR. GOSCHEN : The clause says the amount thereof shall be a "debt due from and payable out of his estate." There are no words in the clause bearing the meaning attached to it by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I differ from the right hon. Gentleman and assert without hesitation that, according to the clause, the debt is seized on the executor. It says that where any person shall die after the passing of the Act, without having made a return of his profits chargeable to Income Tax, an assessment may be made of those profits at any time within the year of assessment, or four months afterwards, upon his executors or administrators, and the amount thereof shall be a debt due from and payable out of his estate.

*MR. GOSCHEN : Although the hon. and learned Gentleman is acquainted with the law, I have some knowledge of the facts, and I assure him that he is mistaken in his construction of this clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I cannot concur in the view of the right hon. Gentleman ; but at any rate, if that be his view, he ought to insert something that would make the matter clear.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir, R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) : I have no manner of doubt that as the clause now stands the debt can only be recoverable out of the estate ; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman can show that I am wrong, we should not object to insert explanatory words, but I cannot imagine any words that would make the law clearer than it is now.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I am no more satisfied after what the hon. and learned Gentleman has stated than I was before, and I ask the Government what point will they gain by all this hurry ? Is the debt to be treated as a Crown debt ? How is the man who supplies the coffin to bury the deceased person to be situated ?

*SIR R. WEBSTER : The tax due on the estate would be a first charge.

MR. T. M. HEALY : It is an extraordinary notion that a man's Income Tax is so sacred an obligation that it is to be treated as a first charge on his estate. I should imagine that the debts which ought first to be satisfied out of an estate are those which he has contracted with John Smith, John Brown, and so forth.

*MR. GOSCHEN : A man's assessment to this tax now ranks before his other debts, and I see no reason why that principle should be altered in the case of a deceased person's estate.

MR. STOREY : There is an old saying "that death quits all scores," and I see no reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer should pursue debts of this kind into the grave. I, for one, enter my strong protest against this proposal, which will throw great hardship on the smaller class of estates. Take the case of a person receiving £500 a year. He dies and leaves a widow. Upon the death of the person his will is proved. It may be that the £500 is derived from £5,000 or £6,000 of property, and upon that the widow or executor has to pay 3 per cent. into the coffers of the State. That is a very serious charge upon the widow. I am not a lawyer, but I am putting very serious cases of hardship that I have known in my own experience amongst poor people.

THE CHAIRMAN: I can scarcely see how the hon. Member is approaching the subject of the clause.

MR. STOREY: I think I can approach it. This charge is a new charge. ["No!"] If it has not been charged before, it is a new charge. The charges are serious enough already, and it is unnecessary that we should pursue the dead man in this way. Therefore, if I can only get another Member to tell with me I shall divide against this clause.

*MR. GOSCHEN: This clause is to remedy an omission to make a return. If a millionaire neglected to make a return the hon. Member would not say that his estate should not be called upon to pay. So long as the law with reference to the Income Tax remains what it is, there should be means of meeting and remedying a default.

*MR. CHILDERS: I think that this is a proper proposal. The clause is intended to meet the case of a deceased person who has failed to perform his duty, whether poor or rich, and if I am not mistaken it is proposed in consequence of evasion of duty by one or more people of the latter class.

*MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The assessment is made on the estate of the dead man, and if it is not made on the executors, where is the right of appeal? Who has any locus standi to appeal?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Distinctly the assessment would be made on the executor, and he would have the right of appeal, but it is not a debt due by the executor.

MR. CHANCE: Does the Crown solemnly say to the executor "you are bound to pay us," and then, "it is no debt of yours?" I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will add these words to the clause: "and not from the executors or administrators personally?"

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have not the slightest objection to add the words, only in my judgment they are absolutely unnecessary. If the hon. Member thinks they are necessary I have no objection to considering them.

MR. CHANCE: I do not in the slightest degree undervalue the opinion of the Attorney General either on this or any other subject. Still, he is not infallible, and many Law Officers have given opinions at that Table which have not been sustained by the Judges.

*(1.0.) MR. GOSCHEN: Many errors are occasioned by entering into arrangements on these points of detail across the Table. I will undertake, before the Report, to consult my Colleagues and those best informed with regard to this tax to see what can be done.

(1.1.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): What the right hon. Gentleman has said is fair enough so far as it goes. The Government decided to reject the clause originally in the Bill, and now they give us another one somewhat similar in effect. Why was this?

*(1.1.) MR. GOSCHEN: The alterations we have made have been slight, and have only been made for the purpose of remedying defects which were pointed out to us in the clause.

(1.2.) MR. M. HEALY: There is a distinction between the clause on the Paper and the clause in the Bill. The clause in the Bill provides for a person dying without an assessment, but the clause on the Paper deals with a person dying who has not made a return.

*(1.2.) MR. GOSCHEN: This provision is proposed to remedy an omission. A mistake might be held to have arisen not by the deceased's own default, but the default of someone else, if these words "without having been duly assessed" had remained. The clause now makes it clear that it must have been his own default.

(1.3.) MR. M. HEALY: A form is sent out for a person to fill up and return, and in cases where it is not filled up the Department fills it up itself. That is the rule—not to enforce the penalty, but to estimate the gains of the person who should have made the return, and return him accordingly. I do not know what the new clause means which provides that if a person dies without making a return an assessment can be made on him.

*(1.5.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Supposing a person dies having earned profits to the amount of £2,000, as the law stands he has earned taxable profits; but if he has not made a return, his income cannot be taxed. The clause provides that the Commissioners may in such a case assess the profits within the year of taxation or four months thereafter.

(1.6.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): A man when he dies may have earned only a third of his annual income. Does the clause mean that his executors are to be called upon to pay Income Tax in respect of the whole year?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No, no.

(1.6.) MR. FLYNN: A poor man has no protection under this clause against an unfair assessment being made on him. A man earning a small income may have had serious illness and may have been really subjected to loss before his death. His executors may not be able to say whether or not he has made profit, and the result may be that the State may exact an amount to which it is not entitled. I should be sorry to see these classes handed over to the tender mercies of lawyers either in Ireland or England, and I think it a shabby and contemptible thing for the Public Exchequer to come to the widow and orphan—or their executors who are doing a work of Christian charity—and charge in Income Tax an amount more than the estate is worth. I think this clause should be postponed. I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Attorney General to put their heads together and see if they cannot draft a clause to meet this case.

*(1.12.) MR. GOSCHEN: Our point is that a person who has not made a return should not be put in a worse position than one who has.

(1.12.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The object of the clause is to enable the Government to recover from executors a tax which, if the deceased had lived, would have been recovered from him, but which cannot be recovered now, because no assessment is made out for the year. But as the clause is worded, it will have this effect: if a man dies without having made a return before the assessment is made the estate is not liable to pay; but if no return at all has been made, then it is liable. What would be the use of this clause in a case where a man dies having made a return before the assessment is made?

(1.14.) MR. JACKSON: If a man during his lifetime makes a return, the assessment follows as a natural course. The executors are proceeded against and the amount is recovered. All that this clause seeks is to do in the case of the man who has not made a return exactly what is done in the case of the man who has made a return.

(1.15.) MR. CHANCE: Would the Solicitor General say whether he shares that opinion? The man who makes a return and dies before assessment will still escape paying the tax. I want to ask the Solicitor General if that is not the case? I say a debt accrues the moment the assessment is made. If a man dies before the assessment is made I challenge anyone to point out a section under which a penny could be charged to the executors.

*(1.17.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Without doubt no assessment could be made, and all this clause does is to enable a charge to be made in the case the hon. Member has alluded to, and which could not be made otherwise.

*(1.18.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): If the claim is not made until after four months from the end of the financial year, the right of the Crown to recover lapses I think.

(1.19.) MR. FLYNN: I must urge on the attention of the Government the case of the poor man who dies suddenly without having made a return, and who may not have made a profit for some time before his death.

*(1.22.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to allow a Division to be taken on this clause. I believe this proposal of the Government is a simple matter of justice to the living as well as to the dead.

(1.23.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not think this is contentious matter upon which we should divide. All that we desire is that some reasonable answer should be given to our arguments. I protest against the widow of a professional man being called upon to pay Income Tax in respect of her deceased husband at the old rate. I submit that if this Amendment is inserted, it would go a long way towards soothing the misery of many such widow.

*(1.25.) MR. GOSCHEN: I will promise the hon. Member to consider all these Amendments before Report; but it is essential to have them thoroughly sifted by those who are familiar with such questions.

(1.26.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I feel the strength of the right hon. Gentleman's appeal, and, therefore, on the assurance that the defects we have pointed out will be remedied, if possible, on Report, I will not press my opposition.

Question put, and agreed to.

New Clause read a second time—

"(1.) The substance mixed with spirits for the purpose of methylation may be any combination of substances approved for the purpose by the Commissioners; and the term 'methylated spirits' in 'The Spirits Act, 1880,' shall, in lieu of the meaning thereby assigned to it, mean spirits mixed with any substance or combination of substances approved for the purpose of methylation by the Commissioners.

"(2.) An authorised methylator may supply methylated spirits in vessels containing not less than a reputed quart, provided that the quantity supplied by the methylator to any one person at a time is not less than five gallons.

"(3.) In any mixture of methylated spirits with gum resin the quantity of gum resin shall not be less than three ounces in every gallon of the mixture."—(MR. JACKSON.)

(1.28.) MR. CHANCE: Is it intended to prevent the use of certain substances in the manufacture of methylated spirits?

MR. JACKSON: That is so.

(1.29.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Why should not methylated spirit be supplied in smaller quantities than one quart?

MR. JACKSON: The matter will be considered between this and Report.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): I beg to move the new clause which stands in my name. Clause 25 proposes to relieve the smaller householders of some Inhabited House Duty, but there is a grievance which presses hardly upon small shopkeepers. It is most unfair that the part of a house used for trading purposes should be chargeable with the Inhabited House Duties, and I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to see his way to make some concession in the matter.

New Clause—

"Where a part of any house, being one property, is occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business, or of any profession or calling, by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit, whether the part so occupied communicates directly or not with the rest of the house, such part of the house shall not be taken into account in assessing the amount on which the house shall be chargeable with the inhabited house duties."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Clause be read a second time."

—(MR. SHIRESS WILL.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think the clause goes very much further than the hon. Gentleman intends. It is supposed to apply to small shopkeepers, but I think it will apply to large establishments; indeed, I think it would do away with the house tax on shops.

MR. ESSLEMONT: We consider it very hard that a man who lives over a shop should have his shop assessed to House Duty. We can hardly expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the clause on the spur of the moment, but the right hon. Gentleman will admit that it contains matter for consideration.

MR. CHANCE: May I suggest to the hon. and learned Member for Montrose that he might get rid of a great deal of objection if he limited the clause to premises of an annual value, say, not exceeding £40.

MR. SHIRESS WILL: I would prefer to say £60 and under.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am really unable to go any further than I have done this year.

MR. SHIRESS WILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope that next year he will give consideration to the point?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot say what next year's Budget will bring forth.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. M. HEALY: I beg to move the new clause standing in my name.

I do not propose at this hour to enter at length into the subject of the Income Tax. Suffice it to say that the tax was imposed originally as a temporary measure to meet a special strain on the finances of the Empire occasioned through war. Frequent attempts have been made to get rid of the tax altogether. Two years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer received a deputation of solicitors in England and Ireland, who laid their grievance before him. The right hon. Gentleman received the deputation in a very sympathetic spirit. My clause does not propose to abolish the tax, which I think would be the fairest and best course to pursue, but simply to relieve solicitors from a very unfair imposition. No other profession in the country is subjected to any similar tax. Solicitors are placed under very heavy financial burdens before they can practise. No young man can become a member of the profession for less than £1,000 when the cost of his education is taken into consideration. Of that £1,000 a considerable sum goes to the State in the shape of Stamp Duty. A barrister is put to great expense, but not to the same as a solicitor. The same is the case with a doctor. It certainly lies with the right hon. Gentleman, or other defenders of the tax, to show some good ground why solicitors should be placed in their present invidious position. My proposition is simply that when a solicitor has once paid a tax to the State in the shape of Licence Duty, he should not be assessed to the Income Tax under Schedule D.

New Clause—

"Any person admitted or enrolled in England or Ireland as an attorney, solicitor, proctor, or notary public, and any person admitted or enrolled in Scotland as a writer to the signet, solicitor, agent, attorney, procurator, or notary public, and any other legally qualified person who carries on business in England or Ireland as a conveyancer, special pleader, or draftman in equity, and who is obliged by law to take out a yearly certificate, shall be entitled to deduct from any Income Tax payable by him under Schedule D on his annual profits and gains the amount of the duty paid by such person on the annual certificate required to be taken by him."

Mr. M. Healy

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. M. Healy.)

*MR. GOSCHEN: Whatever view I may hold as to the abolition of the tax, I certainly could not assent to anything in the shape of the clause moved by the hon. Member, because, by so doing, I should assent to a new system in our method of taxation.

MR. M. HEALY: I am not prepared to withdraw the clause, but on Report I will move to abolish the tax altogether.

*MR. BRUNNER: If this clause were read a second time, I should ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to extend it to other people who pay Licence Duty, for I am of opinion that it is a bad system which charges a man for permission to make an honest living.

Question put, and negatived.

Committee report Progress.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think there is a general desire that the Committee should be concluded to-morrow, and, therefore, I beg to give notice that I will put down a Motion—[HON. MEMBERS: "You had better not."] If hon. Members do not desire I should, I will not do so. I only wish to be understood. I believe I am expressing their wishes when I refer to the desire that the Committee should terminate to-morrow night before half-past 5.

MR. SEXTON: It is possible that if you put down a Motion you will occupy with it a considerable part of the time of the House, which would otherwise be occupied with the discussion of the Bill itself.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

It being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at five minutes before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL BILL [LORDS.]

Ordered, That the examiners of Petitions for Private Bills do examine the Lichfield Cathedral Bill [Lords], with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.—(The Attorney General.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE
BILL.—(No. 231.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Postponed Clause 7.

(12.2.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I rise to move the Amendment which stands in my name, namely, to insert after the word "Ireland"—

"In manner following, viz: As regards the duties mentioned in sub-section (a), as nearly as possible in the proportion in which those duties are paid, viz: England, 66·5 per cent; Scotland, 19·4 per cent.; Ireland 14·1 per cent.; and as regards the duties mentioned in sub-section (b)."

By the previous section the Committee has resolved to impose upon Scotland and Ireland what I consider to be, under the circumstances of the case, unjust taxation, and the question now arises whether the Government will consent fairly to distribute that taxation? For my part, I have always protested against the mode in which the revenue allotted for local purposes has been distributed. If the localities themselves are not allowed to collect, manage, and distribute this revenue, the question which necessarily arises is how it can be most fairly distributed. In the present state of affairs the question of distribution has become a most important matter. It was pointed out by one of the newspapers on Saturday that the principle of distribution now decided upon will determine the distribution of more than £6,500,000.

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

More than £4,000,000 will be handed over for distribution if this Bill passes, and the sum intended to be distributed for education will bring the total up to £6,500,000. The question is, how the distribution can be made as fair towards Scotland and Ireland as towards England. As a matter of principle, if it is the Inland Revenue which is to be distributed it ought to be distributed in accordance with the revenue contributed by each separate portion of the Kingdom rather than in an inverse ratio. In order to take something out of the sting of the injustice which is proposed to be perpetrated, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised that a full inquiry shall be made, so as to do justice both to Scotland and Ireland in the future. Whatever may be the immediate effect of the Government proposals, it is gratifying to find that there is to be some prospect of justice being done in the future. We certainly think that hitherto much injustice has been done. In reference to the Spirit Duties, I do not altogether object to the provisional arrangement proposed to be made. And here I wish to correct a statement which I made the other day. I said that it was very hard, indeed, that Englishmen should drink three times as much alcohol in the shape of beer as Scotchmen, and only pay one-half as much in the shape of duty. I believe that the Englishman does, as a matter of fact, pay more than half as much; but instead of paying it into the Exchequer, it goes to the monopolist brewer. The real reason why beer is not taxed as it ought to be, is that the brewers, who have a great monopolist interest, hold a rod over the heads of the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admits that, in regard to taxation upon alcohol in all forms, the distribution now proposed is not a fair one, and is only to be justified on the ground that, whereas Scotland and Ireland pay a much larger share of the taxation on alcohol, England pays a larger share of the Probate Duties. The statistics on this subject presented by the Chancellor of the Exchequer I am quite prepared to accept provisionally, but with the important exception that in the matter of the Probate Duties the Metropolis, the monetary centre of the three Kingdoms, is included in England, which, especially as regards Scotland, is a gross injustice. My complaint is that the Returns we have are of a fragmentary character, but are sufficient to show the injustice done to Scotland. If the right hon. Gentleman would place one of his clerks at my disposal I believe that I could get him to prepare a proper Return in half-an-hour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In half-an-hour?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes; in half-an-hour. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman has not produced Returns because he dare not; because such Returns would absolutely upset all the calculations he has made, and show plainly the injustice which is being done to Scotland. Some of the statistics which are contained in the Reports of the Board of Inland Revenue conclusively prove that gross injustice has been done to Scotland in this matter. As I say, I am prepared to accept the figures contained in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Return, No. 153, as far as the taxation of alcohol and the Customs Duties are concerned. They show that, according to population, England pays 80·9 per cent.; Scotland, 10·7 per cent.; and Ireland, 8·4 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman says that in giving us 11 per cent. he is giving us practically better terms than we are entitled to. I accept so much. The great injustice of which I complain has reference to the stamps, which include the Probate Duties and the Income Tax. I am unable to give the figures of the Probate Duties because the Chancellor of the Exchequer has persistently refused to give them, but I look upon them as being practically another form of a tax upon property and income—the same as the Income Tax, and especially Schedule D. The Returns of the Board of Inland Revenue show that the distribution proposed by the right hon. Gentleman is most unfair towards Scotland.

MR. GOSCHEN: Probate Duty is paid in Scotland as well as in England.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: My impression is that the Probate Duty paid by Scotch—men in England goes to swell English Returns. Probably the Committee will not be surprised to hear that a very large proportion of Schedule D from profits from professions and companies is paid in the Metropolis, which is the Metropolis of the three Kingdoms, and not of England only. The only full figures which we have in regard to the Income and Property Tax are contained in the Report submitted to Parliament, decennially. From the last Report, in 1884-5, I find that Scotland, according to her population, paid 9½ per cent. of the Income Tax, which is rather less than her full share, if London is to be included in England. But if you take out London, which is the common Metropolis of the three Kingdoms, there is a very different result. I see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer laughs, but does he doubt that an enormous amount of Income Tax is paid in London by Scotchmen. Take my own case; I am a retired officer of the East India Company's Service, my pension is paid here, and, when I die, the Probate Duty will be paid here.
Sir G. Campbell

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member resides in London.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: That is so for a part of the year, but my home was in Scotland, until I was sent here by a Scotch constituency, and, although I reside in London, I consider myself a Scotsman all the same. I altogether deny that I have shaken off that character. I assert that a large proportion of the property held in London is really Scotch property, and as the Reports of the Board of Inland Revenue do not distinguish the Metropolis from other parts of the Kingdom, I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer might very well give us a special Return. Referring to the details of the Property and Income Tax which are given in the Return, I find, in regard to Schedules A and B, that Scotland pays twice its fair share. So far as Schedule C is concerned, it relates to dividends on British, Foreign, Colonial, and other Stocks, and all payments under it are made in London, so that Scotland does not get credit for a single farthing. Now, I would ask the Committee whether, knowing what habits of thrift the Scotch people possess, they really believe that no portion of these Stocks is held by Scotchmen. I maintain that it is unjust to exclude Scotland from consideration whenever Schedule C is dealt with. Schedule E deals with salaries, of which an enormous proportion is paid in the Metropolis and a very small proportion in Scotland.

MR. GOSCHEN: The salaries paid in the Public Offices are omitted.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Where are they included if they do not appear in Schedule E?

MR. GOSCHEN: They are omitted from the calculation. England pays 85 per cent. and Scotland only 3 per cent.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Then I understand that the calculations of the right hon. Gentleman, so far as they are founded on Schedule E, omit the Public Offices.

MR. GOSCHEN: That is so.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: But with regard to public companies, my contention is that a large portion of the shares are owned by Scotchmen, and it is unfair that all the payments should be credited to England alone. I am quite willing, however, to rest my case upon Schedule D, which is a tax upon personal property of all kinds. From the last Report of the Board of Inland Revenue for a decennial period, ending in 1889, I find that the total amount of property assessed to Income Tax under that schedule in 1883-4 was £291,000,000, and of that Scotland paid a fair share. The Metropolis paid upon £109,000,000, leaving £182,000,000 for the rest of the three Kingdoms, out of which Scotland paid £31,000,000, or 10·7 per cent. Deducting the Metropolis it will be found that Scotland paid a little more than 17 per cent. under Schedule D.

MR. GOSCHEN: Surely the hon. Gentleman does not propose to take out the whole of the Metropolis, and not credit it with any payment at all?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I take out the whole of the Metropolis in order to distinguish what is paid by England and Scotland, exclusive of London. What I complain of is that Scotland in these calculations is unfairly dealt with, and that what is paid by Scotchmen in the Metropolis is not credited to Scotland, but goes to swell the payments of England. The Return of the amount of property assessed to the Income Tax last year shows a reduction of £247,000,000. Of that sum £109,000,000 applied to the Metropolis, and Scotland went down to £23,000,000, still reaching 17 per cent. I maintain that I am fairly entitled to ask that, in making these calculations, the Metropolis of the Empire should be treated separately, and not as part of England. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that there is some injustice to Scotland in the matter, but he gave some figures to show how slight the injustice was. We have no means of testing the right hon. Gentleman's figures, or of seeing how he got them, but the figures themselves prove too much, and amount to a reductio ad absurdum. If we are to believe his figures, while Scotland pays 17 per cent. of the Income and Property Tax, under Schedule D, omitting the Metropolis, it scarcely pays 1 per cent. under Schedule D, upon dividends in connection with British, Foreign, Colonial, and Indian Stocks. Out of £500,000,000 of Stock transferred it is said that only £6,000,000 were transferred in Scotch names.

MR. GOSCHEN: So far as Consols are concerned they are not held largely by Scotchmen.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: These Returns apply not only to Consols but to Colonial and Indian Stocks. I understand that the Returns refer to the whole.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; only to Consols.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: So far as Foreign, Indian, and Colonial Stocks are concerned, I believe that a considerable portion is held by Scotchmen, and it is, therefore, unfair to take Consols alone. I am quite satisfied that Scotland holds much more than the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. of the Foreign, Colonial, and Indian Stock, which the right hon. Gentleman says she holds, and pays Income Tax upon.

MR. GOSCHEN: I never stated any figures in regard to Foreign, Indian, and Colonial Stock. The hon. Member will remember that the Return includes the dividends paid upon the English Railways, which are credited to England, while all the dividends upon the Scotch Railways are credited to Scotland.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What I am dealing with now is Schedule C, and the right hon. Gentleman will admit that upon that Schedule not one farthing is paid in Scotland, but in the Metropolis, which gets credit for the whole of it. Some of the figures show a curious state of things. Up to a recent period I find that Scotland paid quite her fair share of the Probate and Succession Duties. In 1882, excluding the Metropolis, Scotland paid on £18,820,000 out of £180,000,000, or not far short of 11 per cent. In 1887, out of £181,000,000 she paid upon £19,633,000, again approaching 11 per cent. Up to the year 1887 Scotland paid even more than her full proportion of the Probate and Succession Duties; but a startling change took place from 1887 onwards. Probate and Succession Duties were paid in England, in 1884, upon £118,000,000; in 1885, upon £116,000,000; in 1886, upon £119,000,000; and in 1887, upon £117,000,000. In 1888, it suddenly jumped up to £136,000,000, while the amount for Scotland and Ireland fell. I think that there must have been some change in the mode of keeping the accounts to explain this circumstance, and I should be glad to learn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what he attributes this sudden jump in the Probate Duties in England, and the sudden fall in Scotland. There is certainly some necessity for explanation, but, whatever the explanation may be, I think I have made it clear that there will be no fair means of judging between the three Kingdoms until the Metropolis is distinguished from the rest. The results of the investigation I have been able to make is to show that of all other Revenue Scotland pays quite her full share, while in regard to alcohol she pays very much more. Even if beer is included, Scotland pays at least 15 per cent., although she is only to have 11 per cent. allocated to her. I maintain that the people of Scotland are over-taxed, and upon that ground it is not fair that the contribution towards local taxation should be unjustly distributed. And what is the great concession which the Chancellor of the Exchequer claims to have made? According to his own figures, Scotland is entitled to 10·7 per cent., and all that he gives her is 11 per cent., which is to cover all the injustice and inequalities of the Income and Property Tax, and the Probate and Succession Duties. I say that his proposal is totally inadequate, and on behalf of Scotland I repudiate it. I quite admit that if local subventions were given to London in the same proportion as to other parts of the Kingdom with reference to the Revenue paid London would, in my opinion, get a very unfair amount. But it must be remembered that much of the money paid in London really comes from other parts of the Kingdom, and we know that the allocation is not made to London in accordance with the revenue paid in the Metropolis.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, after the word "Ireland," to insert the words "as regards the Duties mentioned in sub-section (a.), as nearly as possible in the proportion in which those Duties are paid, such apportionment to be made by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and as regards the Duties mentioned in sub-section (b.)."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(15.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I have an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect as that of my hon. Friend, but I quite admit that the wording of his proposal is superior to that of mine. This discussion deals with an old tax and a new tax. In the case of the apportionment of the old tax, we have the precedent of the Probate Duties to follow. In the case of the new tax we have to make a precedent for ourselves, and we should strive to make that precedent a just one. The discussions we have had on this question have had the effect of, at all events, advancing matters to a certain extent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been very chary of making admissions, and when he is taxed with admitting anything, I notice he invariably says he does not admit it. But, yesterday, he did directly admit two facts. One was that the increase in the Probate Duty was a matter that might be put out of the question altogether. I quoted from his own speech, made when allocating the Probate Duty, to show he had anticipated an increase, and I argued that if any benefit had accrued through an increase, or through a change in the distribution of the Probate Duty, we were entitled to adhere to the settlement arrived at two or three years ago. The right hon. Gentleman then admitted that the increase ought not to be regarded as affecting the question. The second admission was one that was made by the right hon. Gentleman in 1889, namely, that the extra tax of 3d. then imposed on beer was not a new tax but an old tax, reimposed in rectification of a too great reduction made in consequence of certain statements of the brewers, which afterwards turned out to be misrepresentations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, last year, said not one word about this being a temporary tax. Another admission made by the right hon. Gentleman was that any alteration of taxation of alcohol in one form or another unsettles the international basis of taxation. Now, what was the state of things before the Malt Tax was changed, and what is the state of things at the present moment? Before the Beer Tax was substituted for the Malt Tax we had arrived at a sort of modus vivendi in the matter of alcoholic taxation. That certainly was not unfavourable to England, and it was most unfavourable to Scotland and Ireland. In the case of spirits taxation had been laid on in increasing doses, so that between 1850 and 1865, or 1866, the amount of taxation had been doubled, trebled, and, I believe, even quadrupled. But from the date of the last settlement, when the tax on spirits was raised to 10s. a gallon, we have had a state of things to which we have got accustomed. If Scotland and Ireland had paid too much in the shape of taxation on their national beverages, as compared with the tax on English beer, that had been taken into account in the imposition of new taxation, and in the making of grants from the Imperial Exchequer for local purposes. We had arrived at a state of things against which there was no protest. But the slightest attempt to disturb the balance arrived at was warmly resented, and by none more so than by the Party opposite. I quoted the other day the words of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, showing how he denounced and exposed the injustice of the attempt of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to unsettle the arrangement arrived at, and the resentment that was awakened was so strong that on this question the Government was turned out. The first proposal of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer was to increase the tax on spirits 2s. a gallon, but he dropped that and substituted a proposal to increase it by 1s. The proposal now is to increase it by 6d., which at the present moment represents considerably more than half the 1s. additional tax proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh on which the late Government were turned out of office. We have figures now placed before us which show that under this new tax Scotland will have to pay £76,000 more than she is to receive back in the shape of subsidies, and that Ireland will pay £42,000 more than she is to receive. English Members, regarding the matter from an English point of view, are rather apt to under-estimate the significance of these figures. The population of Scotland and Ireland are to the population of England as 12,800,000 is to 28,600,000, and, in order to realise what a similar injustice would be if perpetrated by a Scotch Chancellor of the Exchequer upon England on the lines of the injustice about to be perpetrated on Scotland, you will have to imagine a sum of £262,000 going away from England and being devoted to local purposes in Scotland and Ireland. But if you take the case of Scotland alone, the hardship and injustice are much greater. The population of Scotland is only one-seventh of that of England, so that in order to realise the injustice now proposed to be perpetrated on Scotland you must imagine a Scottish Chancellor of the Exchequer screwing out of the people of England £532,000, and allocating the whole of it to local purposes outside the country. Would not English Members resent that, and does not that illustration show that though the arrangement the Government now propose may involve to Scotland and Ireland the loss of apparently a comparatively small sum, it is a large sum when taken in proportion to the population. And even that does not illustrate the position of matters in the most unfavourable light for Scotland. If you have regard to the position of Scotland and England, not as represented by the relative populations, but as represented by their tax-paying powers as adjusted under the existing systems of incidence of taxation, you would have to multiply the amount paid by Scotland eight times, so that this £76,000 would represent £600,000 a year which England would have to pay to Scotland and Ireland for local purposes. And how is this £76,000 net excess that is to go forth from Scotland to be spent? Why on objects in England, of which we entirely disapprove, or with which we have no national concern. What do we get in return? We get a subsidy £76,000 less than the sum we pay, which we are to be obliged to spend on objects of which we also largely disapprove. Even if we had the whole sum it would be unjust to require us to spend it on objects of which we do not approve; but as it is you, as it were, tax us £3, hand us back £2, and require us to spend a considerable portion of that on objects we entirely disapprove of. If such a proposal as that were made in the case of England would it not be held to justify the most obstinate and pertinacious resistance on the part of English Members against what would be universally recognised as a glaring injustice? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to extinguish licences. Well, if he will let us alone in Scotland we will do it for him. Licences have already been largely reduced there; no compensation has been paid, and that despite the fact that at the recent Licensing Courts renewals were granted on appeal on the special ground that legislation for compensating publicans for the loss of their licences was now being proposed by the Government. If it was proposed to return Scotland all the money extracted from her on account of this additional tax, the condition being that she apply it in a way she does not want to do, it would be a bad bargain. It is, no doubt, right that that portion of the Beer Duty, which it is proposed to earmark and hand over to this common fund, should be allocated on the principle adopted in regard to the Probate Duty. The right hon. Gentleman says he has apportioned the distribution as between England, Scotland, and Ireland, on the proportions of 80, 11, and 9 per cent. But that has not been done in the case of all grants from the Imperial Exchequer. It was not done in the case of Licence Duties, which were formerly a portion of the Imperial funds. They were allocated to the different countries in which they were raised, and the same was to have been the case with the proposed Van and Wheel Tax—not originally, but on representation being made that the Scotch Members did not want the £74,000, which would have been Scotland's share of it. In the case of the Van and Wheel Tax there was to be no placing of the money in a common fund, and no division between the three countries. If that tax had passed, Scotland being excluded, you would have had the money you now propose to raise, in another way, raised in England and applied only to English cases, and that is the principle we ask you to adopt in the present instance. We ask you to follow the precedent you yourselves set in the case of the Van and Wheel Tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not denied the accuracy of our figures. He says, "You must have regard, on the other hand, to the Probate Duty paid by England." He says we receive benefit from that. He contends that the money received by Scotland from the Probate Duty was no element in inducing him—

MR. GOSCHEN: What I referred to was the excess gained by Scotland, that excess existing at the time the Probate Duty was under discussion. I have not rested my argument on the increase of the Probate Duty in England, though an increase has taken place. What I referred to was the normal excess in the Probate Duty, and, on the other hand, an excess in the Spirit Duty.

*DR. CAMERON: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has, at last, made himself clear. What we now have is, that the normal advantage that Scotland gained at the time of the allocation of the Probate Duty should be taken into account in connection with this matter. What was the excess? Instead of getting 10½ per cent. we got 11½ per cent.—the total amount we got being £234,000. The excess we got on the Probate Duty, as originally allocated to us, amounted to £11,500. That was the total excess we got, and now you propose to take that £11,000 into consideration, and rectify that excess by levying on us an excess in the Spirit Duty of no less than £76,000. That, Sir, it must be obvious to everybody, is absurdly unjust.

MR. GOSCHEN: You must set one figure against the other.

*DR. CAMERON: That is just what I object to. The right hon. Gentleman says what we ought to take into consideration is the basis on which the Probate Duty grant was originally settled. I take his scheme as it was worked out, and it shows that at the time we gained £11,500.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman wishes to get an advantage out of both figures; he wishes to apply the figures of one year to the Spirit Duty and the figures of another year to the Probate Duty.

*DR. CAMERON: In consequence of the representations of the Scotch Members, the right hon. Gentleman was willing to drop the Wheel and Van Tax in the case of Scotland while going on with it in the case of England. In that case you had a new tax levied in one country to be applied exclusively to that country. That is what we want in this case.

(1.35.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds): If the hon. Gentleman had been able to show that the proportions which have been adopted by my right hon. Friend in allocating the amount of Imperial revenue to local purposes—namely, 80 per cent., 11 per cent., and 9 per cent. for England, Scotland and Ireland respectively—are wrong, he might possibly have made out some case. In making the allocation of the Probate Duty on the basis of 80, 11, and 9 per cent. my right hon. Friend did so distinctly on the ground that, as far as he was able at that time to ascertain the figures, those figures represented the contributions by the three countries respectively, giving a slight turn in favour of Scotland and a larger turn in favour of Ireland. It is on that basis that my right hon. Friend proceeds in allocating the proportions of the new taxes to be raised under this Bill. I do not think the hon. Gentleman will admit for a moment that his own argument should be applied in the case of the Probate Duty, because it is contributed by England to a larger extent than by Scotland and Ireland respectively. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy gave us some very interesting figures, and seemed to be of opinion that the figures which have been presented do not state the case fairly as regards Scotland. The hon. Member made a very interesting analysis of the Income Tax, pointing out very properly that the collection of Income Tax in London does not accurately represent the amount of Income Tax properly to be credited to England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. In presenting the figures to the House the year 1888-9 was adopted because it was the last completed year for which the figures could be obtained. On a former occasion I stated that if certain corrections, which must be necessarily to some extent matters of estimate, were made, giving credit to Scotland and England where credit ought to be given, I believe the result would so work out that the figures presented to the House practically represented the facts of the case. Since that time it has been possible to make an analysis of the figures of the Income Tax under the different Schedules, and I will give the Committee the result.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: For what year?

MR. JACKSON: For the year 1888-9. Taking the Income Tax as a whole, according to payments, the percentage is 87.05 for England and Wales, 8.56 for Scotland, and 4.39 for Ireland. Putting together the sums received under Schedules C and D, so as to show as far as we can all those which may be held by different divisions of the Kingdom, the total amount represented is £1,635,280. If that sum is apportioned to the three Kingdoms in the proportions in which the three Kingdoms contribute to Schedule D or are assessed to Schedule D—and that seems to be the fairest proportion you can possibly find—it will give to England £1,399,799, to Scotland £174,974, and to Ireland £60,507. If the totals of the Table A, page 6 of the Return, are corrected by those figures, the result will be that the total contribution of taxation by England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively will work out thus—81·44 for England, 10·43 for Scotland, and 8·13 for Ireland. It is rather curious that the proportions of the assessment under Schedule D in the three Kingdoms compare very closely with another test which may be applied, and that is the test of the total railway receipts. These proportions are 85·6 for England, 10·7 for Scotland, and 3·7 for Ireland. The total gross receipts of the railways in England, Scotland, and Ireland are represented by 85·06, 10·97, and 3·97 respectively. The net receipts work out as follows:—84·29 for England, 11·81 for Scotland, and 3·90 for Ireland; and the total annual expenditure of the railways is 85·78 in England, 10·18 in Scotland, and 4·04 in Ireland. Under Table A also for 1888-9 the figures in regard to tea, tobacco, and other Customs duties, not including spirits, and according to several methods of collection, show similar proportionate results; so that, by all the figures we can collect and all the tests we can apply, it is shown that the basis adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of 80, 11, and 9 for the three Kingdoms is favourable to Scotland and a little more favourable to Ireland. In no case, after every inquiry and test, can the figures be made to show that Scotland is entitled really to more than 10·18 per cent. As regards tea, tobacco, and other Customs duties, of course we have no accurate figures. If the figures are taken on the basis I have given to the House the percentages work out as follows:—81·29 for England, 10·57 for Scotland, and 8·14 for Ireland. It has been pointed out that both in Ireland and Scotland the tea used is of a higher quality than in England. The result is that if a poor person in England buys tea, which has cost 6d. per lb. in Mincing Lane without the duty, and a man in Ireland or Scotland buys tea which has cost 1s. per lb. without the duty, the Englishman will pay duty on the two pounds against the one pound bought by the Irishman or Scotchman. The higher priced tea goes further, and I believe that when the question is investigated more clearly it will be seen that Scotland and Ireland do not consume per head of the population the same number of pounds of tea, although they may spend the same amount on tea. The figures are calculated on the duty which is paid, and, taking them in the most favourable way, they will work out as follows:—80·66 for England, 10·93 for Scotland, and 8·41 for Ireland. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy complained that a Return had not been furnished him showing the amount of taxation raised or collected in London, because he thought those figures would have helped him in his argument. The hon. Member seems to start with the belief that it would be fair to separate London from England; but, apart from that, the amount of taxes collected in London could not by any possibility be supposed to represent the amount of taxation which is due or paid by persons living in London, and in those circumstances I do not see how the Return, if it were obtained, could assist him. The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that most of the principal Railway Companies having termini in London pay at their central offices. It could not be said that the Income Tax paid by the Great Northern Railway Company or the North Western Railway Company, although it is paid in London, could be properly credited to London. The banking business of London also represents the banking business of the whole of England.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Of the United Kingdom.

MR. JACKSON: Weil, of the United Kingdom.

An hon. MEMBER: And Ireland.

MR. JACKSON: Of the United Kingdom and Ireland. The hon. Member also appeared to think that even Scotchmen living in London and settled here should have their contributions to taxation credited to their native country. But I think the hon.

Gentleman can hardly be serious in saying that when a man has taken up a position in London, follows his profession, and makes his profit here, Scotland should have the credit of his earnings. Again, I mentioned the Railway Companies. It is no doubt true that a great many Scotchmen have investments in English Railway lines, and the Income Tax thereon is payable in England and credited to the account of England; but it is equally true that a great many Englishmen have made investments in Scottish lines, and the Income Tax upon their dividends is collected in Scotland. We have made our calculations in various ways, we have tested them to the best of our ability, and we believe that whatever way you take to arrive at the result, however you conduct the inquiry by figures, the result goes to show that the basis which we have adopted in the distribution of taxation is a fair and equitable one. Then there are various important items which have not been mentioned during the course of these discussions on this clause, and among them may be mentioned the Post Office surplus. From this source you have an item of £3,000,000 going into the Exchequer. We have made some calculations under this head, and it is not easy to arrive at any figures that may be said to be absolutely proved to be correct; but according to the best calculations we have had made, I do not think it would be an unfair apportionment or an unfair estimate to say that, as regards Ireland, there is no surplus as compared with the expenditure upon the Post Office in Ireland, but so far as I have been able to work out the figures there is a surplus in Scotland. It is hardly safe to say what the surplus is, because it is not possible to give any figures which can be relied on as being strictly correct or capable of proof; but according to the best calculations we are able to make there is a surplus receivable from the Post Office on account of Scotland of £120,000 a year. But this means that at least £2,800,000 or thereabouts must be contributed by England, and ought to be credited to England. I do not push this example too far, but I say that in any examination of receipts and contributions, with a view to testing the basis of percentage which has been adopted for purposes of distribution, it is right that figures such as these should not be lost sight of; they must be borne in mind because they affect the calculations very distinctly in favour of our plan. I hope I have shown that we have taken some pains to try and verify our calculations, for the apportionment between the respective countries, and this I can say, that all the calculations I have been able to make go to show that the basis which has been adopted by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is justified.

*(2.5.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this controversy, but I do wish to recall the recollection of the Committee to a circumstance which seems to throw a strong light upon the matter. Last night the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that the Government proposed to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the financial relations between the three Kingdoms. That, of itself, is an admission on their part—not, as was said at the time, that there is a prima facie case of injustice towards Scotland and Ireland—but, at all events, that there is sufficient difference of opinion to justify inquiry. Here we have had to-day my hon. Friend bringing forward what I think—what, as a Scotsman, I am bound to think—is a very strong case indeed, from our point of view, of unjust burden and distribution as between Scotland and England. Therefore, if my hon. Friends go to a Division, I shall certainly vote in favour of the Amendment. When the hon. Gentleman opposite proceeds to adduce figures leading to an opposite conclusion, I confess I am unable, at the moment, to entirely follow the effect of those figures. But what is the use of continuing a controversy if it is certain that we are going to have a full inquiry into the matter? The Chancellor of the Exchequer assents to that, and, surely, he will also assent to this proposition that it is undesirable in this Bill to stereotype any particular arrangement, seeing that the whole matter is going to be considered. I should have thought it would not be an un-support the Amendment. We have made objections to certain portions of the Bill, objections based upon certain figures furnished us, and now the right hon. Gentleman asks us to compare the figures he has read with the figures in Table A of the Return. The figures differ but slightly, and the difference in no way alters my opinion. The percentages, according to the figures he has given us, are 81·44, 10·43 and 8·13, and in table A the figures stand: England and Wales 81·7, Scotland 10·2, and Ireland 8·1. If our attitude with regard to the Bill was just when based upon the figures found in Table A, our attitude is equally just founded on the figures read out to us to-day. I find myself in the same position I have occupied throughout the discussions, and hence it is that I feel bound to support the Amendment, and I believe my Colleagues intend to support it.

(2.26.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I have admitted that some ground of our complaint has been removed by the promise of full inquiry, and if the application of the proposals in the Bill was to be for a limited period, I do not know that it would be worth while to carry our opposition any further. But the point of duration makes a difference. The Government ask us to pass this Bill into law, and they undertake that, upon the decision of the Committee, possibly at a future time they will get the law altered. I do not want to protract this discussion, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman below the Gangway that the figures of the Secretary to the Treasury do not alter our position, and I think we must support our protest by a Division. The modifications in the figures are very slight, and do not alter the result we arrived at upon the figures previously supplied. The only real modification seemed to me to be in a portion of Schedule C.

MR. JACKSON: The whole of that is altered.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not find any redress on that account. With regard to my objections as to Schedule D, I do not think they have been met to any considerable degree by the Secretary to the Treasury. It is possible that 45 per cent. may be divided in certain proportion. I quite admit that you are not to give the whole to Scotland, but there is no reason why it should be credited to England alone, for London is the Metropolis not merely of England, but of the United Kingdom, and though some portion may be attributable to England, some also is attributable to Scotland. That part not returnable for London should be distributed for the whole kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman said I seemed to think that the payments of a Scotchman resident in London should not be attributed to London, but I say that there is no reason why they should be attributed to England only. Take my own case. I am a resident in London, but should my constituents no longer require my presence here, and I took up my residence in Scotland, that would make no difference in the payment of Income Tax and Probate Duty should it be my misfortune to become liable to that duty. My small savings invested in Railway Stocks have their dividends paid in London, and the deductions are made here. Under the circumstances I feel it my duty to take a Division, though I wish to avoid further discussion.

(2.30.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 94; Noes 155.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

(2.41.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Although the next Amendment in my name is substantially different from the one just defeated, I do not propose now to move it, as a number of Members are anxious to proceed with the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Barrow. I will, therefore, defer my Amendment until the Report stage.

(2.42.) MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness): I do not propose to move my Amendment in the exact form in which it appears on the Paper, but I shall only propose a part of it, and, in doing that, I do not think I need make any speech in its support. The Government have secured the taxation on spirits, and the clause now under consideration proposes that the money raised from the tax shall be appropriated "as Parliament may hereafter direct." I simply move this Amendment in order to give the Government one more opportunity of receding from the untenable position they have taken up in regard to the extinction of licences. They must be aware that their proposals have excited strong feelings in the country, and my Amendment will give them an opportunity of taking the most sensible and practical course open to them—namely, that of not dictating to the County Councils how the money shall be expended, but to leave it to them to decide. Part of this money is to go towards police superannuation. But many municipalities already possess excellent schemes of superannuation, and they will hardly know what to do with this money. I am sure that if the Government take that course it will relieve them of a great deal of trouble in the future. If the Government will accept my Amendment they will at once be relieved of a great deal of difficulty, for they then will be able to withdraw the police superannuation clause and the provisions for the extinction of licences, and to proceed at once to the clause for stopping the issue of new licences.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 15, to leave out the words "Parliament may hereafter direct," and insert the words "each respective County Council in England and Scotland may direct."—(Mr. Cairnes.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(2.45.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am sorry that the hon. Member has only moved the Amendment in a form in which it applies simply to Scotland and to England. I did not think he would thus have deserted us.

MR. CAINE: I only omitted Ireland from the Amendment because I was not certain that my proposals would be acceptable to hon. Members below the Gangway.

MR. T. M. HEALY: You are making your tax dependent upon three Bills, two of which only have been read a second time, and one of which has not even been introduced, although it was promised to Ireland 17 years ago. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to have learned from his Colleague the Chief Secretary that it is easy to break promises made to Ireland. Now, in this Bill you provide that the money to be raised by the additional tax shall be appropriated as Parliament may hereafter direct. But suppose that, owing to the pressure of business, you are not able to pass the Bill appropriating it, what will you do then? Does the right hon. Gentleman think he is going to pass his Land Purchase Bill and the Local Taxation Bill—or, as the latter has happily been called, the Publicans' Endowment Bill—this Session? I asked the First Lord of the Treasury yesterday if he intended to drop the Land Purchase Bill. He said "No"; and he may not mean to drop it, but we know very well that it will be dropped, and that it is as dead as mutton, and has as much chance of passing through this House as has a camel of passing through the eye of a needle. I think the Local Taxation Bill has just about as much chance of passing into law as the Land Purchase Bill. The hon. Member for Barrow is the Whip of the Unionist Party—

MR. CAINE: No.

MR. T. M. HEALY: At any rate, he has great influence with the leader of that Party, the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and from that fact we may judge how little chance there is of passing a Bill containing proposals to which he so strongly objects. Now, if the Government genuinely intend passing these Bills, let them adopt the suggestion I have to make, to substitute for the word "hereafter," the words "in the present Session," and thus provide that the money shall be expended, not as Parliament may hereafter direct, but as Parliament may direct in the present Session. If you do not get your Bills through this year, it will only be fair to abandon the tax. I respectfully protest against the Bill being left in its present shape. Seeing that there is no chance of its passing, would it not be more honest to put in the words I have suggested? It would be a monstrous thing to raise this tax this year and not be able to appropriate it till next year. I challenge the Government to say whether they intend to keep us all here until the Publicans' Endowment Bill and the Landlords' Endowment Bill are passed, no matter how long that operation may take. If the tax is raised it will remain in the Treasury until next year, and the taxpayer will be the victim of the confidence trick. And next year there will be the dispute as to what shall be done with it. I do think the Government, if they mean to pass the Bills, should insert in this clause the words I have suggested. On these grounds I support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), and, if it be not accepted, it will give me great satisfaction to move my own Amendment.

(3.0.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken seems to contemplate the fact that a clean sweep will be made of all the measures the Government have brought forward this Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Except the Tithes Bill.

MR. RITCHIE: I did not hear that measure specially named. If it be any satisfaction to the hon. and learned Gentleman to know what the intentions of the Government are, I will tell him that there is not the slightest intention on their part either to drop the Land Purchase Bill or not to deal with the licensing proposals; while it is the intention of the Government, with the assistance of the House of Commons, to pass the Local Taxation Bill during the present Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then you accept my Amendment?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, that is a different matter. I hope I have now, in as explicit terms as the right hon. and learned Gentleman can desire, set his mind at rest as to what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with reference to these two measures, and I may add that I hope and believe that the Licensing Bill, or what is called the Licensing Bill, will receive the assent of Parliament during the present Session. I am sorry I was not in the House when my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow moved the Amendment which stands in his name. I understand that he did not accompany it with any elaborate remarks, but that he stated its main object was to give an opportunity to Her Majesty's Government to recede from the position they have taken up with reference to this matter. I am very much obliged to my hon. Friend for affording us such an opportunity, but it is my duty to inform him that Her Majesty's Government are unable to accept the opportunity he has put before them. The Government are convinced that the proposals they have made are distinctly in the interests of temperance, and they consider it their duty to proceed with this Bill. If there ever was any doubt in the minds of the Government as to the course incumbent upon them to pursue, that doubt has unquestionably been removed by the attitude taken up by the Party to which the hon. Member belongs, and the uncompromising manner in which they desire to deal with this question. The hon. Member and his friends have given an importance and prominence to the proposals of the Government which they themselves never contemplated they would assume, and they have rendered it impossible for the Government to depart from the position they have taken up without leading to the gravest and greatest misunderstanding as to the objects they have in view. The hon. Member has spoken about the great opposition to the Government proposals. My firm conviction is that the opposition arises largely from a misunderstanding as to the scope and objects of the Government proposals. I do not wish to attribute blame in any quarter, but I am not astonished at the misunderstanding which exists when I consider the misrepresentations which have been made in many quarters as to the proposals of the Government.

MR. CAINE: What quarters? By whom?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is, I think, evident from the Resolutions that have been received that there is a misunderstanding on the part of large numbers of the Temperance Party. The Government are now receiving Resolutions protesting against the Government granting compensation to publicans whose licences have been refused by the Magistrates.

This shows most completely the entire misunderstanding which has prevailed as to the proposal made by the Government. During the last few days the Government have been receiving unmistakable evidence that their proposals are meeting with most favourable consideration. They are even now receiving Resolutions and letters thanking them for the proposals, and hoping that the Government will persevere with them in the interests of temperance.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Read, read.

SIR W. LAWSON: From whom?

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member knows that it is impossible for me to say at this moment from whom they have been received, but they come from individuals and public meetings. I have received a telegram only to-day containing a Resolution passed at a public meeting in the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, warmly approving the proposals of the Government. I am convinced that the more widely the Government proposals are circulated the greater will be the support which the Government will receive for them in the country. Therefore, thanking the hon. Member for Barrow for the opportunity he has offered us of receding from our position in this matter, I once more beg to assure him that we have not the smallest idea of taking that course, but that it is our intention to proceed with our proposals, in the firm belief that not only are they made in the interests of the Temperance Movement, but also that they will be supported by a large majority in this House. The hon. Gentleman asks us to leave this matter in the hands of the County Councils. I do not exactly understand the position he takes up on this point. He cannot blow hot and cold at the same time. He must know that we have already proposed to leave a large sum of money in the hands of the County Councils for the extinction of licences, if they choose so to apply it, and we believe that they will exercise those powers in a discreet and judicious manner. The hon. Gentleman, however, and his friends do not think so, and yet they want us to leave the whole of the money at the disposal of the County Councils, to apply in any way they choose.

MR. CAINE: What I have said is this, that you propose to raise the money for the express purpose of relieving the burdens of local taxation, and that the best method of applying it would be to hand it over to the County Councils, and allow them to use it as they think fit, making no provision by Act of Parliament as to any particular mode of disposing of it.

*MR. RITCHIE: But surely the hon. Gentleman must remember what was done by the Local Government Act of 1888. The course he suggests was certainly not pursued in that case. What was done was to hand over a large sum to the Local Authorities to be applied by them to certain distinct purposes, and we are now acting in accordance with the proposal then laid down. We say to the Local Authorities, we give you this money for the purpose of doing certain things, among others applying it to police superannuation, which is a matter that has been under discussion for a great many years, and one which it is generally admitted requires to be dealt with. We made the same provision as to many other matters, which I need not now refer to. I think we did perfectly right when we gave over that money to the County Councils to accompany the transfer with obligations as to its disposal, and what we are now doing is in strict conformity with what was then enacted. In conclusion, I have only to express my regret that Her Majesty's Government cannot accept the proposal of my hon. Friend, and I, therefore, must ask the Committee to adhere to the proposal we have attached to the Bill, namely, that the money we pay to the Local Authorities shall be disposed of in the manner pointed out by the Bill.

(3.10.) SIR W. LAWSON: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken boldly and courageously of what the Government intend to do with regard to this Bill, but I should like to recall to his memory the fact that on a certain day in June, 1888, when the then Compensation Clauses were brought forward, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow got up and asked the leader of the House, "Do you intend to stick to your Com-

dowment Bill are passed, no matter how long that operation may take. If the tax is raised it will remain in the Treasury until next year, and the taxpayer will be the victim of the confidence trick. And next year there will be the dispute as to what shall be done with it. I do think the Government, if they mean to pass the Bills, should insert in this clause the words I have suggested. On these grounds I support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine), and, if it be not accepted, it will give me great satisfaction to move my own Amendment.

Member for Barrow for the opportunity he has offered us of receding from our position in this matter, I once more beg to assure him that we have not the smallest idea of taking that course, but that it is our intention to proceed with our proposals, in the firm belief that not only are they made in the interests of the Temperance Movement, but also that they will be supported by a large majority in this House. The hon. Gentleman asks us to leave this matter in the hands of the County Councils. I do not exactly understand the position he takes up on this point. He cannot blow hot and cold at the same time. He must know that we have already proposed to leave a large sum of money in the hands of the County Councils for the extinction of licences, if they choose so to apply it, and we believe that they will exercise those powers in a discreet and judicious manner. The hon. Gentleman, however, and his friends do not think so, and yet they want us to leave the whole of the money at the disposal of the County Councils, to apply in any way they choose.

MR. CAINE: What I have said is this, that you propose to raise the money for the express purpose of relieving the burdens of local taxation, and that the best method of applying it would be to hand it over to the the County Councils, and allow them to use it as they think fit, making no provision by Act of Parliament as to any particular mode of disposing of it.

*MR. RITCHIE: But surely the hon. Gentleman must remember what was done by the Local Government Act of 1888. The course he suggests was certainly not pursued in that case. What was done was to hand over a large sum to the Local Authorities to be applied by them to certain distinct purposes, and we are now acting in accordance with the proposal then laid down. We say to the Local Authorities, we give you this money for the purpose of doing certain things, among others applying it to police superannuation, which is a matter that has been under discussion for a great many years, and one which it is generally admitted requires to be dealt with. We made the same provision as to many other matters, which I need not now refer to. I think we did perfectly right when we gave over that money to the County Councils to accompany the transfer with obligations as to its disposal, and what we are now doing is in strict conformity with what was then enacted. In conclusion, I have only to express my regret that Her Majesty's Government cannot accept the proposal of my hon. Friend, and I, therefore, must ask the Committee to adhere to the proposal we have attached to the Bill, namely, that the money we pay to the Local Authorities shall be disposed of in the manner pointed out by the Bill.

(3.10.) SIR W. LAWSON: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken boldly and courageously of what the Government intend to do with regard to this Bill, but I should like to recall to his memory the fact that on a certain day in June, 1888, when the then Compensation Clauses were brought forward, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Barrow got up and asked the leader of the House, "Do you intend to stick to your Compensation Clauses?" The reply then made by the right hon. Gentleman being, "Certainly, Sir." But within so short a period as 24 hours the leader of this House withdrew them all. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of a precedent. I say that that is a precedent, and it is one which I think the Government would do well to follow. I regard the speech just made by the right hon. Gentleman as one of the most extraordinary speeches he has made in this House for a very long time. The tone of his remarks was this, that the Government are not insisting upon these proposals because they are particularly impressed with their necessity, but that the matter has been so much talked about in the country, and is considered of so much importance, that therefore they must go on with it. They seem to be actuated by a kind of pique, and I, for one, certainly never heard so extraordinary a statement made by a responsible Minister. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by "misrepresentation," or by saying that this is not a compensation measure? The Chancellor of the Exchequer would hardly get up and make the same statement, because in his Budget speech we have the very inception of this policy. In a pamphlet just issued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer I find the phrase that he was going to do something for the brewers which would bring them much compensation and consolation.

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the hon. Baronet is sufficiently master of the English language to know that the word "compensation" may be used in two senses.

SIR W. LAWSON: I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer need interrupt me in order to make that statement. We all of us know that the Government are using the word compensation in two senses continually, and that the compensation which is to be given to the brewers is not the compensation which gives consolation to the majority of the people who desire to get rid of the drink traffic. However, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has declared war. My hon. Friend the Member for Barrow has done what he could to make peace. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw while he could with all the honours of war. "No," says the right hon. Gentleman, "we will fight it out, and we do so because you consider it important, not because the Government think it important. Therefore, we accept your challenge." Well, we have held out the olive branch, and have done all we could to make peace, the battle is now set and we must fight it out, and I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we mean to fight it out. Let him be quite sure of that. It is nonsense for the right hon. Gentleman to get up and say, "This is a temperance proposal." That will not do. They may go on making that statement as long as they like; but the longer they say it the less will the people believe them. We see this measure supported up and down the country by the great Drink Party; but, at the same time, nine-tenths of the Temperance Party are opposing it tooth and nail. Here is a letter I have just received, showing how keenly the Drink Party are supporting the Government. It is a letter from a publican in Manchester, who wrote with great glee after the result of the Division the other night. He says—

Sir W. Lawson

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer's public purse this day will receive £5,000, and we lovers of fair play are drinking to his health."

[Laughter.] Well, those are his own words. Those are the right hon. Gentleman's friends; this is the right hon. Gentleman's Temperance Party.

MR. GOSCHEN: Lovers of fair play.

SIR W. LAWSON: Yes; and lovers of drink too. I wish the right hon. Gentleman joy of his party. After the speech of the right hon. Gentleman there is no drawing back on his part; there will be none on the other side; the battle will be fought out, and it will be seen whether the Temperance Party or the Government and the publicans are the strongest in the country.

(3.15.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Surely it would be much better for this House to develop the plan of allowing the money allocated to the Local Authorities, to be applied as they may think fit, than for the Imperial Parliament to impose restrictions as to the purposes for which it may be employed—a procedure which is certain to lead to great inconvenience in the future. It appears to me that the Government have not yet fully realised what are the strongest objections to the proposals embodied in this clause. In my own opinion nothing has ever occurred during the present Parliament which has raised so general and widespread a feeling of opposition as has been created by the introduction of this measure. I may here say that I think it would contribute to the calmer consideration of this question if we were not told from time to time that the proposal is made in the interests of temperance. It appears to me to be merely trifling with the House and the country for the Government to keep on repeating this assertion. That is not the suggestion that was put forward in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget speech.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension; it was put forward in my Budget speech, in which I distinctly stated that we were endeavouring to assist the cause of temperance. I also spoke of the large increase in the consumption of liquors, which rendered it necessary for the House to go into the matter, and it was on this account that the Government introduced the clause to stop the issue of new licences. Therefore, the Bill was introduced in the direction of temperance.

MR. ROWNTREE: That does not affect what I was saying, which was that this is not solely in the interests of temperance.

MR. GOSCHEN: I never used the word "solely."

MR. ROWNTREE: The President of the Local Government Board has done so in the House and in the country, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government would introduce a measure which would bring the brewers much consolation and compensation.

MR. GOSCHEN: I believe the suspension of the issue of new licences is agreeable to the brewers, and, although the stoppage of the issue of new licences may have given dissatisfaction to other parts of the trade, it is certainly a measure in the direction of temperance.

MR. ROWNTREE: But I put it to the Committee, why should we be asked to give compensation twice over? Because that is what it comes to. The brewers are satisfied with having their monopoly enhanced and increased, and every organ of the trade recognises the fact; and yet, above and beyond this, we are asked to give money to buy the very places the suppression of which will add to the value of the existing monopoly. To be told that this is in the interests of temperance is trifling with the intelligence of the House and the country. I feel afraid that the Government will not be strengthened by the feeling they have aroused and the opposition they have created throughout the country by their policy on this subject—an opposition which I think they will find much greater and stronger than they have calculated upon.

(3.20.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not intend to speak at length on this Amendment, but I shall take this and every other opportunity of expressing my desire to defeat the plans of the Government on the subject of compensation. I know that the Government raise a verbal issue as to the use of the word "compensation," but it does not seem to me to be of much importance what meaning they attach to it. We understand what it is, and nearly everybody, not only on this side of the House, but those engaged in the liquor trade, regard it, and what is generally understood by compensation. Not only so, but the other day I read a speech which was delivered by a great authority on the Conservative side—I allude to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland—who was addressing the ladies of the Primrose League. I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman would have addressed them in most grammatical language; and in that speech he recommended this measure as one that would not be disagreeable to the publicans, because it established the principle of compensation. Therefore, do not let us be found fault with if, in addressing our constituents, we use the same words and sentiments as were conveyed by the Secretary for Ireland to the Primrose Dames. As to the real character of this measure, what is the use of the Chancellor of the Exchequer saying his Budget speech was in favour of temperance, and what is the use of the Church of England Temperance Society saying the same thing when, in any reading rooms you enter, you find all the organs of the publicans joining in a paen of approbation of this measure, while in all the temperance organs you find it is denounced? The measure is approved and praised to the skies by the entire liquor interest, while it is strongly denounced by every temperance organ in the country. I do not think that even the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) can find a single newspaper which approves of the course he has taken, and I only mention him because I desire to call him as a witness to the fact that the temperance opinion prevailing in this country is adverse to the Bill. I do not deny there are some persons who share his views, but he is too candid a man to deny that the enormous and overwhelming majority of temperance opinion in this country is strongly adverse to the Bill. Well, the Government have rejected the offer made to them by my hon. Friend, and I am very sorry that they have taken, as far as they can, the means of cutting off their retreat. They felt that it was necessary and prudent to beat a retreat in 1888, but now they have nailed the compensation flag to the mainmast of the Unionist Party and are going into action under that flag. The flag of compensation has been hoisted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and under that banner my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (Lord Hartington) is going to fight. Of course, the Unionists are the best judges of what should be their own policy, and we cannot but regret the issue they have adopted. Undoubtedly, this is the issue which, at this moment, mostly engages the attention and interest of the whole country, and it is to this issue the Unionist Party have committed themselves. For our part, we are willing to fight upon that issue, and I warn the Government that this is only one of the smallest skirmishes or outpost affairs likely to arise on this question. The great pitched battle—indeed, there will be many of them—has yet to come. Both in this House and in the country and on the issue thus raised we are ready to meet the Government and the Unionist Party.

Sir W. Harcourt

(3.25.) MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman has said that this is only a kind of outpost affair compared with what we have had.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, compared with what we are going to have.

MR. GOSCHEN: I only hope that the right hon. Gentleman will, so far, be true to his declaration that they are to be pitched battles and not simply dilatory and guerilla warfare.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I mean every kind of warfare.

MR. GOSCHEN: Already there has been one pitched battle, in which the Opposition was signally defeated.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We do not know when we are beaten.

MR. GOSCHEN: And the Government will not know when they are beaten until they are really beaten on the subject. But the right hon. Gentleman says this measure must be against the cause of temperance, because the Temperance Party say so. The fact is, however, that before they had even read the Bill, or knew what it was to contain—before the provisions of this measure were laid on the Table—I myself received hundreds of stereotyped objections from Good Templars and others against the proposals we were going to make.

SIR W. HARCOURT: They knew the author.

MR. CAINE: They had read your Budget Speech.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, but they had read it accompanied by the misrepresentations which were made and accompanied by the necessary interpretation afforded by the Bill. I wish the public thoroughly to understand what has happened, namely, that before our proposals were made known—the proposal as to the purchasing of licences not having been made known in the Budget Speech—our proposals were condemned by a fictitious and a factitious opposition which was got up in advance. Another reason why the right hon. Gentleman says this proposal cannot be in favour of temperance is that compensation is attached to it. He assumes that compensation and the reduction of the traffic in drink can have no relation to each other. We, however, deny that that this is a Compensation Bill; but, even if it were, it cannot be said that a reduction in the number of public houses is not in the interests of temperance. Why has the number of licences continued to increase? Why has no previous Government been able to deal with this question before? It is because the Temperance Party have taken up an attitude of absolute confiscation. We believe we shall be able to prove by the results that this is a step in the direction of temperance, which the Temperance Party have never dared to take, because they have preferred to establish the principle of no compensation rather than make a serious reduction in the number of public houses. The Temperance Party have brought the matter to a deadlock. We are attempting to remove that deadlock, and we believe we shall succeed. Hon. Members opposite have prevented progress in this direction by taking up an attitude which they have never induced the people of this country to assume, and which none of their leaders have ever assumed until within the past few days under the stress of Party emotion. Unless something is done in the direction in which we are moving, I believe the temperance cause will permanently suffer. If the right hon. Gentleman chooses to go about telling the country that this is simply a Compensation Bill, he may do so, but it is absolutely untrue. The essence of the Bill is to diminish the number of licences, and it is a misnomer to say that the money is going to be applied to compensation, when it is going to be applied to the purchase of the goodwill which the owners may sell in the market to others if they choose. I did not intend to prolong this discussion, but the right hon. Gentleman has been persistent in calling this a Compensation Bill when it is not a Compensation Bill. Hon. Members, if they choose to call it a Compensation Bill, may do so; but, at all events, they will admit that there is more in it than that. They will admit there is in it a diminution of licences. I must say I believe it will have a disappointing effect on the true and moderate friends of the temperance cause throughout the country to see the attitude taken up by men who prefer to continue the assertion of a principle the country will not accept rather than to make any real progress in the direction of temperance.

*(3.35.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The right hon. Gentleman says the present agitation is fictitious and factitious. Well, the right hon. Gentleman knows a great deal. I am not sure that he is not one of the best-informed men in the House as to most political questions; but one thing he is most profoundly ignorant of, and that is the moral sentiment of the middle and artisan classes of this country; and I think he will find that he has embarked in a conflict in which the feelings of the middle and artisan classes have been aroused in a way in which they have not been aroused on any other question certainly within the past two years.

(3.36.) MR. GOSCHEN: What I said was, that the agitation which was set on foot before our proposals were known was a fictitious and factitious agitation. But since our proposals have become known, I quite admit that the agitation on this matter is an earnest one in the minds of those who engage in it.

*(3.37.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: At all events, they now have the Bill of the Government before them, and during the Whitsuntide Recess I have no doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite will take the opportunity of addressing some large public meetings—open, not ticket meetings—to take the opinion of their constituents as to this Bill. The hon. Member for South Tyrone will probably attend some of these meetings, which will be of a temperance character, to give an air of impartiality to the proceedings. If the right hon. Gentleman can get 10 open meetings of the working and middle classes to pronounce in favour of the Bill, I shall be willing to concede that this agitation is fictitious. The people of this country believe drunkenness to be the curse and the crime of this country, and they believe that if this Bill becomes law it will strike a fatal blow at all temperance legislation. ["No, no!"] That is the point. Argue it if you like, but I want to put the case strongly before you to justify the attitude we take up. The sum which it is proposed to lay aside for the purchase of licences may be small, but if you embody this proposal in an Act of Parliament you will be creating a vested interest and admitting the principle of compensating owners of licences when licences are discontinued; you will be surrendering the whole position, and in future will be able to carry out no temperance legislation without an enormous expenditure of public money. The Member for West Birmingham the other day talked—and others have written in the Press—about depriving the honest, hard-working publican who has devoted the whole of his life up to the present to the carrying on of his trade of the means of earning a livelihood. They say that to deprive them of compensation would be unjust. Not 10 per cent. of the licences in this country belong to the men who carry on the business; but in this Bill we are asked to vote large sums of public money to the brewers who have invested their money in a species of speculation just as anyone may speculate in nitrate shares or South African shares. Who ever heard of compensating people who have invested their money in the belief that a certain state of things will happen when an entirely different state of things arises which dooms them to a loss in their shares? We shall have an opportunity, on a future day, of taking a distinct issue on this point, divested from all its surrounding circumstances, and of seeing whether the sympathy of the Government is with the tenant from year to year. I would assure the right hon. Gentleman that this agitation is genuine and real, and will be one of the stiffest, most stubborn, and most protracted fights that this or any other Parliament has ever known, because we believe that the principle at stake is the question of the future of temperance legislation in this country. I believe that if this Bill passes, a fatal blow will be struck at all temperance reform.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL rose to continue the discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must recall the Committee to the issue before it. 'The issue is not the merits or demerits contained in the proposals of another Bill, but the question whether the proceeds of this tax should be appropriated in the manner proposed in another Bill, or given to the County Councils to do as they like with it.

Mr. CAINE: When I moved the Resolution, I was extremely careful not to introduce any matters extraneous to the Motion before the House, and the sole blame for transgressing in advance the rule you have just given must be laid upon the Treasury Bench. I hope you will not rule me out of order if I answer what has been stated by the President of the Local Government Board and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to what he is pleased to call the fictitious and factitious opposition raised previously to the Customs and Excise Bill.

Mr. GOSCHEN: I rise to order. I was allowed to reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) replied to me. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) rose just now possibly to reply to the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton; and as he was not allowed to do so, is it in order for the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) now to reply to our speeches?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member for Barrow would be well advised if he allowed the matter to rest, after the remarks of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton.

Mr. CAINE: I will carry out your suggestion, Mr. Courtney, and will avail myself of some other opportunity of replying to the observations of Gentlemen opposite. I will merely put forward some reasons why the Government should consent to my Amendment. The Liberal Unionist Party are divided on this subject. When the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) is able to oppose this measure, we can justly claim that a section of the Party which is worthy of consideration is out of accord with the Government. We are Liberal Unionists, but the right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to think we must drop the adjective and stick to the noun. I am not prepared to do anything of the kind, and I warn the Government—knowing much of the inner working of the Liberal Unionist Party—that if they persevere with this Bill, their action can only end in the breaking up of the Unionist Party. I dare say, as far as this House is concerned, that the fragments which will be broken off may be small; but that is not so in the country, and I know that the allegiance of the Liberal Unionist Party to the Government is now being strained to the utmost. What is our position in regard to the Government itself?—that we should support them with the distinct understanding that they will proceed with remedial legislation for Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's remarks are not revelant to the question before the Committee.

MR. CAINE: I will not pursue the discussion further, but will conclude with the expression of a hope that they will avail themselves of this last plank I throw out to them

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I wish to say that I rose to reply to some of the remarks made by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Wolverhampton about myself, but I respected your ruling, Sir, and refrained.

Ayes 203; Noes 127.—(Div. List, No. 104.)

(3.58.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I congratulate myself upon moving an Amendment which I am sure the Government will cordially accept, namely, after "direct" to add "by any Act passed in the course of the present Session." I am sure those words will give great gratification to the Government. I would like to explain to the Conservative intelligence exactly how the matter stands. The ground of the Amendment is that the Government by another Bill declare they will appropriate this tax in a particular way. If they do not pass the other Bill, they will not want this money. Every Conservative Member, therefore, if he believes in the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer with that faith to which I believe the belief of the Mahomedans in Mecca is nothing, must support my Amendment. To oppose my Amendment would mean that they did not believe in the pledges of the Government or in the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury that they mean to pass these Bills this Session. I invite the Conservative Party not to throw discredit and doubt on the honour and faith of their leaders. The First Lord of the Treasury has declared over and over again that he is going to pass the Publicans' Compensation Bill. [Ministerial cries of "No!"] Then he intends to drop it.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member will refrain from using invidious language the discussion can be conducted without interruption.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, the title is the Local Taxation (Customs and Inland Revenue) Bill. It was only to save the time of the House that I shortened it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not saving the time of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Government have over and over again declared their intention of passing the Local Taxation—in brackets—Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and they are pledged to pass their other measure also. We know we can rely upon the faith of Ministers absolutely. Every pledge they have ever given has been absolutely fulfilled. We know they intend to give Local Government to Ireland; and though it has been promised for the last 17 years, I have no doubt the pledge will be redeemed this Session. This Session they are going to pass the Irish Local Government Bill, the Land Purchase Bill, and the Bill with names in brackets. This Amendment is a simple recognition of Conservative good faith, and I cannot conceive the Government rejecting it. I believe they will welcome it with gratitude. I believe I shall be hailed as a benefactor to the Conservative Party, as a man who, whatever my misdeeds have been in the past, has now enabled the Conservative Party to give complete assurance to the landlords and the publicans. One of the legs of the Government rests on the landlords and the other on the publicans, and that being so they will adopt my Amendment. They will not allow any doubt whatever to creep into the publican's breast, which is a most sensitive breast. It is not enough for the Government to declare their intention of passing the Bills—human intentions, we know, are fickle, and I am sure the House will not be content with a declaration that the Government, as at present advised, mean to pass the measures. All we want from them is a declaration that even if the House be kept sitting until Christmas, and the Christmas following, nothing will prevent them from carrying the measures.

Amendment proposed, Clause 7, page 3, to add at the end of the Clause, "by any Act passed in the present Session."—
(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(4.10.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. and learned Member made an unnecessarily long speech. He said the same thing—and I counted it—13 times over.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I withdraw the other 12.

MR. GOSCHEN: Unfortunately, the hon. Member cannot withdraw the time he has wasted. No doubt it is a humorous thing to withdraw the 12 times, but it will be noted that the time which is lost by these repetitions is not saved afterwards by retraction. Why did he not ask us whether we would accept the Amendment? It is a very simple Amendment. We intend to pass an Act this Session applying this money, and we have no objection whatever to put these words into the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

\*(4.11.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have no wish to imperil the passing of this Bill through Committee before half-past 5, as I consider that, although no undertaking has been given, there is an understanding that we should finish the present stage to-day. I will, therefore, shorten my observations as much as possible. Clause 7 raises the question of the allocation of these debts to Local Authorities. Even if the objects of this Bill were such that there was no difference about them I should object, on financial grounds, to the further subvention of Local Authorities out of Imperial funds. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has unnecessarily re-opened the controversy on this point. The controversy has lasted for a great many years. It was practically brought before the House first by Sir Massey Lopes some 10 or 12 years ago, and it was understood on both sides that the question was closed by the proposals made in 1888. On that occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, as far as he was concerned, he had shown his whole hand, and it is evident the Government then thought ample justice had been done to the local taxpayer. This is a re-opening of the controversy. You cannot re-open the question without asking where the real burden of local taxation lies, and to what extent that burden has been lessened by the legislation of 1888. It was stated in 1888 that 68½ per cent. of the local taxation was borne by the Metropolis and urban districts, and 31½ by the rural districts. This fact has not been sufficiently borne in mind in the allocation of funds to local purposes, and, as a result, the country districts have received a larger share than they ought to have received. The poor rate proper, i.e. the portion of the rate expended on the relief of the poor, stands in precisely the same position as the tithe. It is a burden on the land, and has been so for three centuries. So far from being an increasing, it is a decreasing burden. I find from the last Report of the Local Government Board presented to Parliament that during the last 15 years the increase of rates in the Metropolis has been 76 per cent.; in the urban districts it has been 66 per cent.; in the partly urban and partly rural districts 17 per cent.; and in the purely rural districts only 10 per cent.; and you are now going to increase the very large subvention to local taxation. I am not asking that the settlement of 1888 should be re-opened, but I maintain that the subvention should not be increased. What was the settlement of 1888? The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to appropriate for local purposes £2,969,000 from licences and £1,800,000 from the Probate Duty; he also proposed a new tax of £826,000. I am not going to talk of the Wheel and Van Tax, which succumbed to what I suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer will call a factitious and fictitious opposition, but I think that there is a great deal to be said for the Horse Tax if it had been fairly assessed with no exemption at all. At all events, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have left it to the Local Authorities to say whether they would impose this tax or not. The main reason that was urged for the imposition of those taxes was that they were to provide for the increased burdens to be thrown on the Local Authority in consequence of the repair of roads and in substitution of turnpikes, which have practically been abolished. How have the figures worked out? The Chancellor of the Exchequer expected £3,000,000 from licences and £1,800,000 from the Probate Duty. I regret the absence of Returns showing the amounts granted and the amounts allocated ; but there is the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own statement that the taxes he proposed to allocate for local purposes have amounted to £415,647 more than he anticipated. That is to be set against the £826,000 of the new taxes proposed, and, further, the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates this year that the Probate Duty proposed to be handed over will be £2,400,000. Practically, then, the Local Authorities are going to get, and have already got, all the relief anticipated in 1888, or within £200,000 of it, and that will soon be made up by the increment in the Licence and Probate Duty. Upon that ground the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be justified in handing over, out of Imperial funds, £1,300,000 to the Local Authority to carry out the settlement which was declared to be closed in 1888. Apart from all the other contentious parts of the Bill, I protest against the handing over of this sum from Imperial funds which we want for Imperial purposes, because, if there was any disturbance of the public peace, we shall find ourselves at a great disadvantage from having parted with this source of Imperial revenue. But there is, further, an inequity in this arrangement with reference to the various sources from which these funds are derived. The classes who pay Imperial taxation and those who pay rates are two distinct bodies, and if we are taking money from the taxpayer to relieve the ratepayer we must look at the incidence of taxation in both cases. What are the proportions of the contributions from the working and artisan classes to Imperial funds, and what are their contributions to the rates? In a speech delivered in this House in 1877 Mr. Holmes, the then Member for Paisley, said that Professor Leone Levi estimated that the working class contributed one-sixth to local rates, and the upper and middle class five-sixths. This estimate was adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1873. On the same occasion Lord Beaconsfield took the proportion as one-fifth and four-fifths. Just in proportion as you make grants from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local rates, you relieve the middle and upper classes to the extent of four-fifths of the amount granted, and the working classes to the extent of one-fifth. So unless you are prepared to show the same proportion of four-fifths and one-fifth in Imperial taxation, you are putting a burden on the working classes in relieving those who largely pay local rates. Mr. Holmes, in his speech, put the case in a concrete shape thus: Of a sovereign contributed to local taxation the working man pays 4s. But what is his contribution towards Imperial taxation? In the opinion of the authority I have quoted—an opinion I do not altogether agree with, although I quote it—after a careful investigation of his long and interesting speech full of facts and figures, his opinion is that the working classes pay three-fifths and the upper and middle classes two-fifths. It is a very big question, and I am not going into it now ; but I have very carefully worked at the figures, taking out the various sources of taxation, the taxation on consumable articles in the year just closed at £43,500,000, the amount raised on property £22,500,000, the stamps and licences £8,000,000, and working out the proportion of the £43,500,000 paid by the working classes alone. But we have a very suggestive figure given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on the Budget in reference to the House Duty. He showed that four-fifths of the houses of the country are under £20 in value ; that is, that they belong to the artisan class or the classes beneath them. My own impression is—I give it with the greatest doubt and hesitation, but should be prepared to argue it, if we had time and opportunity, with great diffidence—that at the present time the Imperial taxation of the country is about equally divided between the propertied and the working classes. If the figures are at all right, the Committee will see that the proposals of the Government amount to taking 20s. from a pocket to which the working classes contribute 10s. and putting it into a pocket for local taxation purposes to which the same class contribute only 4s. So the result of the transfer is seen. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave the turn of the balance in favour of the rural rate-paying interest, and they have no further claim on the contribution of upwards of £1,250,000. They have found the Chancellor of the Exchequer's contributions a very pleasant thing. I was looking the other day over the balance sheet of my own county of Stafford, which has enjoyed rather a fair share of these subventions, and I commend to the attention of hon. Members who are familiar with the taxation in large towns a comparison with these financial proposals for the county for a rate of  $3\frac{1}{4}$ d. Is that an enormous burden of local taxation? With all the objects we have in view for Imperial purposes, with changes looming in the future, and the many things desired in the present, apart from all statistical questions, is there any public reason or fiscal reason, any just reason for further increasing contributions from Imperial funds to Local Authorities? And, remember, if you provide Local Bodies with funds they do not raise, you diminish their responsibility for expenditure. It is easy to be generous with other people's money. If County and Borough Authorities are to have the assistance of Imperial taxpayers for local purposes, you diminish local responsibility and destroy one of the most valuable guarantees for local economy. I hold not only that those who pay the rates should control the expenditure of the rates, but that those who control should pay, and you cannot separate the two bodies without all the old evils of Imperial subventions promoting local extravagance. In reference to this matter—I am not going into it now—I shall have some strong representations to make upon the Police Superannuation Fund. That raises a very formidable question as between those solvent County and Borough Authorities who have carried out the law, being placed at a disadvantage as compared with those who have not. Mine has been but a condensed, disjointed statement, but I have been fettered by the desire not to protract the Debate. My broad and general objection is that we have done enough in the form of Imperial subventions to Local Authorities, that the controversy was closed in 1888, and it is unwise now to re-open it.

(4.40.) MR. GOSCHEN: I appreciate the sacrifices the right hon. Gentleman has made to brevity, and the disadvantages he was under in dealing with his subject within a short space of time. I may add that I feel equally embarrassed in dealing with his arguments in the short space of time I can give to reply. I may also suggest that it is much easier for the right hon. Gentleman to prepare his case and have all his figures ready than it is to reply when one does not know the precise case which is going to be opened, for we cannot be prepared with all the figures to answer the arguments. I must correct one error into which the right hon. Gentleman has fallen. The right hon. Gentleman took the Probate Duty at £1,800,000 for the year 1888-9, and at £2,400,000 for the next year, showing an increase of £600,000. But the £1,800,000 was the share that fell to England alone, while the £2,400,000 is the total that falls to England, Scotland, and Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman will observe that I have the confirmation of the strong financial authority behind him (Mr. Buxton.) The original amount was £2,130,000, and the increase on that amount is £270,000, and not £600,000. There was, I think, an amount of £280,000 involved in the Van and Wheel Tax, and I wish to point out how we stand as regards the £800,000 promised. It may be said to be decreased by the additions to the Probate Duty of £270,000, but not by any larger amount. There remains a considerable sum of which the County Authorities have been disappointed by the withdrawal of the Van and Wheel Tax, and the right hon. Gentleman cannot, therefore, contend that, in the view of the Government, the account is closed. The right hon. Gentleman has repeated some remarks of mine on introducing the Budget, to the effect that the account was closed, but that was taking into view our proposals as a whole, including the Van and wheel Tax, as well as the arrangement relating to Licences and Probate Duty. Therefore, I could not consider the account as closed when the Van and Wheel Tax proposal failed. The right hon. Gentleman does not feel the necessity of increasing the funds at the disposal of the County Councils, and I think he bases his opposition to our proposal on two grounds; he dislikes any further contribution being made from Imperial funds to local purposes, and he dislikes the particular allocation proposed, because he thinks the counties gain more than the towns. This tendency of localising expenditure and the raising of Revenue can be carried to a dangerous extent. If the locality which contributes most is to receive its exact proportion in grants, what will become of the poorer parts of the country? Successive Parliaments have felt the necessity of giving relief to the poorest districts; and though I dislike the principle of Imperial subvention, I do not think it fair that the poorest districts should be made to meet the whole of their expenditure out of the rates. Then the right hon. Gentleman urges that four-fifths of the rates are paid by the wealthier classes, and that they do not fall on town and country alike. But it must be remembered that in towns a man pays his rates upon the value of his house or shop, while the rural ratepayer, who lives on a farm, pays not only on his house, but on the property distributed all over the farm. The right hon. Gentleman says the rates in the counties are very light, but the rates levied by the County Authorities over a particular area by no means represent the rating weight which rests on the rural community. It is unfair to make the distinction the right hon. Gentleman has drawn between the Poor Rate proper and other local rates, and it tends to give the false impression that we are giving assistance to those who pay a rate of 1d. or 1½d. The county does not only include the agricultural ratepayers, a number of towns are within the area. It would carry me too far if I were to attempt to enter upon the dispute between the right hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board. As to the degree to which the big towns and the rural towns have respectively been assisted by the subventions, out of the total amount of £2,400,000 a half has gone direct to the Poor Rate. Though the Poor Rate proper may have diminished, the point is whether the aggregate rate has not increased. Rates have increased enormously, and they are felt much more heavily than before in rural districts, because of the long-continued agricultural depression. New rates have been imposed since the period to which the speech of Lord Beaconsfield, from which the right hon. Gentleman has quoted, referred, and whatever authority that statement may have carried then, I doubt whether it could be sustained at the present moment. Rates have increased enormously since that time.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Not in rural districts.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; they have increased 10 per cent. in rural districts. While the agricultural districts, from the long depression, have grown poorer, towns have grown richer. ["No!"] Well, somebody has grown richer, as I gather from Income Tax Returns. I would recommend hon. Gentlemen, as a statistical occupation, to study the interesting figures in relation to the Returns under Schedules A, B, and D. It will be seen that under A and B there has been a considerable decline, and there has been an enormous increase under D. Therefore, I assert there has been a large increase of wealth in towns as compared with rural districts. As to the exact proportion paid to the rates by the working classes, it is very difficult to arrive at any accurate conclusion, and I cannot accept the right hon. Gentleman's figures. I am bound to say that I consider some of Professor Lenoir Levi's interesting statistics are of a somewhat fantastical character. It is extremely difficult to arrive at an accurate conclusion, but I have neither the time nor the material to go into the interesting subject. To sum up what I wish to say—I do not think that, in these further grants to local purposes, the Government deserve the displeasure which the right hon. Gentleman shows at the whole of our plans. Some further relief is due to local burdens, and especially in regard to police superannuation—a question of supreme importance, which has not been grappled with before because of the insufficiency of financial resources.

(4.55.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not propose to follow my right hon. Friend or the Chancellor of the Exchequer into the question how far the new proposals affect the different classes of taxpayers. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having showed that my hon. Friend had made a mistake in relation to the Probate Duty, might have spared the sneer at myself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon his own figures, has shown conclusively that he is about to increase, by £300,000 or £400,000, the original proposal for local subventions. The original proposal of £840,000 has been raised considerably by the increase in the Probate Duty, and yet there is this proposal for a further grant. I did not understand my right hon. Friend to say he would have the whole of the subventions withdrawn, but he did object to increasing the grants on the present system. The protest I particularly wish to emphasise is that upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself dwelt with force in his Budget statement, namely, the system introduced two years ago, and now being extended, of mixing up local and Imperial finance in a manner that had never been followed previously. Three years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I understand, was endeavouring to divide altogether local from Imperial finance, but since then they have become inextricably mixed up, and this year the confusion will become worse. We are handing over a large sum to Local Authorities in the form of Licence Duties, and to that, I think, there is no objection. These licences are collected locally and handed over, and to that there is no objection. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has handed over the Probate Duty, which is partly local and partly Imperial, and this year he proposes to hand over the Spirit and Beer Duties in the same way. In voting against this clause I may say I do so to express an emphatic objection to the system of mixing up local and Imperial finance. I will not discuss the matter on this occasion, but I hope on some future Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to prevent the confusion which has thus undoubtedly arisen by handing over to the Local Authorities the whole of some particular tax instead of handing over, as at present, small portions of particular taxes.

(5.4.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I would further remind the Committee that the total amount of money now proposed to be given in local subventions out of Imperial funds, including the additions proposed this year by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, amount to no less than £9,500,000. The statement I made just now with regard to £200,000 was incorrect, but I fell into the error in the absence of figures, which I again ask for. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury to use his influence to obtain them, so that we may know exactly what is handed over to the Local Authorities. As far as I am concerned I can only take the statement which appeared in the Times the week before the Budget.

(5.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: As to the non-production of the figures I may point out that they will have to be got from the Local Authorities all over the kingdom, and it is difficult to collect figures going up to the middle of March by the middle of May.

Question, "That Clause 7, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

MIDWIVES REGISTRATION BILL.

(NO. 29.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(5.10.) MR. H. PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill, the importance of which hon. Members will at once see. It is extremely necessary that there should be a registration of these women who attend people of humble circumstances in child-birth. Probably five-sixths of the cases of child-birth in this country are attended by midwives. There should be some means of registering these women, just as other professions are registered. This Bill, I may say, has been submitted to various bodies, and from them we have had a large amount of help. They almost entirely approve of the clauses of the Bill, and, in fact, many of the provisions have been drawn up by the Medical Societies themselves. At this hour I do not wish to go into the history of the matter. There have been attempts at legislation in this direction from time immemorial, and there have been Memorials sent to this house at a very ancient date asking for the registration of midwives. It would be quite unnecessary now to follow that question up. I, therefore, simply desire to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. Pease.)

(5.12.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I rise to second the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill, and I would point out to the hon.

Member who has given notice of an Amendment, that the measure is of the greatest importance to the labouring classes of the country. The richer classes are already provided for in the matter, and have thoroughly well qualified practitioners to attend to their wants. The poorer classes, however, have constantly to have recourse to the assistance of midwives, instead of calling in highly qualified medical men. The Bill is meant in no wise to depreciate the value we all attach to the services of the noblest profession the country possesses; we only desire to see some of the enlightenment which is at the service of the richer classes, placed at the disposal of the poorer classes. The wives of labouring men are dependent on the services of midwives. Possibly, I shall be told that medical practitioners ought always to be employed; that, however, is absolutely impossible. There are not sufficient medical practitioners in this country to enable every poor woman to avail herself of their assistance in time of need, and if there were, it is perfectly obvious that it would be out of their power to incur the expense of employing them. I, therefore, do appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw his opposition, and I appeal to the House to pass the Bill into law without delay.

(5.15.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I should certainly not have opposed the Bill if I had not received a great many complaints from medical men in various parts of the country. They say if the Bill passes into law, it will deprive many a medical man of the conduct of these cases of midwifery. They also point out that under the Bill a registered midwife will be able to conduct a case of "natural labour." How is a midwife to be certain that the case she may be called in to will be a case of natural labour? I see in the measure certain elements of danger to the community, as well as danger to the medical profession. The midwives may take it upon themselves to perform operations which will be attended with manifest danger. However, if I can receive any assurance from the promoters of the Bill, I shall be only too happy to let it pass.

(5.18.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): This is a Bill, the object of which is to protect female life in certain cases. As to the competency of women to manage these cases, there is ample evidence. Two French ladies are quoted as authorities in almost every book on the subject, and if French ladies can acquire the necessary skill for dealing with such cases, there is no reason why English ladies should not do the same. What we want is that the large proportion of the poorer classes who are attended by midwives should have competent and not incompetent midwives. I am constantly seeing cases in which the ignorance and incompetence of midwives proves dangerous to those on whom they attend. Only the other day I heard of a poor woman who was nursed by a midwife who went daily to attend upon a child suffering from a most infectious disease. It is through ignorant persons of this kind that such infectious disease is spread among lying-in women. The Bill would help to prevent this, and, therefore, I would urge the House to favourably consider it.

(5.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am very glad indeed that this measure has been introduced, and the only fault I have to find with it is that it does not extend to Ireland. I do not know the reason unless it be in deference to the views of the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who said recently that Irishmen were responsible for the early marriages in that country.

(5.22.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I consent to the Second Reading of this Bill with a good deal of reluctance. We are almost week by week extending the principle of regulating people's lives. There is a considerable list of professions which are now registered, and the Bills now before the House will, if adopted, largely extend that list. I object to this measure coming into force on the 1st of January next, as it seems to me that women who are now engaged in the profession of midwives should have longer notice to prepare themselves for the stringent examinations which are proposed. There is another point upon which I take exception to the Bill. It provides that every woman who is to be registered must have a good moral character. I object to that most strongly. I do not see that it is more necessary for a woman than for a man to have a good moral character, and until registration under the Medical Act is refused to men who have not a good moral character, I shall insist that women shall be equally free.

(5.24.) SIR W. G. HUNTER (Hackney, Central): I have great pleasure in supporting this Bill. As to the date at which it would come into operation, I may point out that the midwives who are now practising without certificates can receive a certificate from a competent medical man, if they be of good character, and need not pass any examination.

(5.25.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): There are many Bills before the House affecting the liberty of the subject, and I really must rise to prevent the Second Reading of this Bill being agreed to to-day. Last year I had an unfortunate illustration of the evil of hurrying Bills through Parliament. When I was in peril of my life, if the medical man who was attending me had done his duty under the measure passed last Session, the disease from which I was suffering would have been notified, and I should have been liable to have been moved from my room. That might have been beneficial to the general public, but if it had been done I certainly should not have been here to-day to argue against this Bill. I cannot consent to the passing of a measure which provides that, instead of proving her medical capacity, a midwife shall produce a certificate of good moral character, signed by a Magistrate, or a clergyman, or some other minister of religion. This is the first time I have risen to speak at a period when I know that my opposition, if persisted in, must be fatal to a Bill for the Session, and I am excessively reluctant to do so to-day, but this measure is of such a character that I regard it as my duty to take this course.

MR. DIXON HARTLAND rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I can only say that when, after a few minutes' discussion on a question of this kind, the Closure is moved it is a lesson for those who are not in the habit of occupying much of the time of the House. My opposition to this Bill is not an opposition in the nature of obstruction, but is in accordance with principles my advocacy of which has been eagerly applauded from the other side of the House.

It being half after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday, 30th May.

FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 53.)

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I would ask the Lord Advocate when the Government Bill will be introduced?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): It is in course of preparation.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: When will it be introduced?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am unable to fix the date.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is only fair to give notice that I shall object to a Scotch Fishery Bill in future unless it is made to apply to Ireland.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday, 3rd June.

WORKING CLASSES DWELLINGS BILL.

(NO. 279.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection. The Bill applies to the erection of dwellings for the working classes in Dublin as well as in London.

DR. TANNER: It is not that I object to the Bill. I think if Irish Members desire to bring in Bills it is a great deal better that they should bring them in themselves than trust to a Tory Member.

MR. SEXTON: If Irish Members were alone to back their Bills, without the co-operation of Members of other Parties, their chance of passing them would not be so good. If the Bill is not passed Dublin and other parts of Ireland will suffer.

DR. TANNER: I withdraw my objection.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed for to-morrow.

TENANTS' COMPENSATION BILL.

(NO. 259.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I have not the least objection to the principle of this Bill, but my own Bill (the Agricultural Holdings Bill) covers exactly the same object as this. I should be very glad if the President of the Board of Agriculture could see his way to refer both Bills to a Select Committee.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Bill having been just circulated, I have really had no opportunity of giving it the attention which it deserves, and I cannot, therefore, undertake to grant the Committee asked for.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday, 3rd June.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT (1876) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 247.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

BUILDINGS (SANITARY REGISTRATION) BILL.—(No. 165.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

NEW LICENCES (IRELAND) BILL. (NO. 249.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope the Government will consider the Amendments to this Bill, which I am very anxious we should have an opportunity of discussing. But it would be unfair not to allow the trade some opportunity of seeing the Bill before it is passed into law, and I will, therefore, put the Bill down for Wednesday, 11th June.

Committee deferred till Wednesday, 11th June.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 140.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

*MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I do not know whether the Government will accept the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), which will include the external officers.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: What is the connection of the Treasury with this Bill, and does it carry out in any way the recommendation of the Royal Commission?

MR. JACKSON: I understand there is no Treasury question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is purely a county question.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Bill is intended to apply to the same persons as those included in the existing Act providing a certain amount of superannuation. It does not affect the Treasury. The superannuation is intended for those servants who have given their whole time.

MR. SEXTON: The salaries and superannuation which out-door officers receive ought to be relative to their salaries. I cannot for a moment consent to the Bill passing for the superannuation of the internal officers, and excluding the others. I beg to move that you report Progress, Sir.

*MR. JOHNSTON: I have no objection to accepting the Amendment, so far as I am concerned.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I strongly support the hon. Member for West Belfast. These matters come out of the County Rate, which is paid not by the landlord but by the tenants. Every penny of the pensions will come out of their pockets. This is a non-contentious matter, and I hope the Amendment will be accepted.

MR. MACARTNEY: This matter is not non-contentious, and it very nearly wrecked a similar Bill two years ago. I have received very strong objections to the Amendment from my constituents.

*MR. JOHNSTON: I hope the Amendment will not be pressed. It is important that the Bill should be passed. The officials have been longingly looking for it during the last two or three years.

MR. CHANCE: I would point out that there is power on the Motion of the Attorney General, through the Lord Lieutenant, to extend the pension list.

THE CHAIRMAN: This discussion is wholly irregular. The former Amendment to which we agreed struck out certain words, so that it is impossible to add these words.

MR. SEXTON: I think we had better not go further.

Objection being taken to further proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will be kind enough to tell us what the order of business is to-morrow and Friday?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I cannot say what the order of business will be on Friday until to-morrow, and we see what progress we have made. We propose to take the Report of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill first to-morrow, then the Vote on Account, and, if there is time, the Report stage of the Pleuro-Pneumonia Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON: Perhaps the Government will also tell us whether it is their intention to adjourn for Derby Day, because I understand that a very important Bill—the Channel Tunnel Bill—has been put down for that day, and with the sanction of the Government?

Mr. T. M. Healy

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know whether the Government can adjourn on Derby Day. All I can say is, that I never adjourn on Derby Day. I am usually very hard at work on that day. Whether the House will adjourn on Derby Day remains for the House to decide.

MR. MCARTHUR (Leicester): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Western Australia Bill will be taken on Friday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It depends upon whether the Report of the Select Committee has been circulated.

MR. J. MORLEY: I understood distinctly that the right hon. Gentleman would not take it on Friday.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would be unfair to take it on Friday. Hardly sufficient notice could be given.

MR. CONYBEARE: Can the right hon. Gentleman make any further statement about the holidays?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I stated I should mention the holidays to-morrow.

MOTIONS.

SUPERANNUATION (WAR DEPARTMENT) BILL.

On motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the grant of Superannuation allowances and gratuities to certain workmen in the Manufacturing and Store Establishments of the War Department, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Stanhope.

Bill presented, and read first time [Bill 297.]

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.

On motion of Mr. Brodrick, Bill to make better provision for the safety of the public when the lands in or near Aldershot, vested in the Secretary of State for the War Department, are used for Rifle Ranges or other Military purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brodrick and Mr. Secretary Stanhope.

Bill presented, and read first time [Bill 298.]

RULES PUBLICATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Bill to improve the Procedure for making Rules of Court and other Rules, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and Mr. Bruce.

Bill presented, and read first time [Bill 299.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 22nd May, 1890.*REPRESENTATIVE PEER FOR IRELAND.

Lord Carbery—Petition of William Charles Baron Carbery in the Peerage of Ireland, claiming a right to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland; read, and referred to the Lord Chancellor to consider and report thereupon to the House.

ROYAL ASSENT—COMMISSION.

The following Bill received the Royal Assent:—

Commissioners for Oaths Act (1889) Amendment.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF MUTE CHILDREN BILL.

A Bill to amend the law in regard to the education of blind and deaf-mute children in Scotland was presented by the Lord Ker (M. Lothian); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 101.)

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOT-LAND) BILL.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I desire to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can give any information as to the progress of this Bill? It is regarded with great interest in Scotland, and the only news we have of it is that the Lord Advocate in the other House promised that the Second Reading should be taken before Whitsuntide. I am aware, of course, that there is a clog of business in the other House, but I hope my noble Friend will be able to give your Lordships favourable tidings with regard to the Bill.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): My noble Friend has kindly given me private notice of the question he has asked in regard to this Bill. I am almost tempted to answer my noble Friend's question in what is supposed to be Scottish fashion by putting another question in reply. I should be inclined to ask my noble Friend whether, from his great influence, he could give any information as to the progress likely to be made with Government measures in the other House? I have no doubt, however, from the statement which was made by an eminent statesman in East Anglia the other day as to the almost entire absence of obstruction in the other House, that the Second Reading of this Bill will be taken in that House as set down on June 2. With regard to the assurance of the Lord Advocate, it was the intention of the Government to take the Second Reading before Whitsuntide if possible; but in consequence of that which my noble Friend is pleased to call the clog of business in the other House it is now impossible to do so. It is the intention of the Government that the Bill should come on at the earliest possible time, and I hope to be able soon to introduce it in your Lordships' House.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL.

(No. 96.)

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL

now

YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS BILL.

(No. 96.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I will only say a few words upon this Bill. I do not intend to trouble your Lordships by moving any Amendment at this stage, but I will attempt to carry the Amendments I lost in the Standing Committee on the Third Reading. They are three in number, and they are intended, first, to prevent a child convicted of an ordinary, not for a grave, offence from being sent, during the interval between his conviction and his reception in the reformatory to a common gaol. My second object is that there should be places provided to which such children, if sentenced to imprisonment, could be sent, not being a common gaol, but to places for the purpose under Government control, in connection with a few principal reformatories, where the child might pass his sentence, not exceeding three weeks, or in worse cases for longer periods of imprisonment, before being sent to the reformatory school. My third object is that the education of such children after punishment should not be in schools of a penal character retaining the stigma of criminality during the whole of the child's education, and keeping up in the child's mind a sense of criminality which is not only cruel and unjust, but absolutely foolish and obstructive of the object of his being sent to school at all. The fact of there being provisions for child imprisonment in common gaols, and penal education in an amending Bill on the subject, I think, shows to what a small extent the idea on which those institutions have been founded has yet been generally accepted. Both the Commissioners' Report and the answers to Circulars which have been sent round to all the Petty Sessions in the Kingdom are against children of that description being, except in aggravated cases, sent to common gaols, and prove a growing opinion that ordinary child convicts should not be treated as adults. I venture to speak on this matter, for I have had very considerable acquaintance during nearly 50 years with the legislation and the working of these institutions, and with the sort of children who come to them.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): It would be only respectful to the noble Lord who has just spoken that I should say I know no one who has paid more attention to the subject than he has done, or who has had more practical experience with the working of these schools. With the greatest sympathy, however, for the objects he has in view, I am afraid that I shall have to show reasons on the Third Reading why the Government cannot accept the propositions he has mentioned.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, I only desire to say a few words upon the Report being received. I wish to express my great regret that, in consequence of the adoption of the system of Standing Committees, the public are quite unaware of the great pains which your Lordships have bestowed upon this and other kindred Bills. I have not been able myself to take part in the discussion upon them; but I think no one who has attended in those Standing Committees can doubt the minute criticism and care bestowed upon the Bills before them. Valuable, however, as the criticism is which is given in the Standing Committees, I think it would be still more valuable if it could be given in this House, where the Debates would be reported. The public would then have some knowledge of the pains and time which your Lordships have bestowed on these Bills. I make this protest, because I hope the time will come, before long, when the House will see how much it has lost by the system of Standing Committees, and how much it has thrown away by delegating to hole-and-corner meetings of Committees upstairs deliberations which ought to take place in the face of day.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not see any reason for regretting the change which has been made. The misfortune in former times was that discussion did not take place in the House, and the work which is done by these Committees was not done at all. No doubt if the House were to deal with Bills in the same careful way as the Committees deal with them perhaps the same result might happen; but, unhappily, that has not been done. I do not think anybody can doubt that Bills are now carefully revised in a manner which they never were before.

*LORD BRABOURNE: As I was the first to raise the standard of revolt against these Standing Committees I am glad to see that the feeling against them is becoming more widely extended than it was formerly. If it be a good thing that the Standing Committees should continue, I think it is desirable that a rather better record should be made of their proceedings than at present. Some of those proceedings are of great importance. For instance, we were debating the other day upon a question of principle. I was in a considerable minority, and when such is the case I always look forward to the time when that minority will become a majority; but, unfortunately, the record of the proceedings did not give the slightest clue as to what it was that the Committee voted upon. I can only say that the effect of these Standing Committees has, it appears to me, been exactly what I expected upon their being founded. I do not believe that Bills receive a more searching criticism in the Standing Committees than they used to receive in this House before the change was made. On the other hand, it is a change which debars a large number of Peers from taking part in the discussion of business which they are interested in, a change which entails that business being conducted with a certain amount of secrecy, and which, to my mind, has only the effect of spoiling the deliberations in your Lordships' House afterwards; because Peers apparently do not care afterwards to attend in the House and again debate upon the Bills.

*THE EARL OF HARROWBY: I quite agree with what my noble Friends near me have said. These Standing Committees now sit at half-past 3 o'clock, and if these large Committees can sit at that early hour, there is no reason why the House itself should not be summoned at that hour on occasions when there were heavy Bills to go through in Committee, and thus transact in public the work lately delegated to the Standing Committees—the work of which is now practically unrecorded. I have heard in former times most valuable discussions in Committee of the whole House, and these having been formerly recorded by the daily Press, often most valuable communications and suggestions from persons of experience outside were received, which enabled the House, by being thus brought into relations with persons of knowledge and experience regarding the questions in hand, to introduce useful Amendments at later stages—while the public were aware, from the newspaper reports of our discussions, of the reasons for Amendments made by your Lordships. I think the loss is very great, not only to the Public Service, but to the credit of the House, from doing in secret this very useful business of Committee. It has the effect of entirely precluding the public from being aware of what we are doing. I can only hope, in common with a large number of your Lordships who attend these Committees, that the matter may be re-considered hereafter.

*VISCOUNT MIDLETON: My Lords, I entirely concur with what has fallen from my noble Friends. I do think it a very serious matter that the whole of these discussions should be withdrawn from the Committees of the whole House. I think one of the evil results which has not been pointed out by my noble Friends is that the public in general, being unaware of the time which is spent in discussing Bills in these Committees, is under the impression that when the House meets on Tuesdays at half-past 5 o'clock and adjourns, perhaps, at 20 minutes to 6, that is all the work the House has done during the day. They are necessarily unaware, because no Reports are published in the Press, of the fact that an hour and a half or a couple of hours has been devoted previously to the discussion of the very measures which make so little show in the Press reports of the Sittings of the House. It is most important that the feeling should not get abroad that this House is not giving the same full discussion to the matters which come before these Committees as the public have been accustomed to see transacted in public, when there are regular Reports given of the proceedings. I do not wish for a moment to detract from the great zeal and assiduity with which my noble Friends review the subjects which come before the Grand Committees; but those are facts of which the public is wholly unaware, and I think it does not reflect credit upon the proceedings of the House that so much of its business should be transacted behind the scenes. I observe, also, that very few notices of Motions or Questions are ever put down on Tuesdays as on account of the House meeting so late; whatever attendance there may have been before the Grand Committees, there is always a very thin attendance of Peers in the House.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, I do not wish to express any opinion as to whether these Committees have been found to be successful in their operation or not; but they have been found fault with for two reasons: In the first place, it is said that the subjects which are taken into consideration by them are withdrawn from the cognisance of the House. I wish to remind the House that it is entirely in the power of the House to prevent such a withdrawal, and to determine whether a Bill should be sent to a Standing Committee or not upon notice given. After a Bill has been read a second time, a Motion is made by the noble Lord in charge of the Bill to refer it to a Standing Committee, and it is for the House itself to give its assent to the Motion or to refuse it. Upon the Motion to refer the Bill to either the Committee on Law or the Committee for General Purposes, it is quite within the power of the House to decline to accede to it, and in that case the Bill would go before the Committee of the whole House. That evil, therefore, if it be one, may be remedied by the action of the House itself. As to the other fault found, namely, the want of publicity, of which complaint has been made, I can only say that on the first meeting of the Standing Committee the reporters asked leave to be present at the Sittings and to be allowed to report the proceedings; permission was given; but though the report was made on that occasion, we saw no more of the reporters. It is, of course, impossible for the House to ensure publication in the daily newspapers of an adequate report if the editors do not choose to publish it. I am afraid I see no remedy for that. But I think it would be better if greater discrimination were used as to the Bills which are referred to the Standing Committees and those which are left for consideration by the Committee of the whole House.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I quite agree with what has fallen from my noble Friends, and having been always opposed to the system of Grand Committees, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words. With regard to the first objection by my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, that it is quite competent for the House when the Motion is made to refer a Bill to one of the Grand Committees to say that it shall be referred to a Committee of the whole House, I would appeal to my noble Friend himself, and ask him whether there would be the smallest chance in 99 cases out of 100 of that course being taken? In fact, the Grand Committees have been established for the purpose of having all the Bills possible taken before them.

EARL CADOGAN: No.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Well, the greater part of the Bills introduced. I think he would be a bold man who would attempt to take from the cognisance of the Grand Committees the Bills which are proposed to be sent there. That is all I wish to say, but feeling very strongly that the system is a bad one, I did not like to let the matter pass without comment on my part.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps the noble Marquess will allow me to say a word upon this matter before he replies.

Earl Cadogan

Having attended the Committees regularly, I should like to point out that there are two sides to this question. Undoubtedly we have to balance between two evils, or two advantages, whichever you like to call them. On the one hand, there cannot be a doubt that the public get an impression that we are doing nothing because we no longer go through Bills in full Committee when the Debates would obtain publicity. But the deliberations of the House in Committee upon Bills was not generally of a serious character. The Bills went through with very little discussion, and of that even very little appeared in the newspapers. At the present time I do not think it can be denied by anyone who has attended these Committees that the Bills which come before them do receive a more severe and complete examination, and there are several reasons why it should be so. One reason is, that the proceedings are somewhat less formal, and Members of your Lordships' House will get up and make most useful suggestions and observations, who might not make speeches in the House. Again, discussion is facilitated and time saved. I quite agree that the system is on its trial. But I would put this to my noble Friends who take an interest in this matter, that there are two things which are quite distinct—one is to do business, and the other to seem to be doing business. I think we are doing business at the present time. I quite admit that we do not seem to be doing as much business as we are. It will be for the House to determine whether the advantages from the revision of Bills which come before us in Grand Committee are not sufficient to outweigh any disadvantages which the House may suffer from the public, owing to the change in our arrangements, being unaware of the work done. It is not quite true that there is no report made of the proceedings. On two occasions recently, when important discussions took place in Committee—my noble Friend opposite probably had not observed them—there were short reports of the proceedings given in the newspapers.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I only want to point out that nothing has been really withdrawn from the cognisance of the House, and that there has been no abbreviation of the proceedings of the House. I understand that certain of my noble Friends are panting to discuss in Committee these Industrial Schools and Reformatory Bills. But why do not they do it? These Bills have all passed through Committee of the whole House. It was then open to my noble Friends to go through them with all the minuteness of detail which, we understand, was the practice in former times. But they never opened their lips. Was it that they were exhausted with what they had done in Standing Committee, or that they found it was impossible for them to repeat here the arguments used there? There was no reason whatever why the full discussion, which we are told used in past years always to take place in Committee of the whole House, should not have taken place in all its former amplitude of detail. The matter lies entirely in the hands of noble Lords themselves, and depends upon their appreciation of the importance of a measure. But I entirely agree with the noble Lords opposite that there was no discussion on Bills of this class in Committee in former years. Bills of adequate importance were no doubt discussed in Committee, but Bills of a less important character were not discussed in Committee at all. I have gone carefully through the record in Hansard of similar Bills which have been passed in previous years, and have carefully examined that record to see what discussion they received in Committee of the whole House, and I find that before the Standing Committees were appointed Bills of the less important class received very little examination in Committee. What the cause is, why Bills which are so carefully examined in Committee are so perfunctorily discussed in the House, I do not know. There seems to be something in the atmosphere of this House or in its traditions which makes noble Lords unwilling to open their mouths within its walls; but I appeal to the experience of those who have sat constantly through the Debates in this House in former years as to whether our mode of dealing with the committal of Bills in former times was distinguished by that thorough discussion on details the opportunity for which it is now complained has been withdrawn.

Bills reported without further amendment, and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Thursday, the 12th of June next.

SUCK RIVER DRAINAGE (PROVISION OF FUNDS) BILL.—(No. 92.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday, the 9th of June next.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 57.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), with the amendments; Amendments made; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons; and to be printed as amended. (No. 103.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Moved, "That the House do adjourn to Thursday, 5th June."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP: On the Motion for the Adjournment I will take the opportunity of suggesting, with regard to the minute examination of Bills, that if the noble and learned Lord Herschell and the noble Lord who sits near him would bring to bear in this House that minute and valuable criticism which they bring to bear in Committees upstairs we should all benefit very much. I really must say that I think the noble and learned Lord opposite is alike the sole cause and vindication of the system of Standing Committees upstairs.

*LORD BRABOURNE: I wish to call the noble Marquess's attention to one fact. He states that nothing has been withdrawn from the consideration of the House by referring Bills to a Grand Committee. I cannot agree in that. Take, for instance, the General Standing Committee. I am not a Member of that Committee, but I am a Member of the Committee on Law. I was told that if I applied I could be nominated on both Committees. On inquiry I found that the number of Peers which could be added to the other Committee was limited, and when I asked to be put on it I found it was not possible to be done. Only certain noble Lords are Members of that Committee, and the power of discussing such Bills as go before it is practically taken away from those noble Lords who are not Members of that Committee. It is not in human nature to get up in this House and recommence a discussion upon a Bill which one knows has already been fully discussed upstairs.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I would only reply to what my noble Friend has said that that limitation of Members appears to be an error which I think it might be very desirable to correct. I think any such result as he has related was certainly not contemplated and ought not to have taken place. There should be no difficulty in adding to a Grand Committee any noble Lord who desires to be a Member of it. But I cannot admit that it is not in human nature to discuss again in this House a Bill which has been already discussed upstairs in Committee. There are 670 specimens of human nature legislating a little further down the House, and I believe those 670 specimens of human nature find no difficulty in discussing, and discussing at considerable length, Bills which have previously been dealt with upstairs.

On Question agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before Five o'clock, to Thursday, the 5th of June next, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

THE EXTENSION OF THE MALL.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when the extension of the Mall of to Charing Cross, as designed on the plans for the new Admiralty buildings, will be proceeded with?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): The extension of the Mall to Charing Cross will be proceeded with as soon as the new Admiralty buildings are ready to receive the officials, who now occupy houses which will have to be pulled down in order to continue the line of the Mall.

Lord Brabourne

THE BURIAL SERVICE IN WALES.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen a statement contained in Truth of May the 15th, to the effect that the Rev. Thomas Ellis, Rector of Gyffin, near Conway, objected to the burial of a deceased person in the churchyard, in which his wife was interred, unless he were allowed to perform the burial service, the deceased being a non-parishioner; that the rector endeavoured to conduct the service which he desired, while a Dissenting Minister was conducting that which the relatives desired; and that the grave was filled up without either service being completed; whether the contention of the Rector of Gyffin that the law as it now stands authorises a clergyman of the Church of England to act as he did is well founded; and whether, if that is the case, the Government will give facilities for the passing of a measure which will effectually prevent the recurrence of such a scene?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the rector that he objected to the burial on the ground that the deceased was not a parishioner and that the churchyard was not too large for the requirements of the parish. He subsequently gave permission and was distinctly authorised by the relatives of the deceased to conduct the funeral. He received no notice of burial such as the Act of 1880 requires when the relatives wish to dispense with the Church service. He was therefore justified in assuming that he was to conduct the service, and is in no way answerable for the subsequent proceedings, which are much to be regretted, and which might have been avoided if the existing law had been duly observed.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will procure from the several colonies in Australia and New Zealand Reports on the various methods of regulating the liquor traffic in those colonies similar to the Foreign Office Reports Nos. 78 and 154 on Liquor Traffic Legislation in the United States?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State called for this information in August last from Canada, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and reminded the Colonial Governments last March. So far, Queensland is the only colony from which a reply has been received.

SUBALTERN OFFICERS OF THE DRAGOON GUARDS.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the fact that three subaltern officers of the 2nd Dragoon Guards were rejected in their A and B examination, at Rawul Pindi, in November last, although the Board and President agreed that they were well qualified to pass, and exceptionally fitted for their work; whether their rejection arose from the fact that the President refused to sign a clause certifying that the candidates were qualified to command a regiment in the field, it being his opinion that no subaltern officer, however able and industrious, could possibly be so qualified; and why the President of an Examining Board is required to sign such a clause, seeing that no subaltern officer can be expected to comply with its conditions?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): All the examinations, both at home and abroad, are intended to be under the rules laid down in the Queen's Regulations, and they do not require that a subaltern officer should be qualified to command a regiment in the field. No Report has been received from India on the subject, but I will make inquiry about it.

CONSTRUCTION OF INDIAN RAIL- WAYS.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any new policy regarding the raising of funds for the construction of Indian railways has been brought before the Government of India by the Secretary of State; and whether he will lay upon the Table any correspondence connected therewith?

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question I should like to ask him another arising out of it, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he is aware that representations have been made to the Government of India by local Chambers of Commerce and other Representative Bodies, strongly urging the paramount importance, in the interests alike of the native population and of the English merchants, manufacturers, and workmen, of the opening up of the country by the extension of railway communication, and that the desire of these Bodies is for that policy, whether new or old, which will most rapidly and effectually attain that end?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In reply to the question of the hon. Member which appears upon the Paper I can only say that communications as to the policy regarding the raising of funds for the construction of Indian Railways have passed between the Secretary of State and the Government of India, but the correspondence is not yet complete; and, therefore, I cannot make any statement on the subject. With regard to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington (Sir R. Lethbridge), I can only state that the Secretary of State is aware that representations of the character mentioned have been made, and that he will adhere to the policy so often advocated of promoting the extension of Indian Railways as fast as the circumstances will permit.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE—AGE OF CANDIDATES.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, in consequence of the regulations which will presently come into action in regard to the limits of age for candidates for the higher branch of the Indian Civil Service, there have been strong expressions of opinion in the scientific Press and at the Universities that the conditions of the examinations for this Service ought no longer to continue to be relatively so unfavourable to candidates whose studies have been chiefly in science as has hitherto been the case; whether he is aware that a Memorial, signed by 50 distinguished graduates of the University of Cambridge, including several heads of houses, many professors, and a large number of fellows of colleges, has been presented to the Civil Service Commissioners, in which it is pointed out that the position of the science tripos in their University is now practically on an equal footing with the classical or the mathematical tripos, both from its numbers and from the awards assigned by the colleges to those of their members who distinguish themselves therein; and whether he will endeavour to secure that changes shall be made for admission to the Indian Civil Service such as shall secure more equal prospects of success for those whose chief studies have been in science than are at present accorded in these competitions?

SIR J. GORST: I have to thank the hon. Member for postponing this question the other day. The answer to paragraph 1 and 2 of the question is in the affirmative. Such opinions have been expressed, and such a Memorial addressed to the Civil Service Commissioners, although not to the Secretary of State. The answer to the third paragraph is that the new regulations will shortly be issued, and the Secretary of State believes they will satisfy the object which the hon. Member desires.

THE SALT REVENUE IN ORISSA.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he can explain why the control of the Salt Revenue in Orissa has been made over to the Government of Madras, which differs in essential points from that of Bengal, which rules in Orissa; whether he is aware that although the manufacture of salt in Orissa was till recent years one of the staple industries of the districts of Cuttack and Balasore, the possession of salt earth, its manufacture or use has been made a criminal offence in those districts, even though the people wishing to use or manufacture it are willing to pay the duty; and whether, in view of the fact that this prohibition has thrown some 20,000 persons out of employment, and left large tracts of land teeming with salt earth utterly valueless, and that the price of salt has since the introduction of the Madras system increased in Orissa, the whole of what is used being now imported from Liverpool and elsewhere, he will consider the advisability of re-introducing the system under which the salt industry flourished in Orissa, and again allowing the manufacture of Punga salt, subject to the usual duties?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the first paragraph of the question. The control of the Salt Revenue in Orissa has not been made over to the Government of Madras—only the administration. The control continues under the Government of Bengal. The manufacture of salt from salt earth has been prohibited, because it cannot be carried on without a great amount of smuggling. It is expected that the introduction of the Madras system will make salt cheaper and more plentiful, as it has done in Madras; and until the new system has been fully tried the Government will not revert to the old one.

MATMAKING IN PRISONS.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many prisons in England and Wales is the labour of prisoners let out to tender for matmaking, and will he state the names of the prisons and of the firms who hire such labour?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I am informed by the Prison Commissioners that there are 23 prisons in which the mats made are sold at a contract price to the person who furnishes the material and carriage. The list is too long to read in reply to a question, but I will show it to the hon. Member if he will confer with me. With regard to the rest of the question, I must refer the hon. Member to the answer which was given on the 24th of February last.

MR. QUILTER: Arising out of the answer, may I ask the hon. Gentleman if it is not the fact that there is one firm (Messrs. Goodacre & Co.) who contract for the labour of six of Her Majesty's Prisons?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I think the hon. Member had better give me notice of that question.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will consent to furnish a Return showing the various grades of Civil employés under the Ordnance Survey, with the number in each grade, the rate or rates of pay as at present allowed, and the terms or conditions and periods of increase of pay in each grade?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): There are no grades of Civil employés on the Ordnance Survey. The men are engaged on day wages and employed upon a variety of duties in much the same manner as the men employed in the Arsenal and other Government factories. The employés are observers, surveyors, clerks, draughtsmen, photographers, engravers, smiths, carpenters, bookbinders, type and lithographic printers, colourists, and others, who could not well be graded. As there are no grades, it is not possible to give the number in each grade, the rate or rates of pay at present allowed, and the terms or conditions and periods of increase of pay in each grade. A Return could be prepared showing the numbers employed on each of the several duties of the Survey, with their present rates of pay, and the maximum rate for highly-skilled labour in each of those duties. It would, however, involve much clerical labour, and I doubt if it would be of much practical value.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Can the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a statement showing the different ranks or classes of the men employed under the Ordnance Survey, whether the employment is permanent or temporary, and the rates of pay?

MR. CHAPLIN: I will consider the question.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM IN MANCHESTER.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is true that a builder, who had a Government contract for building repairs in Manchester, is an absconding bankrupt, and had been paying a lower rate of wages to the workmen engaged than was customary in Manchester; and what steps are taken to ascertain the respectability of firms before giving them contracts?

MR. PLUNKET: It is true that the builder, who held the contract for the Board's ordinary works and repairs in Manchester, has become a bankrupt and is understood to have absconded. The rates of wages paid by him to his workmen did not come under the cognisance of the Board. No representation on the subject was ever made to the Board by the men. Full inquiries are made locally by the Board's officers as to the position of firms before any tender is accepted. In this case such inquiries were made two years ago, and the result appeared at the time satisfactory.

*MR. C. GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Am I to infer that the Government allow their contractors to occupy the position of sweaters?

MR. PLUNKET: I do not think the hon. Gentleman has a right to infer anything of the kind.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Did I not understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no inquiry is made as to the rate of wages, but only as to the respectability of the firm?

MR. PLUNKET: The contractor sends in a tender for certain work as a whole.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Is the tender the sole thing looked to, and not the position of the men who do the work for the Government?

MR. PLUNKET: The whole question of contracts has been referred to a Departmental Committee.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: When are we likely to have the Report of the Committee?

MR. PLUNKET: I cannot say exactly.

THE PONTEFRACT HIGHWAY BOARD.

MR. AUSTIN (York, W.R., Osgoldcross): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to a recent election of Way-Wardens to the Pontefract Highway Board, when two ratepayers were duly elected for the Ackworth district; whether it is true, as stated, that they can lawfully sit, but are not entitled to exercise voting power; and whether he will take steps to rectify this anomaly in the constitution of these Boards by a Bill to abolish any property qualification that may exist?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have no information as to the facts with regard to the election of Way-Wardens in the case of the highway district to which reference is made in the question. I communicated with the clerk to the Highway Board when notice of the question was given, but have not as yet received any reply. I infer from the question that the two ratepayers alluded to were not qualified for election, as required by the Statute. Any person living in the parish, or any adjoining parish, and having an estate in houses or lands within the parish, in his own right, or in right of his wife, of the annual value of £10, or a personal estate of the value of £100, or being the occupying tenant of houses or lands of the annual value of £20, whether resident within the parish or in any adjoining parish, is eligible for election. I cannot hold out any expectation that the Government will be able to introduce a Bill during the present Session dealing with the property qualification in these cases.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the fact that, in view of the proposed abolition of the duties in the United States on sugar below No. 16, Dutch standard, considerable opposition on the part of the sugar refiners of that country has arisen, because the intended protective duty of nearly £2 per ton against refined sugar imported from abroad would probably be insufficient to allow the American refiners to compete on equal terms with such imported refined sugar from European countries where State bounties are granted; and whether, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government would again invite the Government of the United States to join the Sugar Convention?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): No Reports relative to this alleged opposition have been received at the Foreign Office. It is not by any means certain in what shape the provisions of the Tariff Bill now under discussion will finally be settled by Congress. We have no ground for thinking that a renewed invitation to the United States Government to join in a Convention on this subject would be successful.

THE IMMIGRATION COMMITTEE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to carry out the recommendations of the Immigration Committee of 1889; and what measures have been taken to ensure the Return by the masters of incoming vessels of the number of aliens on board, as provided by the Act 6 Will. 4, c. 11, s. 2?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member is aware that a somewhat similar question was answered on the 16th inst. by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, who explained what steps were being taken to procure statistical information at the ports, both at home and abroad, under the powers given by the Alien Act. The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have given instructions to their officers at all ports where alien steerage and deck passengers are likely to arrive to require from the masters of vessels declarations of aliens, as provided by the Act. The officers of Customs have also been instructed to send monthly to the Board of Trade a Return of the number of aliens arriving here, as shown by the Ships' Reports. The Foreign Office has also been requested to instruct Her Majesty's Consuls resident on the Continent to report any information they may obtain as to the emigration of destitute persons to the United Kingdom.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Do they send in Reports?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; I believe they do.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware whether any steps are being taken to enforce the other provisions of the Alien Act in reference to steerage and deck passengers?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Why do the Government enforce one part of the Statute, and dispense with the rest?

MR. MATTHEWS: There is no dispensation that I am aware of. The information which the House and the public desire is being collected.

MINING RIGHTS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the mining rights, with easements of wood, water, and grazing, west of the Limpopo River, from the Transvaal border to a boundary five miles west of the Notwane, its tributary, over an area extending 20 miles north and south, have been conceded by Sechele, Chief of the Bakwenas and Barkatlas, to a Mr. James Arthur Nicolls, a British subject; and whether such concession was registered in the office of the Administrator of British Bechuanaland in March or April, 1888?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Sechele, the Chief of the Bakwenas, gave a concession to Mr. Nicolls in the country of his neighbour Lenchwe, the Chief of the Bakhatla. The latter refused to recognise the concession, or allow any work to be done under it. Sir Sidney Shippard intimated to the concessionaires that no pressure would be brought to bear on Lenchwe in their favour, and that, if the Chief persisted in his refusal to allow gold-prospecting in his county, the concessionaires would have no alternative but to abandon their enterprise. A copy of the concession may be in Sir S. Shippard's office, but it has not been "registered" there, if that phrase is intended to imply any recognition of it. Sir S. Shippard's action has been approved by the Secretary of State.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Has such a concession been registered?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir; it could not be registered if it was not granted by a person who had a right to grant it.

CONCESSION IN BECHUANALAND.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a concession of mineral rights over an area of 20 miles square, adjoining the Southern boundary of and within his territory adjacent to Reitfontein, South-West of Lake Ngami, was made by Moremi, Chief of the Western Bamaugwelos, at De Nokane, Tonke River, to certain British subjects in August, 1888; whether the said concession was notified in September, 1888, to Sir Sydney Shippard, Administrator of British Bechuanaland, or to any other British officer; whether the Colonial Office recognise the said concession; and whether any negotiations already completed or now pending with the German Government will directly or indirectly affect this and similar concessions by Moremi or other African Chiefs North of Bechuanaland?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It is believed that some concession of this nature was obtained in 1888, but, if such be the case, it has not been communicated to the Colonial Office, or, so far as is known, to the Bechuanaland Government, and it follows that no recognition has been given by the Colonial Office. As regards the last paragraph of the question, I am unable to give the hon. Member any further answer than that given on Tuesday by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Do the Government adhere to the answer given in this House on the 9th of June, 1888, that the sphere of British influence in that latitude extends to 20 deg. East longitude?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give notice of that question.

POOR RATE DEFAULTERS IN GOVAN.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state how many poor rate defaulters there were in the combination of Govan, Scotland, on the 20th June, 1889; how many of them subsequently paid their rates; what was the amount due on the said date; and what was the amount ultimately lost to the funds of the combination through defaulters during the year; and also the same particulars with regard to the barony and city parishes of Glasgow respectively?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have already given the hon. Member this information, as regards the combination of Govan. In the barony parishes the number of defaulters was 12,624, of whom 626 subsequently paid. The amount due was £1,155 2s. 5½d., and the amount ultimately lost was £1,059 13s. 4½d. In the city parish the figures are respectively 8,780, 228, £879 0s. 3d. and £857 7s. 6d.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any rule in the Postal Service prohibiting a postmaster from being a member of a Town Council?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Baronet I have to state that there is no rule prohibiting a postmaster from being a member of a Town Council in a borough in which he resides, provided his official duties are not interfered with thereby.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Does the same rule apply to Town Councils that have become County Councils under the Local Government Act?

*MR. RAIKES: There is a general rule prohibiting all Civil servants from becoming members of County Councils.

MILITIA DRILL.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the admitted preference of the great majority of Militia commanding officers for the old system of preliminary drill, he will consider the question of allowing the Regulations to be elastic, so that battalions which are unable to obtain recruits under present arrangements may resort to the former plan?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In February last I presented to this House a very valuable Report on the Militia, and at pages 17 to 19 my hon. Friend will find the question of preliminary drill fully discussed. The Regulations allow of preliminary drill when a minimum number of recruits elect to be so drilled; but it is held to be of great importance for recruiting that the option should rest with the men, and from the Report it appears that 80 per cent. of them prefer to drill at the dépôt at a time when work is slack and their wage-earning power at its lowest.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to give notice that, as this question affects very much the interests of recruiting for the Militia in my county, I will direct attention to the question upon the Vote.

SMUGGLING.

MR. NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many seizures of smuggled goods were made by Customs officials in the year 1879 and the year 1889; also the number of seizures made by the Excise officials in the latter year after the smuggled goods had run the gauntlet of the Customs; and what steps he proposes to take to check smuggling, in the interests of legitimate trade and the revenues of the country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The number of seizures of smuggled goods made by Customs officials in 1879 and 1889 were 1,307 and 4,756 respectively, while 157 seizures were further effected by the Excise officials in the latter year, consisting principally of small quantities of tobacco taken from sailors in Liverpool public houses. The increase in the number of seizures is due chiefly to the introduction of new arrangements in 1888 for checking petty smuggling, and it does not appear necessary to add to the measures which have produced so satisfactory a result.

H.M.S. ICARUS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has yet received any Report from Admiral Sir W. Dowell, K.C.B., as to the inquiry held into the conduct of Commander Annesley on board the Icarus; and whether he can state the result of such inquiry?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Report of the Court of Inquiry has been carefully considered by the Admiralty. The investigation was a full one, and both officers and men had every opportunity of giving evidence upon the charges formulated in a letter written by the hon. Gentleman, which placed in a tangible and compact form the various allegations made by certain newspapers against Commander Annesley. Evidence was produced in support of the charge, that a punishment not recognised in the Service had been inflicted upon a writer named Cecil Dean, though it was asserted that the writer had been guilty of grossly insubordinate and mutinous conduct. I have therefore directed a charge to be made on this count against Commander Annesley, to be tried by Court Martial, in order that the whole facts of the case may be elicited. The other charges were either not supported by reliable evidence or were of such a trivial character as not to call for further action.

ZULU AFFAIRS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table the two telegrams of 23rd January and 1st February, 1889, referred to in Sir A. E. Havelock's Despatch of 11th February of that year, on Zulu affairs; and whether he can state exactly what proposal is referred to in the following paragraph of Lord Knutsford's telegram to Sir A. Havelock of 5th February, 1889, which paragraph has been omitted from that telegram as printed in the Blue Book, but appears incidentally elsewhere:—

"In answer to your telegram of the 1st February proposed removal of Dinizulu by force or surreptitiously undesirable," and by whom such a proposal was made?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Dinizulu had appealed to the Privy Council against the validity of the Warrant by which, under Colonial Law, he had been removed for trial in Zululand from Natal, where he was in legal custody. The Secretary of State, by the telegram of January 23, suggested that, under the circumstances, he should be sent back to the custody of the Natal Police. The Governor, in reply, stated in the telegram of February 1st that there was no way of sending him back except by force or surreptitiously, and asked whether it was wished that that course should be taken. It is fair to the Governor to state that he did not advocate this step; and the answer to his question was given in the negative, as quoted by my hon. Friend. The telegrams contained other confidential matters, and were not intended for publication. No action was taken upon the suggestion I have mentioned, which was in any event unnecessary; for as Her Majesty's Government were subsequently advised a Warrant, in substance the same as that under which Dinizulu was removed, might lawfully have been made under Section 35 of the Fugitive Offenders Act, so that his grievance was technical and his injury (if any) only nominal. I shall be happy to show the telegrams to my hon. Friend, but it seems unnecessary to publish them.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, since Her Majesty's Government has decided that Admiral Colomb's claims in respect of his invention of flashing signals were barred by a document in the following terms, which he signed in January, 1870, and gave to the then Under Secretary of State for War, Lord Northbrook, in receipt for £500 paid him—

"In discharge of all claims on account of signal arrangements for land service and for joint Naval and Military use," the First Lord has had submitted to him a letter from Lord Northbrook stating that the document was not intended to have the effect attributed to it, and a copy of a legal opinion of Sir H. James, dated February, 1890, in the following terms:—

"Admiral Colomb had not, in either letter or spirit, accepted the sums received by him in full satisfaction of all his claims;"

and whether the question referred to the Treasury for consideration is still the validity of Admiral Colomb's claim for compensation, or solely the amount of such compensation?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Admiral Colomb has submitted to the Admiralty the Papers referred to; but, as the question of this officer's claims is still under consideration, I must decline to make any statement as to the action taken by the Admiralty in the matter.

BETTING TELEGRAMS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to an article in the New York Herald, London edition, of 13th May, on "The Post Office and Betting;" whether he could have a Return prepared showing the proportion of betting telegrams to the rest of the messages conveyed through the Post Office telegraphs; whether it is true that at a great many offices more than half the business done is betting business, and on the days of great races the more legitimate messages are greatly delayed by the mass of telegrams which come pouring into and from betting agencies; and whether he sees his way to prevent this use of the Telegraph Department?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not think it would be desirable or proper for me to discriminate between the different classes of telegrams intrusted to the Post Office for transmission, and I could not, therefore, undertake to prepare such a Return as that asked for. I have no reason to think that what the hon. Member terms "legitimate messages" are delayed by "betting telegrams." Every endeavour is made by the Telegraph Department to meet any pressure of business; but I shall be glad to consider any suggestions which the hon. Member may wish to make to the Department in connection with this subject.

MR. S. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the third paragraph of the question, as to the character of the business at many of the offices, and the delay of the more legitimate business.

*MR. RAIKES: I am not in a position to answer the question. I have already pointed out that it is not in accordance with the duties of the Department to discriminate between business of one kind and another.

THE ALKALI ACT.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the recent establishment in Lancashire, and elsewhere, of an important manufacturing process for the extraction of sulphur from the tank-waste of alkali works, steps will be taken to include this and similar operations involving the production of noxious gases under the provisions of the Alkali Act?

*MR. RITCHIE: This matter has been receiving my attention, and I have given directions for the preparation of a Bill on the subject.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if any steps have as yet been taken to create the body of 43 by which the new and much enlarged Christ's Hospital will in future be administered; and whether it has been arranged that the two Members, each representing the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London respectively, shall be named before the commencement of their long vacations?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HAET DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My right hon. Friend will see that, until the scheme has received Her Majesty's assent in Council, it would be premature to take any such steps or to make any such arrangements as those suggested by the question.

TELEGRAMS AT RAILWAY STATIONS.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will give his consent to the issue of a Return of the names of all Railway Stations in the United Kingdom at which the Railway Companies undertake to receive telegrams for transmission from the public; and, if not, whether he will give instructions that a list of all such Railway Stations shall be published in future editions of the Postal Guide?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not think such a Return as that asked for by the hon. Member would be of public utility; but I shall be happy to consider whether the information already given in pages 33 to 122 of the Post Office Guide cannot be made more complete in this respect. I may mention that the Index to Bradshaw's Guide shows all the stations at which public telegraph business is transacted on behalf of the Postmaster General.

MISSION STATIONS ON LAKE NYASSA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether information has reached him that the Mission Stations of the Free Church of Scotland and the London Missionary Society at Bandawé and other stations northward on Lake Nyassa have received no mails or letters since October 1889; whether those mails have been detained by the Portuguese Authorities at Quilimane; and whether representations will be made to the Portuguese Government to prevent the detention of mails in the future?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Owing to the recent disturbed condition of certain portions of territory in the regions mentioned postal irregularities must have occurred; but Her Majesty's Government have no information directly bearing out the statement made in the hon. Member's question. The matter will, however, be inquired into.

GREECE—NEW TARIFF.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the fiscal changes which have been arranged for in the Convention with the Kingdom of Greece will come into operation; and whether the reductions in the tariff on imported articles, conceded by the Greek Government, as explained in the Budget speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will be limited to British productions, or whether the like advantages will be enjoyed by any other countries under the "most favoured nation" conditions?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The British duty on currants was reduced on May 1. I believe that the reciprocal reductions in the Greek tariff came into force a day or two later. Those reductions will apply also to the importations from other countries which have a right under Treaty to the privileges of the most favoured nation, and which do not enjoy similar terms by separate Conventions. But the articles in the Greek tariff selected for reduction were those which are imported in the largest measure from this country, and upon which, according to those best informed, the greatest benefit would be conferred on British trade.

WESTMINSTER HALL.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it has been brought to his notice that, last Monday night, a heavy piece of a stone heraldic animal suddenly fell from the exterior of this building close to the entrance to Westminster Hall, in Old Palace Yard; that, not many days ago, a portion of the ornamental stonework fell close to the Members' Entrance; and that another portion of the stonework was detached in New Palace Yard; and whether, in view of the danger to the lives and limbs of Members and others from such accidents, he will cause an investigation to be made into the condition of the exterior ornamental stonework?

MR. PLUNKET: It is true that a piece of stone which formed the shoulder of the Unicorn at St. Stephen's Entrance fell on Monday night last. An examination shows that there had been a defect (technically called a "vent") in the stone which would not be easily seen when in position. This portion of the building was examined and repaired from top to bottom in 1878, and is in good condition with the exception of the two heraldic figures, which have a weather-worn appearance and have evidently been carved out of soft stone. These figures will be renewed within the present year. It is also the fact that a piece of the ornamental stonework at the entrance of the Star Chamber Court fell a few days since. Steps have already been taken for an examination and repair of these portions of the building during the Whitsuntide Recess. A complete examination and repair of the whole of the stone work of the Palace is in progress, and upwards of three-fourths of it has been finished, the workmen being at present engaged on the Victoria Tower. I may, however, observe that in a highly ornamental structure, such as the Houses of Parliament, it is impossible to discover every defect that may exist in the carved stonework, however carefully the examination may be made.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the architect of this extremely ugly new building has been retained for the science and art building in Dublin?

[No reply was given.]

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there have been complaints of the annoyance caused by the firing, by the Naval Reserve, of heavy guns on the shore at New Brighton, Liverpool; whether he is aware that as the result of the firing serious damage has been done to property in the neighbourhood; and whether, if on inquiry he finds these complaints to be well founded, he will take steps to have the firing carried on further westward on the coast, where no annoyance would result?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Royal Naval Reserve are in the habit of practising from a nine pounder field gun from the beach at New Brighton, but no complaints on the subject have reached the Admiralty. It seems improbable that the firing of a gun of this size, whose maximum charge of powder is under 2 lbs., could inflict serious damage to property in the vicinity, but I have directed an inquiry to be made into the circumstances.

THE BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the evidence of the Chairman of the Board of Customs before the Commission on Civil Establishments, that three Surveyor Generals of Customs were necessary to carry out the duties of that Department, and provision for this number is made in the Estimates, in filling up the vacant office, due regard will be given to the practical experience in Custom House work of the officers in the out-door department of that Service?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): My hon. Friend may rely that if it be found necessary to make an appointment to the post mentioned the Commissioners of Customs will give due regard to all the qualifications necessary to ensure the selection of the most efficient officers.

BREACHES OF THE FACTORY ACTS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make inquiries into alleged breaches of the Factory Acts in the West Drayton and Iver brickfields, whereby men are compelled to work without meal hours?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Inspector of Factories that no complaints have reached him. If the matter complained of relates to the employment of men only, it would not be within the scope of the Factory Act, which in no way interferes with the labour of men, and their hours of meals.

TUBERCULOSIS.

MR. J. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that during the last few months, in the greater number of the cities and towns in the country, the carcasses of animals found to have been affected, however slightly, with tuberculosis are now condemned as unfit for human food, although the scientific inquiry which the Government is now instituting will probably occupy many months; and whether, in view of the fact that under this system the loss to the butchers is the same as if it had been already determined that such meat is harmful as food, the Government will consider the question of compensating the butchers whose carcasses are destroyed before the inquiry has been completed?

DR. FARQUHARSON: Has the inquiry mentioned in the question yet been held, and on what lines is it to be carried on?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am aware that it has been stated that carcasses of animals affected by tuberculosis are condemned as unfit for human food, although I have no official information on the subject. I am afraid I cannot come under any engagement such as that asked for in the latter portion of the question. As the hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware, the Government are not empowered to award compensation in such cases.

IRELAND—MR. GEORGE SANDES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. George Sandes, late J.P. for the County of Kerry, is Receiver, under an order of Judges Monro and Boyd, for the estates of The Fitzmaurice, G. E. Collis, esquire, The O'Donohue, and of other gentlemen; and whether it is contemplated to remove him from these Receiverships, in view of the fact that he has been removed from the Magistracy?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The appointment and removal of Receivers under the Land Judges' Court is vested in the Court, and the Executive Government have no right to make any communication to the Judges with regard to the exercise of their judicial functions.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. BYRNE (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 24th April last the Land Commissioners (No. 6 Sub-Commission), whilst inspecting holdings on the Greaves Cathrew Estate at Dunard, Baltinglass Union, County Wicklow, drove the landlord and his bailiff from holding to holding on the Commissioners' car, although they were visiting the lands in their judicial and official capacity; that, although the tenant gave evidence as to value and produced an experienced valuer, the landlord elected not to do so; whether the judicial rents fixed by Land Commissioners on the holdings of Francis and Thomas Redding were 22½ and 47½ per cent. over the Government valuation; whether the rents on the Bookey estate, adjoining Reddings' land, were reduced to from 35 to 50 per cent. below the Government valuation; and, if he can explain this difference in the judicial rents on adjoining estates?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners report that the Assistant Commissioners who inspected the holdings on Mr. Graves Cathrew's property at Donard state that as Mr. Cathrew had no conveyance they, after inspecting one holding, asked him to accept a seat on their car to the other holdings, which were some distance off. They did so in order to save the time which would have been lost by driving on and waiting for Mr. Cathrew. It was getting late and they had other holdings to inspect. The Commissioners think that the Assistant Commissioners, under the circumstances, acted properly in giving Mr. Cathrew a seat on the car. The Assistant Commissioners, having heard the evidence in Court, and inspected the holdings, and considered all the circumstances of the case, fixed what they considered fair rents. The Commissioners cannot enter into any statement concerning the judicial rents fixed by the Assistant Commissioners or by themselves in Court in the exercise of judicial functions.

MR. BYRNE: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the proceeding of the Commissioners was a proper one? Acting as they were as Judges, was it right that they should favour either one side or the other?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is asking for an expression of opinion which is not within the limits of a question.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is it not usual on such occasions for the landlord to provide himself with a car? Is it upon record that the Sub-Commissioners ever gave a tenant such a ride upon a car?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that such questions are made a matter of record.

LIGHT RAILWAYS IN DONEGAL.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commission appointed by the Board of Works to inquire into schemes for light railways in County Donegal agreed to a unanimous Report; and, if not, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the minority Report?

MR. JACKSON; I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question until tomorrow.

NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that, on the 21st April last, when Father Humphry stood talking to Mr. Gill, of Nenagh (in streets of New Tipperary), the policeman, who is alleged to have told them rudely to "move on," and was asked his name, gave the name of Moran, though his true name is Leonard; did he refuse to say where he was stationed, and why; what are the regulations of the Force as to giving their name and address when asked; is it the fact that, on the 22nd April, a policeman followed Father Humphry and whistled after him in an insulting manner, and refused to give his name, but on another occasion gave it as Wilson Williams, though in a prosecution in Court swore his name was William Welsh; has the duty been especially assigned to this constable, William Welsh, to walk by Father Humphry's side and keep step with him, whilst another constable walks a few feet behind keeping step with them; and, what is the name of the second constable?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On April 22nd Constable Leonard told the rev. gentleman to move away, he having spoken to the constable in an insulting manner when he was in the discharge of his duty. The clergyman did not ask the constable for his name, nor did the latter give a false name, nor refuse to state where he was stationed. There is no rule requiring a constable to give his name and address when asked, but it is customary to do so when a reasonable request is made for it. The statement in paragraph 4 of the question is not a fact. On the 21st April Constable Wilson was spoken to by Father Humphry for, as alleged, whistling after him, and on that occasion when the rev. gentleman asked him for his name he declined to give it, stating that the allegation was not the case. On that occasion the constable was engaged on duty unconnected with the rev. gentleman. On another occasion when he was on engaged on duty connected with the rev. gentleman he gave his proper name. He never swore in any Court that his name was Walsh. The rev. gentleman was watched by the police because he was believed to be engaged in promoting the illegal practice of boycotting in Tipperary. The constable referred to in the last paragraph appeared to be Dempsey.

MR. SCHWANN: Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to assert that Father Humphry is taking active steps to incite the tenants against the payment of rent in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The rev. gentleman has written a letter to the papers admitting it.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): If a constable refuses to give his name, will steps be taken to require him to do so?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I imagine that if a case were brought before the Police Authorities, in which a constable refused to give his name when asked to do so, under reasonable circumstances, they would deal with it.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consent to the Irish Constabulary being numbered as they are in Belfast and Dublin?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A similar question was put to me the other day, and I said the matter had often come on for discussion in this House without a decision being arrived at. It is impossible to discuss it now at question time.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. J. O'CONNOR: If Father Humphry is engaged in illegal proceedings, why has he not been prosecuted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Father Humphry will, no doubt, be prosecuted if sufficient evidence is laid before the Attorney General.

MR. SCHWANN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the first paragraph of my question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that on the 22nd, not 21st, April, the constable concerned was Constable Leonard, who, as I have already stated, was not asked his name. On 24th April Constable Moran was asked his name and gave it. He does not appear to have been asked his name on the 21st or 22nd April.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to give notice that in the course of the evening I will call attention to the whole of these proceedings.

THE ATHY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause of the delay on the part of the Local Government Board in sanctioning the appointment made, so far back as the 26th of March last, by the Athy Board of Guardians, of a sub-sanitary officer for Castledermot?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The delay arose owing to a subsequent proposal from the Board of Guardians to constitute Castledermot a relief district, in which case, according to the usual practice, the relief officer would probably have become the sanitary sub-officer. The Local Government Board having decided that the proposed change in the relief districts should not be made, the question of the appointment of the sanitary sub-officer for Castledermot is now being proceeded with.

STATUE OF THOMAS DAVIES.

MR. MAHONY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will take steps to procure and place in the new Science and Art Buildings in Dublin a work of national and historical interest, namely, the statue in white marble of Thomas Davis, executed by Foley, formerly in the custody of the Royal Dublin Society, and at present suffering great injury from exposure to the weather in the grounds of the Mount Jerome Cemetery, Dublin?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that this statue is at present in the charge of the authorities of Mount Jerome Cemetery; if they are willing to hand it over to the Science and Art Museum, my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education informs me that he will be glad to provide a place for it.

MR. MAHONY: Will the right hon. Gentleman use his influence in endeavouring to obtain this statue in order to preserve it?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid that I have no influence with the authorities of the cemetery.

THE BANN DRAINAGE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Bann Drainage Bill will be introduced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that, in the present state of public business, I am not in a position to give the hon. and learned Gentleman the information he asks for.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did not this Bill form part of the remedial policy of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government certainly believed it to be part of a remedial policy. If the hon. and learned Gentleman desires to know why it has not already been passed I think he had better ask his friends.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why has it not been introduced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Experience has shown that there is very little use in introducing Bills unless there is some prospect of passing them. The opposition they meet with usually renders that result impossible.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This Bill was introduced two years ago. Why have the Government brought in later Bills, such as the Land Purchase Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

GRIEVANCES IN TOBAGO.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a Petition has been received by the Secretary of State for the Colonies from landowners and others in the Island of Tobago, praying that an independent Commission of Judges should inquire into grievances which they allege to have arisen in Tobago in consequence of recent judicial decisions in that island, some of which, they complain, are in direct contravention of the Metayer Ordinance of 1888; and, if so, whether any action will be taken in consequence of that Petition; and whether a Copy of the Petition will be laid upon the Table of the House?

(4.30.) BARON H. DE WORMS: No such Petition has been received, but the Secretary of State has received from persons in England connected with Tobago a copy of a Petition from planters and other persons in Tobago to the Queen in Council, complaining of recent judicial decisions in that island, which has not yet been received from the colony. The attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to the great amount of recent litigation in Tobago, in connection with the Metayer system, and he has instructed the Governor of the colony to appoint a Commission to inquire into the working of the system. Until a Petition is received it would be premature to say whether any action will be taken upon it, or whether it will be laid before the House.

THE INCIDENCE OF TAXATION.

MR. S. EVANS: I desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Select Committee which he undertook on Tuesday should be appointed to inquire into the comparative incidence of taxation in Ireland and Scotland will also be empowered to inquire into such incidence in Wales, so as to have a complete comparison of the incidence of taxation in the four countries which constitute the United Kingdom?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not propose to refer any questions to the Committee as to Wales separately from the rest of the Kingdom.

MR. S. EVANS: May I ask whether there are any reasons why Wales should not be treated separately?

MR. GOSCHEN: Wales has never been treated in that manner. But if Wales were, for fiscal purposes, treated as not being a part of England, I should think that Welshmen would very much regret it.

SOUTH AFRICA.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R. Barnsley): May I ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, under existing arrangements, the country of Bamangwato, in South Africa, is within the sphere of British influence; whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of information that Moremi, the ruler of that country, has granted concessions to British subjects owing to that fact; and whether Her Majesty's Government have received any communication from Mr. Arthur James Nicolls on the subject; and, if so, what answer have they sent to him?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The country of the Bamangwato, Khama's tribe, is under British protection and influence. Moremi, chief of the Batawana, residing near Lake Ngami, has granted concessions to British subjects. There is no official information as to whether Moremi was influenced by the belief that his country was under British influence when he gave these concessions. Mr. Nicolls and his partners have communicated through their attorneys in South Africa with the High Commissioner on the subject, but no answer has yet been returned to them.

NOTIFICATION OF INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

MR. BRUNNER: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board how many Sanitary Authorities have adopted "The Notification of Infectious Diseases Act, 1889;" and what is the total number of Sanitary Authorities?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Board have been informed that 469 Urban Sanitary Authorities, 331 Rural Sanitary Authorities, and 18 Port Sanitary Authorities have adopted the Notification of Infectious Diseases Act, 1889. This makes a total of 818 Authorities who have adopted the Act. The total number of urban, rural, and port sanitary districts is 1,624. The population, according to the Census of 1881, of the districts in which the Act is in force, exclusive of the Metropolis, is 15,463,000. There are also 56 towns, with a population of 3,751,000, where, under the provisions of local Acts, the system of notification is in operation. The result is that out of a total population, according to the Census of 1881, of 25,970,000 the population subject to a system of notification is now 19,214,000.

MR. BRUNNER: May I ask whether there is any hope that the Act will be made compulsory throughout the country next Session?

*MR. RITCHIE: No doubt the time will arrive when it must be considered whether the Act ought not to be made compulsory; but I doubt whether we should be justified in making the system compulsory so soon after the passing of the Act.

CAPTAIN PLUNKETT'S CIRCULAR.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to a Circular issued by the late Captain Plunkett, Divisional Commissioner for Munster, to District Inspectors Royal Irish Constabulary, of which the following is an extract, as regards publicans:—

"D.I. Boycotting.

In any prominent case of boycotting in your district, especially in a case where the person boycotted is under police protection, the proper steps to take are:—

- I. Get person boycotted to consent to go with police and demand supplies from those who have refused or are likely to refuse him, and more especially if such person refusing is a publican:
- II. If he consents send with him one or two intelligent policemen with instructions to note carefully anything said and done:—

will he inquire from the Irish Office why "publicans" were directed to be singled out for prosecution; and will the special directions as regards licensed traders now be withdrawn?

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. and learned Member will realise that the matters referred to in the question are not such as in any way come within the jurisdiction of my Department, and therefore I cannot give him any information with regard to them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I ask the right hon. Gentleman the question, because of its bearing on the Licensing Bill. Publicans in Ireland are to be singled out for prosecution, according to this circular, and may lose all right to compensation.

*MR. RITCHIE: As I have frequently said, the Bill makes no alteration whatever in the position of holders of licences. They may lose their licences under the existing law for offences such as the hon. Member refers to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to use his influence with the Irish Government to get a stop put to the special prosecution of publicans referred to in this circular, in view of the introduction of this Bill, which, at any rate, favours the publicans of England and Scotland? Why should publicans in Ireland be singled out for prosecution any more than they are in England?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Irish publicans will be in no way worse off than the English publicans. In each case, if there was cause of complaint, there would have to be a representation made against renewal of licence.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY STAFF.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I desire to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, can he now give, as regards the pay of Ordnance Survey Staff, the percentage of increases to staff employed, and average rate of increase, during the past three years, i.e., 1887, 1888, and 1889, and the same information for 1884, 1885, and 1886?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have inquired further into this matter, but the headquarters of the Ordnance Survey Office being in Southampton, I have not yet been able to procure the information the hon. Member desires. I have asked, however, for a Return, which I expect to receive shortly, and which I hope will contain all the information he asks for.

EMBOSSED STAMPS ON ENVELOPES.

VISCOUNT GRIMSTON (Herts, St. Alban's): I wish to ask the Postmaster General if he can (with the view of saving hon. Members the trouble of affixing postage stamps to the large number of letters which they write in the House of Commons) see his way to authorise the issue, from the Post Office in the House, of envelopes embossed with stamps of the more generally employed values, to be purchaseable by them at the face value of the stamp, the envelope being included without charge?

*MR. RAIKES: I am already in communication with the authorities of the House with a view, if possible, to the adoption of some arrangement which would practically meet the wishes of my noble Friend.

RAILWAY BOYCOTTING IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, now that the station-master at Carrickmacross has surrendered the evicted house, and the boycott has in consequence been removed from the Great Northern Local Railway, the Government will mark their sense of the restoration of peace in the town by releasing the three gentlemen sentenced to six months' imprisonment for boycotting the line?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that it is the case that the railway company having completed the building of the house for their station master he has removed into it from the house which he had temporarily occupied during its construction. The Lord Lieutenant is not aware of anything in the circumstances of the case of the prisoners referred to which would suggest any interference with the course of the law.

ALLOTMENTS.

MR. CUST (Lincolnshire, Grantham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, in view of Section 211 (1.) (b.), and Section 230 of "The Public Health Act, 1875," whereby it is enacted that the

"Occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds," shall be assessed to the general district rate in an urban district, or to a separate rate levied in respect of special expenses within the meaning of the said Act in a rural district, in the proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value or rateable value of such land, whether allotments are or are not included among the lands to which the aforesaid exemptions apply?

*MR. RITCHIE: The question whether an allotment should be assessed on a reduced assessment is one of law, and one which can only be determined with reference to the actual circumstances with regard to the particular allotment. Any claim to exemption must depend on whether or not the land is so used as to bring it within the terms of the sections alluded to in the Public Health Act, which confers the exemption on the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds.

SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): I desire to ask the Lord Advocate when the Secretary for Scotland expects to be able to give an answer to the deputation of Scottish Members who waited on him on 28th March on the subject of the School Board Elections (Scotland) Bill?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Shortly after Whitsuntide.

THE WHITSUNTIDE MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is correct that there are to be combined naval and military manœuvres off Dover during Whitsuntide; if so, will he state how many ships and troops are to be employed, and the intended nature of the tactics; and whether it is true that the Channel and reserve squadrons are to take part in the combined German naval and military manœuvres which it is reported are to be held in the Baltic in the autumn?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Arrangements have been made for carrying out certain manœuvres in the neighbourhood of Dover at Whitsuntide, in which the Navy will take part; and four of Her Majesty's ships have been ordered to be at Dover on the 26th inst. I am unable to say what the exact nature of the combined operations will be, but the senior naval officer has received directions to communicate with the officer commanding the South-Eastern District as to the part the Navy are to take on the occasion. There is no truth in the rumours alluded to in the second part of the question.

REFUSAL OF BAIL IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it was on the ground of apprehended flight that Colonel Longbourne, R.M., refused bail to Mr. Rice and Mr. Kent at Fermoy, pending the hearing at Petty Sessions of a charge of intimidating an emergency man; and whether Resident

Mr. Ritchie

Magistrates will be instructed not to refuse bail, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, except on this ground, especially when the Queen's Bench is not sitting?

MR. MADDEN: The facts are, I am informed, as follows:—The Resident Magistrate offered to accept bail in regard to both the defendants named if they would give an undertaking, pending their trial, not to interfere with the men who were working on certain lands; on their refusing to give this undertaking bail was refused. The Executive Government cannot interfere with the discretion of Magistrates in the manner suggested in the concluding portion of the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why were summonses not issued against these gentlemen, one of whom was a brother of the Local Crown Prosecutor?

MR. MADDEN: That does not arise out of my answer. If the hon. Member desires information on this matter I will obtain it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will call attention to this matter on the Vote on Account.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, as Article 11 of the Sugar Convention provides that—"The Convention shall be ratified and the ratifications exchanged in London on the 1st of August, 1890, or sooner, if possible," there is any intention of ratification without the consent of Parliament, as an implied condition in the earlier part of the same article; and whether the Convention ceases to exist if the ratifications are not interchanged at the specified date?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is always open to Powers to ratify a Treaty they have made, even though the day fixed for ratification shall have passed by.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any intention on the part of the Government to ratify the Convention without the consent of Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think liberty must be reserved by Her Majesty's Government to act as they may think necessary in the event of other Powers ratifying the Convention.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: Am I to infer from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government consider themselves at liberty to ratify the Convention without the consent of Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must have notice of that question.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: It is on the Paper.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will look into the matter.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I will put the question down for to-morrow.

WALES AND PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.

MR. S. EVANS: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that Parliament has legislated separately for the Principality in various cases, and also of the importance of obtaining accurate statistical information for such legislation and for other purposes, the Government will take steps to secure that all Returns made to Parliament shall in future, so far as is practicable, give statistics for Wales and Monmouthshire under distinct and separate heads from those for England, as is now done in the cases of Scotland and Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware of the statistical information the hon. Member refers to, nor am I aware of any occasion for making a change in the form in which Returns are presented to the House. It is our desire to give the fullest information to the House as to every part of the United Kingdom.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. LABOUCHEE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state in what order, and when, the different Classes of Votes will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Class V. will be taken first after the Recess—that is to say, if there be a Recess. I cannot say more now.

MR. J. MORLEY: When will the Committee stage of the Local Taxation Bill be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will not be taken before the Thursday after the House meets—that is, if there should be a holiday.

REPORTED OUTRAGE IN CRETE.

MR. SCHWANN: I would ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the telegram of the 8th of May on the case of Hassan Bey, who outraged a Greek girl, which said,

“That as the Russian Consul has made a protest against the action taken by the Magistrate in the matter, it is highly probable that the Magistrate has dealt with the case in an unsatisfactory manner;”

and whether he will ascertain whether the case has been tried already and judgment given, what that judgment was, and what was the tenour of the protest of the Russian Consul?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member has already called my attention to the telegram in question. I must say that Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to investigate the truth of the Daily News telegrams. Her Majesty's Consul received special instructions to watch the proceedings in the case referred to, and had there been an apparent intention to evade its just examination he would have reported accordingly.

FREE POSTAGE OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. LENG: I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether, seeing that the income of the Post Office, according to the Official Statement for the year ended 31st March, 1890, was £9,450,000, and the expenditure only £5,463,204, showing a surplus of £3,986,796, he will, in view of the desirableness of disseminating amongst the constituencies accurate political information, arrange for Members of Parliament sending to their constituents Parliamentary Papers, not exceeding 4oz. weight, without payment of postage?

*MR. RAIKES: I have no power to grant any hon. Member the privilege of franking Parliamentary Papers or any other correspondence, the franking privilege having been abrogated by the Penny Postage Act, 3 and 4 Vic., cap. 96. But I shall be willing to consider if any additional facilities can be given for the dissemination of Parliamentary Papers.

AUSTRALIAN DEFENCE.

MR. BARTLEY (for Mr. HANBURY): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether, under Article 9 of the Australasian agreement as to the completion for sea of certain men-of-war, it is provided that—

"This agreement shall be considered to become actually binding between the Imperial and the several Colonial Governments so soon as the Colonial Legislatures shall have passed Acts appropriating the necessary funds;"

and whether all, or which, of the Colonial Governments concerned have passed such Acts?

BARON H. DE WORMS: My hon. Friend has correctly interpreted the terms of the article in question. All the Colonial Governments concerned—Queensland excepted—have passed the necessary Acts.

THE PROPOSED MEETING AT NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. J. MORLEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether there is any truth in the report that a meeting which is proposed to be held next Sunday at Tipperary, and which is to be addressed by the hon. Members for Cork and East Mayo, is to be proclaimed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no very full details of the objects of the meeting before me yet, but certainly if an open air meeting is to be held in Tipperary in its present condition, and inflammatory speeches are likely to be made, it will, undoubtedly, lead to intimidation, and any such meeting must be stopped.

MR. J. MORLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state what is the difference between a meeting addressed by Irish Members and a meeting addressed by English Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what meeting the hon. Gentleman alludes to. If he alludes, as perhaps he does, to the banquet at New Tipperary, I may remind him that that banquet did not take place in the open air. [An hon. MEMBER: There was a meeting outside.] Two meetings which were to have been addressed by the hon. Member for North-East Cork were stopped for the reason I have just indicated to the House. If the right hon. Gentleman asks me generally what is the difference between meetings addressed by Irish Members and meetings addressed by English Members, I should say that the result in the one case is to produce intimidation, and that in the other the result is nil.

MR. J. MORLEY: Are we to understand that the deciding consideration is whether a meeting is held in the open air or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Undoubtedly that is one of the considerations. The difference between these mass meetings in the open air, at which inflammatory speeches are delivered, and a meeting held in a building is, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, vital.

MR. PICTON: I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that before the banquet at New Tipperary a very large open air meeting was held, at which speeches of the usual character were made.

DR. TANNER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers I should like to ask him whether detectives were sent from Dublin to attend the open air meeting by orders from the Castle?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. My recollection is that the promoters of the new Tipperary demonstration were informed that there was not to be an open air meeting, and that as far as their programme consisted of a banquet, it would not be interfered with.

MR. GILL: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the open air meeting took place in the public square of New Tipperary, that an address was presented by the people of that town to the English visitors, and to the Irish Members of Parliament there attending, and that this address was replied to, amongst others, by the hon. Member for Leicester, the hon. Member for North-East Cork, the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, and several mayors from other parts of Ireland; and whether, that being the case, the right hon. Gentlemen still persists in denying that a public meeting took place in the open-air in new Tipperary on April 12th?

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Before that is answered may I ask whether the same laws apply to public meetings in Ireland as well as England, because, if they do, there will be no difficulty in suppressing the meeting, as we shall have the Front Bench on this side in accord with the Government.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Is it not the case that it is only a short time since this meeting took place, and that since then there has been nothing dangerous in the state of New Tipperary; and is it just to declare that the effect of speeches made there by English ladies and gentlemen was nil?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for thinking that the speeches referred to ought to be described by a more complimentary term than that which fell from me. So far as I can recollect the meeting referred to was very subsidiary to the main feature of the demonstration, which was the banquet.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether I am to be allowed to address my constituents on Sunday or not?

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not yet said whether the proclamation of the meeting has, or has not, been determined upon. I may say that not only my hon. Friend below me, but the four Members for Tipperary County intend to use this meeting for the purpose of discussing public affairs with their constituents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman must be well aware that there is no objection whatever to hon. Members addressing their constituents on public affairs. There is an objection, however, to large open air demonstrations in a town where intimidation has existed, and does exist to a large extent, where vile crimes are constantly perpetrated, and where there is reasonable ground for supposing that such a meeting would add to the evils I have indicated. I am afraid that an open air meeting held at the time mentioned, even though it might be addressed by the hon. Member for Tipperary, could not be permitted.

MR. SEXTON: One more question. Did the great open air meeting held lately have any bad consequences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already told the hon. Gentleman that what he describes as an open air meeting was not represented to me as such at all. The authorities distinctly gave notice that if the programme of the demonstration, the chief item of which was a banquet, was adhered to it would not be interfered with.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I wish to know whether the intimidation to which the right hon. Gentleman alludes consists of a peaceable surrender to the Member for Hunts of his property, and a peaceable taking possession of property which had been legally acquired?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The surrender referred to was not necessarily an act of intimidation, but may have been the result of an act of intimidation.

THE GOVERNMENT LICENSING PROPOSALS.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board a question, of which I have given him private notice. Can he give us any further particulars as to the public meeting at Bridgeton, Glasgow, at which he yesterday informed the House, a Resolution in favour of his proposals was passed, as no Report of such meeting appears in any of the Glasgow newspapers, and as inquiries at the police offices and the public halls have failed to elicit any information regarding it?

*MR. RITCHIE: I received a telegram in the House shortly before I rose. I have no information beyond that which was conveyed to me in that telegram, which is as follows:—

"At public meeting in Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, held in Mechanics' Hall to-day, it was unanimously resolved that this meeting heartily support the Government proposals as contained in Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill as it now stands.

WILLIAM BROWN,

88, John Street,

Bridgeton."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. J. MORLEY: I suppose we can understand that no business will be taken to-morrow, except the adjournment?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid I must ask the House to do some business. We must take the Inland Revenue Bill and the Report of the Committee on the Vote on Account, and in the event of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill not having been passed, and the Allotments Bill not having been completed, we shall ask the House to take those measures before we proceed with further business. We shall also have to ask the House to consent to a Motion for giving up the whole of Tuesdays and Fridays after Whitsuntide for Government business.

MR. J. MORLEY: Assuming that all this be got through, the right hon. Gentleman's apprehensions as to our not having a holiday, I suppose, will fall through.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope I may not be supposed to be seeking to impose conditions on the House; I am rather seeking to further business, and to meet the convenience of the House. In the event of the Motion of which I have given notice being accepted, I shall move for an adjournment until Monday, the 2nd of June.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With regard to the Contagious Diseases Bill I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to take it before Whitsuntide.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am sanguine enough to hope that a very few minutes' discussion will be enough for that Bill, and I must ask the House, if possible, to take it. It cannot come into operation for a considerable time, and it is of great importance that we should get it passed.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Is it intended to take the Savings Banks Bill to-night?

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope it may be possible to take the Second Reading, and to refer the Bill to a Committee; but, of course, I will not ask the House to read it a second time unless there is a general disposition to do so.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has given consideration, as promised, to the application I made to him to exempt from the rule respecting morning sittings the First Tuesday after the Holidays?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have given great consideration to that request, and I feel great sympathy with hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in the question which is to be considered on that day; but I would point out that it is an abstract Resolution, and my advice to the hon. Gentleman will be to use the facilities the House gives for bringing in a Bill.

MR. WOODALL: The right hon. Gentleman is aware of the difficulties that attend private Members' Bills after

Mr. W. H. Smith

Whitsuntide. Will he afford facilities for the discussion of the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly not; but I would advise the hon. Member to procure a good position for a Bill of the kind next Session.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): In the event of the Government taking all the time of private Members after Whitsuntide will the right hon. Gentleman revert to the ordinary hours of meeting on Tuesdays and Fridays?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that would be for the convenience of the House, and we will do our best to meet the convenience of the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland Division): The right hon. Gentleman promised some days ago that he would make inquiries as to whether he would be able to bring influence to bear on his supporters to allow the Second Reading of the School Board for London Superannuations Bill. Has the right hon. Gentleman succeeded in doing so?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say I have not been able to communicate with my hon. Friends.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL—ATTACK ON THE POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS COMMITTEE.

*(5.5.) MR. G. W. HASTINGS (Worcestershire, E.): Mr. Speaker, I wish, if the House will allow me, to occupy a short portion of its time. As Chairman of the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee of this House it is, I may say, and at the wish and with the support of that Committee, that I am about to make a few remarks. I have, Sir, brought up to your Table the Report of that Committee on the Bill which has been promoted by the Dublin Corporation, and in that Report we have endeavoured to give good reasons for all we have done with regard to that Bill and the recommendations we have made; but, Sir, it is necessary for me, as Chairman of the Committee, unfortunately, to say something on one portion of that Bill. One of the clauses of the Bill related to a road called the Blackrock Road, which runs from the city of Dublin to the Harbour of Kingstown. In former days that was the only means of communication between Dublin and Kingstown, and Parliament then, no doubt with good reason, thought fit to require the Corporation of the City of Dublin to pay one-third of the cost of the maintenance of that road. The Bill purported to relieve the Corporation from that obligation. The Committee went most carefully into the whole case. They heard a number of witnesses. They considered the evidence most carefully, and, finally, looking to the altered circumstances of the case, that a railway is now running from Dublin to Kingstown, and also a tramway, that the passenger traffic, instead of going along the road, is now carried by the tramway and the railway, both of which contribute materially to the rates of the townships of Pembroke and Blackrock, through which the road passes, they came to the conclusion that it was no longer equitable to require the City of Dublin to contribute to the maintenance of the road, and they passed a clause through Committee relieving the City of Dublin from that obligation. Well, now, the House must allow me just to say that the Police and the Sanitary Regulation Bills Committee is not an ordinary Private Bill Committee. It consists of 11 members nominated by the Committee of Selection, and these 11 members have been drawn impartially by the Committee of Selection from all the Parties in this House. Many of its members have had considerable experience in the work. I may say that I have served continuously on the Committee since the Session of 1882, and have now for four Sessions been its Chairman. We may, therefore, venture to claim some knowledge of the subject with which we deal and some experience in dealing with it. We arrived at the conclusion we did as to the Blackrock Road, not only after a long investigation—the Committee sat more than a month on the Bill—but with a most earnest desire to do justice, and only justice, between the parties whose interests were involved in the case. It was, therefore, with great surprise the Committee had laid before them by one of its members, the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) a report in the Irish Times of a meeting of the Blackrock Commissioners, in which the statements I will read to the House were made. I may observe that at the meeting of the Commissioners the chair was occupied by

Mr. Wigham, who was one of the witnesses before the Committee, who had the fullest opportunity of stating everything he knew, and of explaining his views, and who was treated with every possible courtesy by the members of the Committee. I find at this meeting of the Blackrock Commissioners, amongst other things, this was stated—

“The Committee—that is, the Committee of the Commissioners in opposition to the Bill—reported that they had pointed out this hardship and injustice towards the township of Blackrock to the Committee of the House of Commons, but without success, mainly, as they believe, through the action of one of that Committee, Mr. Thomas Sexton, M.P., who, although a promoter of the Bill, did not scruple to sit on the Committee, acting, in fact, as judge in his own case, and cross-examining the witnesses in a hostile manner, and even interfering with counsel as to their manner of conducting the case.”

The Commissioners then proceeded to pass two Resolutions upon it, which were these:—

“That the Commissioners hereby accord their emphatic protest against the action taken by one of the members of the Committee, Mr. Thomas Sexton, M.P., who although one of the promoters of the Bill, sat on the Committee, and used his influence as a member of the Committee in inducing them to pass the clauses which he himself approved, and acted, in fact, as an advocate for the promoters of the Bill, cross-examining the witnesses for the opposition in a hostile manner.”

And it was further resolved—

“That the Commissioners are of opinion that such conduct on the part of Mr. Sexton having unfairly prejudiced the minds of the Committee the Bill should not be allowed to become law with the several clauses against which the Commissioners petitioned standing in the form passed by the Committee, and that petitions to this effect be prepared and presented to both Houses of Parliament, and that copies of this Resolution be sent to Her Majesty's Government.”

I will relieve the House from any fear, if they have any, that any Question of Privilege is raised. I beg to say on behalf of the Committee that we should not trouble ourselves to raise any Question of Privilege on such statements as these. We believe the Committee, which has now been in existence some seven or eight years, commands the confidence of the House, and the House knows that the Members of the Committee only do their best to deal justly with all the interests concerned, and to pass Bills which are likely to be for the public good. The Committee wish me to lay before the House what are the real facts of the case. I am anxious to say at once that if there is anyone responsible for the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) sitting upon the Committee while the Dublin Corporation Bill was before it, I am ready to plead guilty to being that person, for the hon. Member, who was nominated to the Committee by the Committee of Selection, came to me before the Dublin Corporation Bill was called on, and said that if I objected in any way to his sitting on the Committee he was ready and willing to retire. I told him I was not aware of any objection, according to the Rules of the House, to his sitting on the Committee, and I have fortified myself on that point by taking the opinion of those who are the best authorities on the question, the Officials of this House, and I believe the hon. Member for West Belfast had also consulted the Chairman of Committees of the House (Mr. Courtney), who, Mr. Speaker, during your lamented indisposition, was at the time acting as Deputy Speaker, and he also consulted your counsel, and received from both authorities the statement that there was nothing to prevent him acting on the Committee. I would wish to add this, and I add it in the presence and hearing of the other Members of the Committee, that, in my opinion, the conduct of the hon. Member for West Belfast on our Committee during the whole progress of the Bill was such as to do him honour and to raise him in the estimation of the Committee. There was not one word said by him to which it was possible to take any objection, and with regard to the statement as to his hostilely cross-examining witnesses, and, in fact, imputing to him the taking of some violent course in the matter, I give it the most emphatic contradiction. If the hon. Member had acted thus, it would have been my duty, as Chairman of the Committee, to have called him to order, and I should have done so. I never had any other feeling with regard to his conduct throughout the whole progress of the Bill than that he was rendering most material service to the Committee by the course which he took on the various clauses of the Bill. But with regard to the imputation on the Committee, that they passed these clauses because they were influenced by the hon. Member for West Belfast, I would ask the House to consider what it means. We are a Committee of 11, and it means that 10 men of honour, and I hope of some reputation, Members of this House, did what they ought not to do, and were in some way led aside from the path of duty by the representations of one single Member of the Committee. On this question of the Blackrock Road, as on others, I think the House ought to know that the room having been cleared at the conclusion of the evidence, and the matter having been considered, that no opinion whatever was expressed by the hon. Member for West Belfast until I and the other Members of the Committee had given our own opinions upon it. I was, in fact, asked by the Committee to say, as their Chairman, what I thought would be a right decision on the question, and I gave that opinion, and in that opinion the Committee unanimously agreed. It was a unanimous opinion on the part of that Committee, and then we are told—I have no doubt by very respectable gentlemen acting as Commissioners for the Blackrock township—that we passed this clause only because we were unduly influenced by the hon. Member for West Belfast. I hope the House will understand that there is not one word of truth in any of these assertions, which may or may not be made for a purpose as to the ulterior fate of the Bill. The whole of the Committee were unanimous on the point. We are entirely of opinion we did what was right in the matter, and we hope, so far as we are concerned, that the Bill as it stands may pass into law.

(5.20.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I want to thank the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and the Committee, for the references to myself which, acting as their spokesman, he has made. I wish to inform the House that, before the Dublin Corporation Bill came to be dealt with by the Select Committee, I learned, to my surprise, of the rumour that some Petitioners against the Bill intended to object to my presence on the Committee upon the ground that, in my capacity as Lord Mayor of Dublin, I had acted as a promoter of the Bill. I regarded the objection as unsubstantial—even fanciful—because everyone, friend as well as opponent, was well aware I had no personal interest whatever in the Bill or in any proposal in the Bill. In fact, I had no interest except such as an Irish Representative should feel in a Bill concerning the welfare of a Municipality in Ireland, and although acting as promoter, in point of fact, I had acted as moderator between the several parties to the Bill, and had promoted the progress of the Bill by making concessions for the benefits of those parties. However, Sir, I determined there should be no doubt on the matter. I was unable to consult the highest authority in the House, because at the time the question arose you, Sir, happened to be absent through illness. I submitted the case to the Deputy Chairman of the House. I had also the advantage of the opinion of the highest legal authority, the Counsel to Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chandos Leigh. I further consulted the right hon. Baronet opposite, the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir John Mowbray), the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, by which the Committee was nominated to serve, and, finally, I laid the question before the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Select Committee with a view of directing my action by any expression of the hon. Gentleman or any section of the Committee. Now, Sir, all these authorities agreed that there was no rule and no arrangement of this House adverse to my acting on the Committee in question, and that there was no reason why I should not serve. Some of these authorities pointed out to me that my local knowledge would be of use to that Committee, and they also directed my attention to the fact that this Select Committee, like every other Select Committee of the House, is deliberately constituted for the purpose of affording representation to all parties. Now, Sir, the Bill in question is an Irish Bill, opposed in regard to its main proposals by the Irish Government. I was the only Irish Member upon the Committee of 11. I could not ascertain upon inquiry that any of my Colleagues acquainted with Municipal affairs could spare the requisite time for giving attention to this Bill, which occupied in the result more than a dozen sittings of the Committee; and, although it would have been more convenient and more agreeable to me to retire from the Committee, heavily pressed as I was by other and more imperative Parliamentary duties, I felt that I had no option in the public interest but to serve. Now, Sir, in regard to my action on the Committee the House has heard the Chairman. I have only to add that I acted throughout for the public interest according to my sense of duty, precisely as I should act, I hope, in the case of any other private Bill in the case of any [proceedings in the House. If there be one Assembly in the world more competent than any other to judge of the ignorance and of the foolish character of the suggestion that I could exert any special influence upon a Committee composed of men of all Parties in this House, that Assembly is the House of Commons itself. But, Sir, as a matter of fact, I never for a moment—and this concludes the case—I never for a moment was under any inducement to attempt to exert any influence whatever. Let me impress upon the House that every decision of the Committee in regard to every point in which these Commissioners were concerned, and in regard to every other point of the least importance whatever—that every decision of the Committee was unanimous. The Committee was composed of six supporters of the Government, four Members of the Liberal Opposition, and myself, a solitary Irish Nationalist. Every decision, as I have said, was absolutely unanimous. When the room was cleared, each discussion was initiated by the declaration of the Chairman's views. Every decision confirmed the view put forward by the Chairman. My humble share in the Judicial work of the Committee was limited to concurrence in the judgment agreed upon by every other Member without exception. With regard to the personal attack upon myself, it is so manifestly inspired by motives entitled to no respect, by mere irrational vexation and spite of disappointed Petitioners, that it does not cause me the least concern. For my part, I should not ask or wish the House to give the slightest trouble on the personal aspect of the case, but I have to say that the case has another and a graver aspect which cannot be so easily ignored. A Committee of this House has been wantonly attacked for the patient and impartial discharge of a Judicial function. The House itself, through its Committee, has been attacked, and in my humble judgment there has been a gross contempt of the High Court of Parliament—a contempt committed, Sir, not by ignorant or irresponsible individuals, not committed by inadvertence of mere spoken words, but contempt committed by a Public Body in formal and deliberate resolution. I also consider that the resolution of these Commissioners, in which they determined to continue their attack by false aspersions on the judgment of the Committee, to continue that attack in the form of the Petition to the House of Lords, is as gross and wanton an attack on the privileges of this House as was ever known. However, it is not for me, it is for Members of this House of more experience and of greater authority, Members not personally concerned in this case, to say what steps, if any, this House should take to mark its sense of a most impudent attempt to discredit the judgment of a Committee of this House in the exercise of a Judicial function, and to prejudice the proceedings on this Bill when it goes before the House of Lords.

(5.25.) SIR JOHN MOWBRAY (Oxford University): I desire to add a few words to what has fallen from the hon. Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings) and the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). I wish to assure the House that the Member for West Belfast came to me in the most straightforward way and said he wished to know from me, as Chairman of the Committee of Selection, whether he would be at liberty to take part in the Committee on this Bill. I told him that I considered that this Committee, consisting as it did of 11 Members elected from all parts of the House, differed entirely from an ordinary Private Bill Committee, and that I, for one, could see no objection to the hon. Member acting on it. But I went further. I said that I would consult the Committee of Selection and take their opinion. I did take their opinion. We had a large number present, and the Members were unanimously of opinion that there could be no objection to the hon. Member sitting. I communicated the opinion to him, and said I was sure from my knowledge of his character that the hon. Gentleman would not take part in any question if he was interested in it personally. The hon. Member was placed on the Committee three Parliaments ago, when I was sitting opposite. He has been an experienced Member of the Committee, and we thought it was quite right that he should sit on the Committee.

*(5.27.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps the House will kindly allow me to say only a few words on this question. I am sure the House will feel, whatever political differences divide Members in this House, when they are engaged in political struggles, that we are always anxious to maintain the honour and reputation of any Member of this House when he is unjustly attacked. I am sure the House will see from the remarks which have fallen from the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings) and the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that the latter hon. Member has acted with the most scrupulous sense of honour, and entirely in the public interest all through this matter. I do not wish to follow the hon. Gentleman as to the view and opinions he has expressed with regard to the contempt of Parliament to which he refers. No doubt a contempt of Parliament has been committed by the Commissioners in question. But I think we gain more by treating such observations with the indifference which a consciousness of having done our duty in this House enables us to maintain. If I may express my own judgment on the matter it is that a great mistake has been committed by the Commissioners themselves. But they certainly will not prejudice the passage of the Bill in the other House by the course they have taken. I trust the incident will now be permitted to close with the assurance that the whole House considers that the hon. Member for West Belfast did nothing more than his duty.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to,—

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 302.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.*CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—(No. 231.)

As amended, considered.

(5.31.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to commend to the kind notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Amendment which stands in my name. The object is to secure a more equitable distribution of the Liquor Tax, by securing that it is divided among the three countries proportionately to the yield. Such a proposal as this ought to have been made by the Government rather than by a private Member. The only reason given for this distribution of the tax is, that it is on the same lines as the distribution of the Probate Duties proceeded with two years ago. But had the course proposed in regard to this Spirit Duty been adopted in relation to the Probate Duty it would have been violently opposed. There are fundamental differences between the two cases. The Probate Duty was strictly an Imperial subvention, while we are now discussing a purely local Budget. Although the fresh burden imposed forms part of an Imperial tax, collected for convenience by Imperial officers, it is in reality a local impost, intended to be devoted to local purposes by a Local Authority. Again, so far as Ireland and Scotland are concerned the charge upon them in connection with this duty is an excessive one and, indeed, an oppressive one. I admit that if the Scotch and Irish contribution to the Imperial Revenue were no more than it ought to be the question would be far more difficult, and I would not feel entitled to move this Amendment. But the condition is not satisfied. Scotland's contribution is excessive, and Ireland's grievously burdensome, and, therefore, I contend that the re-distribution of the proceeds of the additional tax should be in proportion to the yield from each. By the plan proposed under this Bill you are putting a burden on the poorer countries for the benefit of the richer one. Then the local uses of the three countries do not correspond; each country has its own independent local uses, and it is just, therefore, that the money raised by special taxation in one country should be devoted in unimpaired proportions to the local uses of that country. Ireland and Scotland are entitled to liberal treatment in this matter, because not only is their contribution to the Imperial Revenue already excessive, but the new Spirit Tax will be especially burdensome in their case. The Government ought not to forget that Scotland and Ireland are being made victims in consequence of local wants felt in England. If it had not been for the complaints and demands of the English County Councils the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not have found it necessary to propose this tax at all. Therefore, England having been the cause of the imposition of the tax, she ought to be satisfied if she receives what England yields and no more. How will the proposed division work? The Returns which have been presented by the Secretary to the Treasury, whom I congratulate upon his new dignity—for I think the dignities of the State have not been often so well earned—show how England, Scotland, and Ireland will fare if the proceeds of the duties are divided as the Government propose. England will pay £953,000 towards the duty, and will receive £1,043,000. That is to say, as a result of the imposition of a tax particularly burdensome on Scotland and Ireland—a tax imposed, too, for the convenience of England, that country will gain £90,000 at the expense of Scotland and Ireland. Scotland will pay £196,000 and receive back only £142,000, thus losing £53,000; and Ireland will pay £154,000, and receive back nearly £117,000, losing £37,000 by the transaction. This matter ought, I contend, to be considered separately from the question of the duty of two years ago. Scotland is only moderately wealthy as compared with England, and Ireland is by far the poorest of the three countries; yet they are to lose by this transaction. I may frankly say that I do not view these Returns with unqualified confidence, for, according to another calculation, which appears to be very exact, Ireland will pay £195,000 and lose £77,000.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): What figures does the hon. Member refer to?

MR. SEXTON: They are contained in a Report in a wine and spirit paper, and evidently are the result of very careful calculations.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have not seen that article, but the author may possibly have fallen into the error of not distinguishing between duty paid on spirits manufactured and the duty on spirits consumed in each country.

MR. SEXTON: I shall be happy to send the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the article. I think, on examining it, he will find that this distinction is drawn, and that the conclusion arrived at is that Ireland, as a consumer, will pay £195,000 towards this tax. Now, if the Government give a favourable reception to the Amendment I have to propose, I shall be disposed to accept the basis of incidence stated in the first page of the Return pending the inquiry which, I am glad to say, we are to have regarding the financial relations of the three countries. I may, however, point out that the basis of incidence according to notes in this Return, is founded on principles favourable to the English and unfavourable to the Irish account. For example, the incidence of taxation in regard to foreign spirits is calculated upon the basis of collection, which is not a sound basis. Consumption is the sound basis, and the calculation according to collection is favourable to England and unfavourable to Ireland. Then the calculation in the case of beer is based on the consumption which is favourable to England. I think we ought to have further statistics upon which to form an opinion. If, as has been suggested in the article I have referred to, Ireland will contribute £190,000 in the shape of the new Spirit Duty, her loss will be £155,000, and that is not a sum which ought to be jauntily disposed of. I am not pressing this Amendment on purely technical grounds; I do so rather upon the large principles of liberal and equitable dealing towards Ireland. These are facts which constitute a special hardship in the Irish case, and which justify an appeal to the liberality of the Government. The incidence of this liquor tax is particularly hard. You are going to hypothecate the whole of Ireland's share for the purposes of a guarantee, which we entirely disapprove, and you are going to lock up and render completely useless a sum of £40,000 for a period the duration of which we cannot limit. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give a favourable consideration to the subject-matter of my Amendment, I will not press it; and if the Government will make that concession it will probably facilitate the progress of business, while it will tend to greatly moderate that feeling of indignation felt in Ireland because you are increasing the burden of the most inequitable tax in your system of finance. If the right hon. Gentleman will go on the principle of giving back to each country what it pays, he will avert conflicts which otherwise will wage around this Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, to leave out from the word "proportions," to the end of the clause, and insert the words "in which they are raised in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(5.53.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member has temperately moved this Amendment, but the Government cannot accept it in the form in which it stands; nor can I see any possible modification of the Amendment which would remove the objections to it. As the Amendment stands it would appropriate this revenue, not according to consumption, but according to collection. That would work gross unfairness, because large quantities of spirits which are made in Scotland and Ireland are consumed in England.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman will have judged from my remarks that I am willing to accept any fair basis.

MR. JACKSON: The difficulty is that it is not possible to get at the exact amount of spirits manufactured in Scotland and Ireland and consumed in England. Some calculations have been made, and the effect, so far as has been ascertained, is that at least £63,000 would be paid in Scotland and £76,000 in Ireland for spirits consumed in England. The hon. Member has sought to separate the proposed tax from the Probate and the Beer Duties on the ground that it is a new tax. But the Beer Tax of last year was also a new tax, and of that Ireland has had the benefit.

MR. SEXTON: How?

MR. JACKSON: It was a tax raised upon an article of ordinary consumption in England, and which was devoted to Imperial purposes. The hon. Member has suggested that Ireland was unfairly treated in the matter of the Beer Duty, but he is mistaken in that. We have taken the best figures at our disposal. In 1886 the quantity of beer exported from Dublin was 390,000 hogsheads, equal to 585,000 barrels; in 1887 it was 405,000 hogsheads, or 608,000 barrels; in 1888 424,000 hogsheads, or 636,000 barrels. On the other hand, it is difficult to estimate the export of beer from England to Ireland, but we have every reason to believe that the figures contained in the Report may be taken as accurate. My right hon. Friend has assented to an inquiry, and that inquiry will show what are the real facts of the case. My right hon. Friend has also said that should it be shown that the basis of distribution adopted is unfavourable to Scotland and Ireland, it will be the duty of the Government to endeavour to meet the justice of the case. If the result of the inquiry is to show that the general system of taxation and finance as between the three countries is unfair towards Scotland and Ireland, it will be the duty of the Government to rectify the system. This my right hon. Friend has undertaken, and in this I really think hon. Members will admit that my right hon. Friend has gone as far as he could be expected to go.

(6.0.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has not touched that part of the speech of my hon. Friend in which he spoke of the basis of the division; he has evaded the whole kernel of my hon. Friend's Amendment. Of course, we receive with satisfaction the explanation of Table 3, relating to the Beer Duty, and I have no doubt, as regards exportation of beer from Ireland to England, the table is correct. But, with regard to the other item in the column—the export of beer from England to Ireland—I think we have reason to question the correctness of the information supplied to the Government, and I hope some more satisfactory information may be forthcoming when next this question comes before us for discussion. It does not lie within my competence to closely follow the figures given from time to time as to the incidence of trade between the two countries, and I should like to have them set forth in a form more easily to follow; but I take the Return of the incidence of taxation supplied to us within the last few days, and I will undertake to prove, as briefly as possible, that on the division based upon the Probate Duty, the allocation of the grant will be most unfair to Scotland and Ireland. I take the figures of collection and consumption, as set forth, without comment or query, from the Return of 1888-9, and, basing the proportion upon these figures, the result works out upon the new tax as follows: England, £891,137; Scotland, £182,371; and Ireland, £146,007. The right hon. Gentleman contends that the new duty should be apportioned on the basis of the division of the Probate Duty; but we contend that this new 6d. tax on an already over-taxed commodity is regarded in Ireland and Scotland with the greatest possible distrust and dislike, and that if it is imposed at all, you are bound, on the principles of justice and equitable treatment, to divide the revenue so raised in the proportions in which it is raised in the three countries, and I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend ought to commend itself to the sense of fair dealing in the House. I do hope that before we proceed to a Division, or press this matter further, we shall have some more satisfactory answer than we have had from the Secretary to the Treasury. These figures I have taken from this Return can be proved by any hon. Member who will employ his industry for half an hour over it, and the figures cannot be controverted, and they show conclusively that England's proportion of the new duty upon the basis of the Return of 1888-9 should be 73, Scotland's 14·9, and Ireland's 12·1; but you are going to divide the money so raised in the proportion of 80, 11, and 9 respectively, so that the loss to Scotland will be 3·1, and to Ireland 3·9, while England gains 7 per cent. We are promised a Committee to inquire into the incidence of taxation and revenue in the three countries, and we welcome that inquiry, believing it will show there has been great fiscal injustice to Ireland; but, pending the result of that inquiry, surely it is not unreasonable to ask that the proceeds should be divisible in the manner proposed by my hon. Friend.

(6.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I regret that this most reasonable proposition is refused by the Government. I give the right hon. Gentleman full credit for the appointment of the Committee, but this Committee cannot touch this money which will be raised. The only influence of the Amendment of my hon. Friend will be that Ireland will get a sum of £70,000, which, taking the Government Return, we are clearly entitled to. The Secretary to the Treasury was well advised in gliding over the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer advanced on a previous occasion, that we are getting more than our share of the Probate Duty. The Government contended in former debate that the reason Ireland does not get her proper share in the new duty is that she has the benefit of the overplus in the Probate Duty; but the Secretary to the Treasury has now only alluded to that by saying it has already been discussed. Now, I would reply to that argument, "Take away your Probate Duty and only tax Ireland on the basis upon which you say the Probate Duty should be given to us; that is, 4½ per cent." But, of course, the Government will not do that.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not quite follow the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I understand the contention is that Ireland contributes 4½ per cent. to the Probate Duty and to the Imperial Revenue, and I say, if that is so, then take this 4½ per cent. as the basis generally of Ireland's contribution to the Imperial Revenue. We should then be saved something like £3,500,000 a year.

*MR. GOSCHEN: We do not make it the basis.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is very difficult to fix you to your basis—very difficult to say under which thimble is the pea. My hon. Friend deserves great credit for the skill with which he has brought the matter forward. For myself, I have no financial ability of any kind, and find great difficulty in even adding up the figures, and will not venture to discuss the matter in the manner my hon. Friend has; but, looking at the arguments like a juror, I am quite capable of appreciating the points, and I say my hon. Friend's argument has not been met. We base ourselves on your own Return; we build on your foundation, and we find this difference between what you raise in Ireland upon spirits and beer and the proportion you return; and when we ask for this difference, you meet us with a reference to the overplus paid on the Probate Duty. Then, I say, withdraw the Probate, and recognise the 4½ per cent. which you say should be the basis of Ireland's contribution to the Imperial Revenue; but still you decline. Now, though I am not capable of undertaking a scientific examination of the figures, I can see that my hon. Friend's argument has not been met. It is some alleviation to our complaints that these financial arrangements will be subjected to examination by a Committee, but that does not deal with our grievance in 1890. Furthermore, let me point out that here, as in many former instances, the injustice that is inflicted upon Ireland arises out of circumstances founded upon the exigencies of England without any reference to the wants of the Sister Country. Because you failed in your Van and Wheel Tax we pay 6d. more per gallon on our whisky in 1890. But we did not get a County Council Bill. Because you have set up County Councils in England and Scotland and need to erect a fiscal system for them, Ireland is called upon to pay this extra taxation! I can quite appreciate your difficulties in attempting to govern Ireland; you cannot do it, and you meet our arguments as to equitable treatment by saying that the whole fiscal arrangements of the three Kingdoms cannot be disarranged, and, sometimes, in an unguarded moment, you advert to the difficulties in setting up a fiscal zone for Ireland. Now, if you simply take the argument of the sword, and impose your taxation upon us, that is intelligible; but if you desert that, and talk about general convenience, we ask how is it that we are always to suffer in the business? While England and Scotland are gainers by a large and generous extension of Local Government, the fact is Ireland, while having no Local Government, has suffered from the extension to the other countries. If the English and Scotch Local Government Acts had not passed, we should not have heard of this extra 6d. upon whisky. We are deprived of Local Government, and we suffer because you get Local Government. I say in all this Budget—I do not accuse the Government of any intention and desire to make it unjust to Ireland, it almost arises out of the necessities of tyranny and under the necessities of the Union—you make your arrangements according to the interests of England, caring nothing about those of Ireland. If ever there was a case to prove the way in which a conquered country can be robbed it is this Budget. We have gained nothing under this Budget except upon tea. I challenge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give in a compendious form the comparative benefits of his Budget proposals to the people of the three countries. He had a surplus, and we ask for £70,000 from that surplus as the proportion of Ireland's contribution towards it. You give us 2d. on tea, but you put 6d. on whisky. We do not get the benefit of the Inhabited House Duty or any other remission under the Budget. It is a fair challenge. Show us in a Return the figures giving in each country the creation and distribution of the surplus. I say the past financial history of England and Ireland since the Debt was consolidated, which I take to be the true point of departure in the matter, should come under the consideration of the Financial Committee, and I am sure it will disclose a long course of fraud and plunder.

*(6.25.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I do not think the argument in the beginning of the speech of the Secretary to the Treasury had that force he seemed to think it possessed. No doubt a certain amount of duty is paid on whisky in Ireland, which whisky is consumed in England; but that does not necessarily prove the unfairness of my hon. Friend's Amendment. I should say consumer and producer have both to be considered; but the interest of the producers is as important as that of the consumer. By the producer, I do not mean merely the distiller, but every man engaged in the trade, who will suffer from the additional taxation on the article produced. Consider these arrangements for a moment as about to be embodied in a Treaty between two nations, two separate Governments. Suppose we were entering into a Treaty of Commerce; do the Government suppose that any Independent State would consent to such terms as they seek to impose upon Ireland? Many English manufacturers come into Ireland, but there is no considerable Excise Duty on any of them. There is an enormous Excise Duty on goods made in Ireland for the purpose of export to England. If Ireland were in the position of Greece, and able to make a bargain with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, she would obtain very different terms. Greece would not take off the duty on English goods until the duty was taken off goods sent here by Greece; and if Ireland were in the same position, she would maintain a duty on English goods until a similar advantage was given by England to goods of her manufacture. Ireland, however, is not in that position, and the Government propose to put an enormous tax on one of the chief articles of Irish manufacture imported into England, although there is practically no tax upon goods exported from England to Ireland. Looking at this matter from an international point of view, as I am entitled to do for the sake of argument, the distribution of the taxation is grossly unfair. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has said that £76,000 of the extra duty will be paid in Ireland on exports exported to England; that is, 1-20th of the duty now paid on whisky exported to England. If we take the amount at 20 times £76,000, we find that £1,520,000 worth is paid in Ireland in the shape of duty on the article manufactured in Ireland and exported to this country. That is a very considerable sum. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has pointed out that it is not by any means the whole of the tax put upon Irish manufactures in this respect, because there is also a large amount of Irish whisky bonded in England on which duty is paid in England, but nevertheless the duty is put upon an article of Irish manufacture. It is difficult to ascertain what the real proportions are; but, broadly speaking, I think the greater part of the whisky manufactured in the North of Ireland has duty paid upon it on the spot, while the greater portion of that which is manufactured in the South of Ireland is exported in bond. We may assume that this £1,520,000 at present paid on whisky exported to England is only one-half the tax which England puts on the main staple of Irish manufactures imported by this country, and I think that this is sufficient to show the great unfairness with which Ireland is treated. I am glad the Government has consented to the appointment of a Committee to arrange, as it were, a Treaty of Commerce between Ireland and England, and we trust that that arrangement will lead to a settlement on more equitable terms than the Government seems willing to consent to adopt. I trust that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) will press this matter to a Division, for, as I have already said, it does seem grossly unfair that Irish manufactures should be taxed to so enormous an extent when goods manufactured in England and exported to Ireland are not taxed at all.

*(6.38.) SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I desire to point out to the House that if the Irish people were only taxed for Imperial purposes in proportion to the amount levied by the Income Tax, the incidence of taxation in that country would be much fairer than it is at present. For if an arrangement were made at the present moment under which Ireland were obliged to raise her present quota of Imperial taxation by a charge under the Income Tax, she would have to raise as much as 5s. 3d. in the £1. This, I venture to say, can be proved to the hilt, that 2s. 6d. in the £1 would suffice for Great Britain; which fact affords a sufficient illustration of the unjust taxation under which the people of Ireland are labouring.

(6.40.) MR. PARNELL (Cork City): Before the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer replies I desire to say that I think some consideration is due to Ireland in regard to the distribution of this money. It is not a sufficient answer to say that the right hon. Gentleman takes as the proportion of the distribution of this extra tax the proportionate amount which Ireland pays to the Imperial Revenue from all sources of taxation. That is not a sufficient answer to us, because we dispute the justice of the proportion we pay to the Imperial Revenue, for, so long as I can remember, Motions have been annually brought forward by Irish Members, in reference to this question, and they have conclusively proved that we in Ireland are paying at least double as much as we ought to pay in proportion to our wealth, a large amount of this extensive contribution being derived from the duty imposed upon spirits. But, Sir, the claim we make to-day is still stronger than our old claim, because this is a tax which is voted, not for Imperial purposes, but for local purposes, and of the total amount Ireland contributes 16·4 per cent. For this contribution the right hon. Gentleman only purposes to give us 5 per cent., and he justifies the wrong he has done because successive Governments have succeeded for years past in wringing from us a taxation utterly disproportioned to our means, and double the amount we ought to pay as compared with England, and "because we have robbed you in the past we have a right to rob you in the future." This proposal is a fresh injustice, added to the already great injustice under which Ireland was suffering. But even if, for the sake of argument, we were to allow the contention of the right hon. Gentleman that Ireland is not being unjustly dealt with in the contributions she makes to the Imperial and general expenditure, we can at least show by the right hon. Gentleman's own figures that we shall only receive one-half of the proceeds of the new tax as compared with the amount we ought to receive. In addition to this, we have to submit to the further outrage that our proportion of the subvention intended for local purposes is to be locked up and not used for any purpose during an indefinite period. I think the figures show for themselves that this is a question on which the Government ought to yield to the claims of Ireland and Scotland. It is an evident injustice that you should use the tax obtained from alcoholic products in Ireland for the relief of local burdens in England, while no portion of it is to be applied to the relief of local burdens in Ireland. Why, I ask, should Ireland not have a fair proportion of this money? Why should you not adjust the relative proportions among the three countries, namely, 61·3 to England, 22·3 to Scotland, and 16·4 to Ireland? I think the claim which has been made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford is a reasonable one. Surely at a time when you are boasting of your policy of justice and equality to Ireland—nay, more than justice, generosity to Ireland—you cannot, with any face, come to this House and ask us to support you in taxing the Irish people to an unfair extent on a special article of Irish manufacture, while at the same time you only propose to give back to Ireland one half of the proceeds of that taxation as compared with what you give to England. I say you have no right to ask this House to support you in this unjust and unequal treatment, which deprives us of our fair share of the tax raised in such large proportions from the chief article of Irish manufacture.

*(6.52.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am glad to hear from the hon. and learned Member for Longford that he acquits the Government of an intention of doing injustice to Ireland in this matter. If there is an injustice to Ireland through the manner in which she is taxed, it would have to be redressed by other means than by drawing a fiscal zone. Hon. Members have spoken of the injustice of the taxation of Ireland, but that subject is too large a matter to be entered upon in a Bill of this kind. In reference to the Committee which I have promised, I do not see what purpose would be served by extending the inquiry as far back as 1817, and, in my opinion, it would be sufficient to inquire into the relative financial position of the three countries as it now exists. The hon. and learned Member for Longford admits, as has always been admitted, that a much larger contribution from the Imperial Revenue goes to Ireland than is proportionately her due. If Ireland contributes more to the Common Fund than she ought to, that is balanced by the fact that she draws more contributions from it in proportion than any other portion of the United Kingdom.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What are they? We never heard of them.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have already given the particulars of those contributions, and shown in respect of education how much per child is paid to Ireland, in comparison with population, as compared with the sums paid to the other portions of the United Kingdom.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why do you not let us manage our own affairs?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Speaking individually, I am in favour of the Irish nation receiving the whole of the grants, and managing education in their own way. Personally, I do not see any objection to that. Coming to the Amendment that has been moved, the hon. and learned Member for Longford has said that, instead of taking 4½ per cent, as the amount of the Probate Duty which Ireland contributes, the Government ought to take as a basis for distribution the whole of the taxation of Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What I said was that the Government have selected an unfair basis.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The basis taken by the Government is 80 per cent. for England, 11 per cent. for Scotland, and 9 per cent. for Ireland. The hon. and learned Member has challenged me to show that Ireland has obtained any benefit whatever under the Budget except under the Tea Duty. Well, there is the Currant Duty

MR. SEXTON: Ireland does not pay more than £5 a year in respect of the Currant Duty.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I expected the hon. Member would say that. The Government has credited Ireland with so much having been paid as its share of the Customs Duty, and is it now to be understood that the whole of the Currant Duty is paid by England and Scotland? If that be the case, I might withdraw the sum of £500,000 from the account, and say that Ireland contributed nothing under that head to the Imperial Revenue. The hon. Member for Belfast questioned the accuracy of the figures of the Government relating to beer and foreign spirits. He maintained that foreign spirits were more consumed in England than in Scotland or Ireland, because in those countries they produced their own spirits. I am unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member. To show hon. Members opposite that I wish to deal fairly with them, I will undertake to have this question of the Beer Duty and the duty on foreign spirits carefully examined into, and if it can be found that our figures are wrong in any respect, and that Ireland has been prejudiced by the distribution we propose, I will move a Supplementary Estimate, the proceeds of which shall be paid to the National School Teachers in Ireland. I propose this in order to rectify any injustice which any error in our figures may have occasioned to Ireland. I must say, however, that I believe our figures are correct. I took the best means I could to have the details prepared with accuracy, but they may be wrong, and therefore it is that I tender this promise to hon. Members opposite. I am unable to accept the Amendment because, in the view of the Government at the present time, the distribution must be made as we propose. But, as I say, if there are any mistakes in our Estimates as to the consumption of foreign spirits or beer I undertake that they shall be remedied, not by striking off anything given to England or Scotland, which would have the effect of disarranging our finance, but by bringing in a Supplementary Estimate in favour of Ireland. This, I think, if not entirely satisfactory to hon. Members opposite, will show them that we have an earnest desire to be fair.

* (7.2.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The so-called concession that the right hon. Gentleman has just announced is the most illogical and absurd proposition that ever came before this House. The Irish Members tell him, as they have been telling him during the course of the last week, that Ireland has been unjustly treated.

* (7.3.) MR. GOSCHEN: I have not made a concession. I do not know whether the hon. Member was in the House during the major portion of my remarks. If not, I will inform him that hon. Members opposite complain that certain figures which we have given are wrong, and whilst I make no concession on the general question, as we maintain our argument so far as the Probate Duties are concerned, what I say is that if the figures should be found to be erroneous we will rectify them, and will do so in the case of Scotland as well as in the case of Ireland.

* (7.4.) DR. CAMERON: The illogical and absurd nature of that proposition springs from the fact that these figures were never the basis of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal at all. Many days after the Budget proposals had been laid before the House the Secretary to the Treasury, replying to attacks which had been made on this particular portion of it, quoted certain figures to show that, on the whole, Scotland and Ireland would receive more than their share of the taxes allocated in aid of local taxation. When challenged for particulars, the Secretary to the Treasury promised us that the figures should be more carefully considered, and given in the form of a Return, and that is the history of the document to which reference has been made, but it was not submitted until some time after the right hon. Gentleman made his Budget speech. The right hon. Gentleman understands logical consequences as well as any one in the House, but I must say that in these Debates he has shown much more power of evasion and ability to drag red herrings across the trail of the argument than desire to meet plain arguments by german and sufficient answers.

* (7.6.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): For my part, in any final settlement of these matters between England and Ireland, I trust there will not be a fiscal zone established between us. What we desire is simply to remedy defects in the present abnormal condition of affairs. I would point out that there would be no difficulty whatever in making a separate estimate of the Revenue from spirits in Ireland, because during the past 25 years we have had a most careful examination instituted there with regard to the importation of arms and ammunition. There would be nothing in the examination of vessels for spirits carried between the two countries which could not be covered by the present system of examination. To show the thorough nature of the search instituted in Irish ports, I may say that, in my own case, after having been on a visit to America, and having brought away with me a few relics from the scene of the battle of Gettysburgh, I had the greatest difficulty in getting them into Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman says we enjoy certain advantages in regard to taxation. Well, we enjoy nothing whatever in the matter of grants we receive. The money we receive for education is given us for a system which is altogether out of accord with the wishes of the people. That for the Constabulary is for a military system, which we hate and abhor. It is necessary, as far as the Government are concerned, that we should have those grants in order to keep up an appearance of fairness; but the Irish people certainly do not "enjoy" them, and we claim to be put upon a footing similar to Scotland.

(7.10.) The House divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 87.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

(7.20.) Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 5, at the end of Clause 9, to insert the words "but nothing in this section shall prevent a person from holding more than one such excise licence in his own name."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. M. HEALY: It seems to me that these words render the original objects of the clause entirely nugatory.

(7.21.) MR. JACKSON: Exception was taken to the clause as it stood. I did not think the objection was a sound one, because I believe the clause really carried out what was intended, but it was thought the words used might be read as preventing an individual taking out more than one licence, and the object of the present Amendment is to make it clear that a person can hold more than one excise licence in his own name. Unless that is made clear the clause would be unworkable in such cases as that of Messrs. Spiers & Pond, and those of Railway Companies. There are excise licences for the sale of Patent medicines, and for the manufacture of playing cards, and the Amendment will make it clear that future licences shall specify upon their faces the premises in which the business is to be carried on.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Is it not the case that Judges have recently made very strong statements from the Bench about the great evil that arises from one person having a number of licences for the sale of drink. It seems very extraordinary that the Government now come forward to give an official sanction to that which is understood to be a grave abuse.

(7.24.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): This Amendment, if passed, would allow a publican to have any number of licensed houses in his own name, and to obtain compensation for licensed houses in different parts of the country whenever he might choose to give them up. It has over and over again been held in Courts of Justice that one of the great securities we have under the present very faulty system for the decent management and proper government of licensed houses is the actual personal supervision of the man to whom the licence is granted. This will be done away with if one man may have a number of licences in different places. The Government are establishing an entirely new principle.

MR. JACKSON: It leaves the law exactly as it stands.

MR. WADDY: Then all the Judges I have ever heard speak about it have been entirely in the wrong.

*(7.27.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I apprehend that the answer of the Government will be that the words "excise licences" cover the clause, and that the publican's licence is not an Excise licence, but a Magistrate's licence. If, however, the Government really intend by the Amendment to allow public house licences to be given in any number to one person, I hope the Amendment will be opposed, not only by every man on this side of the House, but by every Licensing Justice opposite. I would point out that even as regards Excise licences they are granted to grocers for spirits, and the Amendment would allow a big grocer to take out half a dozen spirit licences in half a dozen branch establishments in the same town. I hope such a proposal will be resisted on all sides of the House.

*(7.29.) MR. GOSCHEN : All the Amendment says is, "Nothing in this section shall prevent" &c., and I do not see that it alters the law at all. It really does not authorise a person to hold more than one Excise licence. The Amendment, however, appears to excite some apprehension, and we will not press it.

■ Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.32.) MR. JACKSON : I desire now to move in Clause 14 to omit the words "payment of the allowance is made," and to insert "the certificate is granted." When the Bill was in Committee the question was raised whether it was necessary for the Inland Revenue Officers to have power to enter premises up to the time when payment of the allowance was made. It was suggested that the power should be limited to the time when the certificate was granted, and this Amendment is brought forward with the object of carrying out that suggestion.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 14, page 6, line 19, to omit the words "payment of allowance is made," and to insert the words "the certificate is granted."

Amendment agreed to.

(7.34.) MR. T. M. HEALY : I rise to complain that the Government have given no consideration whatever to the arguments that were put forward respecting Clause 24. I see the English Solicitor General in his place, and I challenge him to define the word "assessment" as used in this section. I say an assessment is a personal assessment, and implies personal responsibilities and liabilities. I raise this question simply in my Imperial capacity. It is not a National question. The clause may produce possible injustice to the executors and administrators of poor persons. It is a remarkable thing that though we have had the Income Tax for the last 50 years it has never hitherto struck anybody that such a clause was necessary.

Mr. Winterbotham

I think it is a pity that, for the sake of stopping some twopenny-halfpenny leakage which may have accrued to the Treasury, such a clause should be inserted. It would be some mitigation of the section if it were confined to estates of over £1,000 a year. I would point out that Income Tax is collected sometimes at Petty Sessions, sometimes at Quarter Sessions, sometimes in the High Court. You might, however, almost have a Chancery suit arising under this clause, which has been drawn in the most unscientific and hasty manner. Of course, the Crown debt, which is here referred to, will take precedence of all other debts; but notwithstanding that the Government wish to come down upon the poor widow, perhaps, or the orphan, and make them personally liable, the assessment might be an assessment made at a time when the man was prosperous, and his circumstances at the date of his death might be very different. I can really see that there are endless objections to this clause—it is thorny with objections. The Government seem to be in a needless hurry in this matter. We have been half a century without this clause; surely, therefore, it can wait until the next Budget. The clause is inadequately drawn—it is drawn without regard to what are really the facts and problems of life. It is drawn without regard to the difficulties of the situation, and I certainly think it might very easily be dropped out of the Bill. How is it going to work? You surely would not follow a man into his grave, and make a poor woman pay a few pounds which might have been due in the man's lifetime. I can see the difficulties in this clause are endless, but in this House nothing small receives consideration. There is no way of getting anything little attended to. I do not suppose the Government will give this matter the smallest attention, but I beg to move the omission of the clause.

Amendment proposed, "to omit Clause 24."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

*(7.43.) MR. GOSCHEN : The hon. and learned Gentleman says there is no hurry in this matter. This clause has been before the public and the House, in which there are a great many legal Gentlemen, and they have had plenty of time to look at it. With the exception of the hon. and learned Gentleman, no one has taken exception to the clause. The hon. Member seems to think that no attention has been given to it and that it is simply the drafting of the Department. A very high authority on law, perhaps equally as high as the hon. and learned Member for Longford, namely, the Attorney General for Ireland, has expressed himself satisfied with the clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Because he is satisfied with getting the money for the Government.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. I asked my right hon. and learned Friend whether he saw any objection to the clause. The hon. Gentleman must not presume that he is the only person in the House who has any anxiety as regards administrators, Trustees, and others. Depend upon it, if there had been all the dangers surrounding the clause which the hon. Gentleman fears, we should have heard a great deal more about it from solicitors and others. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to agree with other Gentlemen equally as conscientious as himself in the passing of this clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY: You did not answer my arguments though.

(7.44.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): There is one blot in the clause which I think the Government might put right. In the last two lines it is said that the assessment shall be made upon the executors and administrators, and then that the amount shall be payable out of the estate. There is an ambiguity which it would be well to remove. As the clause now stands, it is possible that a claim might be made against the executors personally. That doubt, however, can be removed by the insertion of a single word—namely, “only” after “due,” so that the clause would read “due only from and payable out of the estate.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): Really the Amendment is not necessary. It is perfectly clear as it now stands. The amount has to be paid out of the estate. No claim can be made against the executors or administrators apart from the estate.

(7.47.) MR. P. POWER (Waterford, E.): I wish the Government would explain what has made this clause necessary. If it is necessary now, I suppose it was equally necessary years ago. A gentleman of high authority told me only the other day that the leakage has been comparatively little. Why the Government should endeavour to make the position of executors or administrators more difficult than it is already I fail to see. So far from making the position more troublesome I think the Government should do what they can to facilitate the duties of the executors. My own experience goes to prove that the position of an executor is not an enviable one. Of course, I regard it as an honour that the late Mr. Biggar should have shown his confidence in me by appointing me as one of his executors, but even in the case of his estate, which was fairly well managed, the trouble is considerable. I hope my hon. and learned Friend will press this matter to a Division.

*(7.50.) MR. WEBB: I am very glad this matter has been brought up again by my hon. and learned Friend. There are few men of my age who have had to do with more small executorships than myself, and, therefore, I am in a position to urge that the trouble and annoyance is very great. Executors are not paid, and I consider it rather too bad of the Government to throw additional trouble upon them. I can imagine that endless litigation will result from the adoption of this clause, and I must earnestly point out that the remedy is entirely in the hands of the Government. Income assessments are sent out in the early part of the year. I always feel bound to make my return within the time specified, but the Government are very apt to allow people to dally in making their returns. It is hardly fair that they should throw additional work on executors in order to make up for their own laches. Legislation ought rather to proceed in the way of lightening the duties of executors than of adding to them. It is because I believe this clause will add to their trouble that I mean to oppose it.

(8.0.) Amendment proposed, in Clause 26, page 11, lines 1 and 2, leave out all after "shall certify the same accordingly," and insert—

"Provided that the authority, if they are of opinion that the duties which would devolve on the medical officer of health under this section could not be performed by him without interference with the due performance of his ordinary duties may appoint some other legally qualified medical practitioner having the qualification required for office of medical officer of health of the district to make such examinations and give such certificates as aforesaid, and may pay him reasonable remuneration for his services. As respects Scotland the expression 'Medical Officer of Health' means a medical officer within the meaning of 'The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867.'"—(Mr. Jackson.)

(8.0.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): This Amendment is entirely in accordance with the wishes we expressed, and I desire to acknowledge our indebtedness to those who assisted us in obtaining this concession.

Amendment agreed to.

(8.1.) MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): In Committee on Clause 32 I draw attention to the fact that the clause enabled the Customs Authorities to render illegal the use of any substances in methylating spirits used under the Spirit Act of 1880, and I asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether this was the intention, and I understood his reply to be that it was not; but as there appeared to be some doubt about the effect of the words, he undertook to look into the matter. I am sure he does not wish to do anything unfair, but it would be unfair for the authorities to frivolously, or without sufficient cause, take from a trade the right to use substances they have legally used since 1880. It is to meet this that I propose to substitute the words "addition to" for the words "lieu of."

Amendment proposed, Clause 32, line 13, to omit the words "in lieu of," and insert the words "in addition to."

Question proposed, "That the words 'in lieu of' stand part of the Bill."

(8.2.) MR. JACKSON: I have considered this question with the officers of Inland Revenue. The hon. Member is correct in saying that the intention is not to limit what has hitherto been done; it is intended to take further powers in reference to making more nasty, if I may say so, this spirit, and so to prevent, as far as possible, the spirit being consumed as drink. The Inland Revenue Commissioners are given the power of approving of the mixing of more nauseous materials in certain cases. I understand there is a difficulty about the use of certain materials in certain trades, and this is to give the Commissioners more power to authorise the use of other substances in addition to those now used. As the result of my discussion with the Commissioners, it appears that the present words fit the meaning and intention of the clause and that the Amendment is not necessary.

(8.3.) MR. CHANCE: I am ready to withdraw the Amendment, though I confess I am not convinced that it is not desirable.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to be read the third time to-morrow at Two of the clock.

(8.8.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) :

Before the general discussion proceeds, I wish to call attention to the state of business of Supply. We have almost reached the month of June, the end of the Session cannot be considered as very distant, and yet at the present moment not one penny of Irish Supply has been taken except by the summary and comparatively un-Constitutional method of a Vote on Account. If we look back at Supply taken in the Session we find the Government have only obtained British Votes in Class I, and a few casual Votes in addition ; while the whole business of Irish Supply remains undischarged. Two years ago the scandal in regard to the business of Supply reached such a height that we were obliged to protest with considerable energy. We then received from the Government the most emphatic pledges that in future the business of Supply would proceed with regularity from beginning to end of the Session, and should be taken at least one day every week. Last year, however, there was no attempt to keep those pledges, and the slovenly and most objectionable method of discharging business by Votes on Account was resorted to again and again. Five Votes on Account were taken before the regular business of Supply came to be discharged. At the opening of this Session the pledges were repeated that Supply should be taken every week, and that thus Members should have the opportunity of discussing grievances, and this is the more necessary since the Government have appropriated so much of the time of the House. I have to repeat, in the strongest possible form, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) and my Colleagues our protest against the evasion and postponement of the business of Supply by repeated Votes on Account. Before we proceed further, I have to ask for an assurance that after the conclusion of the holidays the business of Supply shall be taken up, and shall go forward from week to week until the end of the Session, and that Irish Votes shall be taken in their proper order. With regard to Irish Votes, sometimes, no doubt, at the request of individual Members, but more generally for the convenience of the Government, they have been put back until the end of the Session, until the month of July, and as the result we have had a congested mass of Irish Votes heaped together, and taken at late hours of the night, when an attempt to bring forward grievances in a reasonable and systematic manner in which they can be subjected to public scrutiny becomes impossible. I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer, financial purist as he is, and predisposed, from the disposition of his mind, to orderly and Constitutional methods, will appreciate the force of my protest. I again ask for an assurance that, after the holidays, Supply shall be taken at least one day in each week, if not oftener, and that Irish Votes shall be taken in their order as they arise.

Mr. Sexton

*(8.15.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am under the impression that frequently, and not on one or two occasions only, Irish Votes have been postponed at the wish of Irish Members, and in order to suit their convenience.

MR. SEXTON: I have said so. Votes have been thus deferred, but that was in consequence of the irregularity with which Supply has been taken, and Irish Members never knew when it might be necessary they should be present.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No doubt it would be more agreeable to myself, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the House generally, if Supply could be taken to a greater extent and more regularly early in the Session; but what can the Government or the House do when the discussion of matters other than Supply is conducted by a few hon. Members at such length? It has been impossible to get Supply taken with due regularity, because upon other questions it has been necessary sometimes to allow four nights and sometimes five nights for discussion, and naturally when Debate is prolonged to such an extent it is impossible to proceed with Supply, as otherwise we would desire. I can assure the hon. Member that the Government are perfectly alive to the inconvenience of taking Supply irregularly; but I fear it will be found utterly impossible to give such a pledge as the hon. Member desires. We shall do our best in the matter, and we shall be only too glad if the hon. Member and his friends will assist us by keeping discussion within reasonable length.

(8.17.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I do not wish to interpose between my hon. Friend and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but in reference to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks upon the length of discussion, I would say they are not borne out by what happened up to Easter. We have it on the highest authority that up to that time the Government and the House had nothing to complain of. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should again have made this accusation.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I was obliged, in answer to the hon. Member, to show how it was we were unable to fulfil our pledges to proceed regularly with Supply.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not wish to enter into mutual recrimination. I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer a possible course of meeting the difficulty. If the Government resolve to continue the Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays after Whitsuntide, it would be worth their while to consider whether they could not take Bills in the Morning and Supply at the Evening Sittings. The Government might well consider the point between this time and to-morrow, and then inform the House of the conclusion they come to. My own experience is that when we get into heavy Bills and proceed with them from day to day in Committee, the Committee gets stupefied with the continuance, and that it would be a relief to Members to alternate the work. It is merely my own suggestion; I do not know how it may be consonant with the view of my hon. Friend or others.

(8.20.) MR. SEXTON: I only wish to say that it was in consequence of the irregularity with which Irish Supply has been taken that the Irish Members, not knowing when it would come on, have sometimes asked for postponement. I approve of the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and think it might be carried out. I have to repeat in the plainest possible terms that we cannot suffer the business of Supply to fall into the condition it has been in at the end of recent Sessions.

*(8.20.) MR. GOSCHEN: I will consult with the First Lord of the Treasury, and trust that it may be possible to make some reasonable arrangement in the matter to suit general convenience.

*(8.21.) MR. E. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the position of affairs in South and East and Central Africa, which is undoubtedly a somewhat serious one, and though the pressure of business is considerable, I think I am justified in raising a discussion on matters of great public interest and importance. The Committee is aware that Sir Percy Anderson was recently sent to Berlin to enter into negotiations—happily, for the moment, suspended—with the German Government respecting the delimitation of the frontiers between the English and German spheres of influence and the English and German territorial possessions. It was obvious that some clearly-defined and generally-recognised delimitation had become necessary if the cordial relations between the two countries were to remain undisturbed. I do not, therefore, wish to say a word in censure of the Government for opening negotiations, and I hope that they may be able to show that the spirit in which they are negotiating is equally unworthy of censure. But their conduct is not free from suspicion, and they are themselves responsible for this Debate. Questions have been asked by many hon. Members as well as myself, to which no satisfactory answer has been received. None of us have desired to press the Government unduly; we have only been anxious to receive an assurance that we shall remain in possession of an uninterrupted right of way from north to south, and territory, either British or which had been declared to be within the sphere of British influence, is not to be surrendered to Germany. But the Government will give us no such assurance; therefore it is reasonable to conclude that they cannot give it, as they would surely give it if they could to save themselves from further questioning and to set the mind of the country at rest. The territories about which most anxiety is felt are the territories extending northwards from the Zambesi along Lake Nyassa, Lake Tanganyika, the Victoria Nyanza, to the Albert Nyanza—Uganda—and in South Africa the territory lying between Bechuana-land the 20th deg. of longitude and the Zambesi. Is it correct to say that these territories "have not yet been geographically defined, and the understanding was general in its terms?" It is true that no hard and fast line was drawn upon the map as regards the territory that surrounds the German sphere of influence in East Africa, though it was understood what that sphere was to be; but in South-West Africa the British sphere of influence was precisely and geographically defined as far as it was possible to define it, and the expression of any doubt or uncertainty on the part of the Government as to the extent and limits of our spheres of influence can only proceed from a desire to have them doubtful and uncertain, so that if any concessions are made to Germany they may be able to tell the country that there has been no surrender. That device is a little too transparent. Let me ask them this question. Did they, on opening negotiations with Germany, state exactly what territory they considered inalienable and what territory they were prepared to throw into the melting pot? Now, I maintain that we have a right to hold that by far the larger part of the territories in question are inalienably ours. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs acknowledges that an understanding was arrived at with Germany, and this understanding was embodied in the Agreement of 1887, quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Leith. That understanding, though in general terms is quite precise enough for our purpose, and on their own initiative excludes the Germans from the territory in the centre of Africa, which was expressly reserved for British influence, but which they now wish to occupy so as to place themselves across our highway to the Great Lakes to the North, which is absolutely indispensable to the successful and profitable issue of our undertakings. Though the Germans are full of friendly expressions their aim and object seems to be the limitation of our expansion, and the expansion of their limitations. Starting from the East Coast and the West, they want to join hands in the centre of Africa, and thus cut us off for ever from realising our ambition to own a continuous and unbroken strip of territory stretching from Cape Colony to the sources of the Nile. I do not blame the Germans from entertaining this design; but any English Government would be greatly to blame which allowed them to accomplish it. This design is still more apparent if we examine the demand we have reason to believe they are making in South-West Africa. There was something more than an understanding arrived at as to our sphere of influence in this region. It was proclaimed generally in December, 1884, and clearly defined by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1888. Writing in December, 1888, Sir H. Robinson says—

“Looking to the interval that has elapsed, as well as to the fact that the Protectorate has been explained to the Chiefs concerned, the question can no longer be considered as open to discussion.”— and was authorised to declare on 4th February, 1889, that Her Majesty's Government are responsible for the peace and prosperity of the vast and important country peopled by Bechuana tribes, and extending from Cape Colony to the Zambesi. One would think that Her Majesty's Government, as well as Sir H. Robinson, considered the question as no longer open to discussion, but the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies told me on 16th May that the “boundaries still remained undefined.” You can hardly call the course of a river or a degree of longitude an undefined boundary, but it seems that even the laws of geography must give way to the exigencies of Secretaries of State. The Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs tried to escape on the ground that the Zambesi and the 20th degree of longitude do not intersect each other. As a matter of fact, two tributaries of the Zambesi do intersect the 20th longitude, and if no surrender were contemplated we should never have been put off with an answer of this kind. Fortunately, I have been informed, not by rumours in the newspapers, which those who remember the disclosures of the Globe will not be always disposed to discredit entirely, but from a private source of unimpeachable accuracy, exactly what it is that the Germans are asking for. Taking advantage of the admission, equally unnecessary and incorrect, that the North-West corner of the British sphere of influence has not been geographically defined, they wish to draw a line in a North-Easterly direction from the intersection of the 20° of longitude and the 22° of latitude to the Victoria Falls on the Zambesi. A glance at the map will show the House that the importance of the concession thus demanded can hardly be exaggerated. It would plant the Germans on the banks of the Zambesi, make them a Zambesi Power, bring them a great stride nearer to their Eastern possessions, and give all the country surrounding, and fertilised by, the Upper Zambesi into their hands. The Zambesi overflows every year like the Nile, and “scatters plenty o'er a smiling land.” The products of this rich and fertile country could be transported by the Zambesi to the East Coast, or, more probably, the Germans would prefer to tap it by a railway through Damaraland from the West Coast. I am speaking now of the country that the Germans would acquire to the North of our sphere of influence, but the proposed line runs through the centre of a country that has been declared to be within our sphere of influence, and is acknowledged to be so by natives, explorers, hunters, concession seekers, in fact, by everyone except Her Majesty's Government. Now I am informed that the opinion of all who know the country of the Western Bamangwato is that in securing it we have secured the pride of Central Africa. There is abundance of water, there is a river navigable for 400 miles, there is grazing land that will carry innumerable flocks and herds, and there is reason to believe that the soil is rich in minerals. When Sir Sydney Shippard was informed that a concession had been granted to an Englishman, he is reported to have said—

"I am delighted to hear it, for in getting that concession he has secured for England a footing in a country of the highest value to her."

But there is another point of great importance. We have promised all the tribes of the Bechuana people our protection. Now, the Western Bamangwato are a tribe of the Bechuana people. Four generations ago the entire Bamangwato nation resided in the neighbourhood of Shoshong. Owing to internal dissensions the nation split into two parts, the one part staying where they were, and where they still remain, and where they live and thrive under the firm and wise rule of Khama, the most intelligent and civilised Chief in Africa, and our very good friend; the other part, following the banks of the Botletle River finally settled down in the Lake N'Gami country, where they are ruled by their Chief, Moremi. The best relations now prevail between the two branches of the Bamangwato nations. The chiefs and head men on either side intermarry with the women on the other, and these tender ties bind them so close together that, when the Matabeles invaded N'Gamiland, Khama dispatched a force to Moremi's assistance, which largely contributed to the total rout of the Matabele warriors. If we give the Germans what they are now asking for we shall divide a nation that is practically one, by placing one half under one rule and one half under another, they being perfectly contented with our rule, and regarding the Germans with aversion and dread. By so doing we should excite the indignation of Khama and the whole Bechuana nation, whose faith in our promises and protective power will be rudely shaken, and who will change the attitude of loyalty and fidelity they have hitherto preserved for one of suspicion and distrust. The presence of the Germans in Bechuanaland will expose us to a new danger, which, by shutting them out, we can easily avoid. A few years ago a very remarkable article was published in Berlin, which attracted a great deal of attention. The purport of the article was that the Dutch and the Germans were practically of the same race, language, and religion, and that the difference between them in these respects was so small and superficial, that, virtually they might be considered as brothers. Now why, it was asked, should not they combine to drive the English out of Africa? Of course, a few years ago such a project was absurd; would it be equally absurd if the Germans were established in Bechuanaland? They would still be a long way away from the Transvaal, but they would be divided from it only by Bechuanaland, and if the Bechuana grew dissatisfied with our rule, and came to regard the Germans as the conquering race, they might place themselves under German protection, and one day we might be confronted with a German Dutch Alliance, which would threaten not only our dominion but our very existence in South Africa. Such a danger is remote, but why should we not keep it remote? Why should we invite it to come nearer? My last and strongest objection to the proposed extension of German territory in this part of Africa is that it would completely bar our expansion to the North-West. There is a vast piece of territory running from Bechuanaland to the Congo Free State, at present left white on the map—I do not want it all to be painted red or painted blue. Let Germany have her share, by all means, but let us also have ours. We do not wish to exclude Germany, but still less do we wish to be excluded ourselves; and to set a bound and limit to our own expansion northwards, while, at the same time, we hand over to Germany a large slice of our own possessions would put a coping stone to the vast pile of blunders we have so assiduously laboured to rear in South Africa. If I did not know for a fact that Germany had made this demand, and if I did not gather from Ministerial answers that it was being seriously entertained, I would not have believed that any English Government, certainly that no Conservative Government, could contemplate such a surrender. It is said that the Germans know how to ask. I hope Lord Salisbury will know how to refuse. We have allowed the spheres of German influence to grow at a prodigious rate. In 1883 the Germans had but Angra Pequena, a territory comprising 150 square miles; now their sphere of influence extends over territories larger than India, and it must be remembered that nearly every mile over which they rule was discovered, explored, given to the world, and opened for civilisation by Englishmen. Truly it may be said of them they reap where they have not sown, and gather where they have not planted. There are those who view the expansion of Germany almost with gratification, and who believe that she will not be able to maintain her position, and that, if we find ourselves cribbed, cabined, and confined, we have only to step in and take what we want. That is a very comfortable theory, but it might not work very well in practice, and certainly no statesman ought to act upon it. We should like to have Delagoa Bay, but what chance is there of our getting it? Our Colonial Empire has lost some of its brightest jewels by this heedless abandonment of lands that were once ours, and might have been so still. Mr. Stanley, in his speech at the Guildhall, and again last night, drew a vivid picture of the value of the lands we had allowed to pass away from us, and in burning words rebuked our apathy and indifference. Depend upon it that now, as in 1878, and in 1884, his words are being carefully weighed in Germany, where they are fully alive to the advantages to which we so foolishly and obstinately shut our eyes. Their Government though, from time to time, it has expressed its disapproval of colonial enterprise, has invariably backed up the German African Companies, and in consequence of this backing Mr. Stanley pointed out that our English Companies cannot compete with the German on equal terms. He adds, ominously enough, that if there is to be any more surrender he should "advise the British East African Company to retire altogether and give it up as a bad job." He has told us that he has come back with his pocket full of Treaties. We have now a new opportunity, and perhaps the last. Shall we throw it away? Shall we back up Mr. Stanley, shall we firmly resist German encroachments, or shall we throw up the sponge, declare that the mission of England as a colonising power is ended, and sit idly looking on, while the Germans absorb territory that might, in the future, sustain and nourish millions of our race? Lord Salisbury said lately—

"Dominion is not an unmitigated luxury: it carries with it duties, burdens, obligations, and dangers. I hope we shall not be reduced into undertaking obligations which are beyond our strength to perform."

These words savour of surrender. They have a weary ring about them. They are the words of Hercules after he has performed his labours, and wishes to repose in the lap of Omphale. They do not breathe the spirit in which Clive and Hastings won India, in which Wolfe drove the French out of America, in which Chatham laid the foundations of our Colonial Empire. General Caprivi recently pointed out that the Germans had neither the men of experience nor the command of money that we have, and yet he said that "Nothing is left for them to do but advance." If those words are true of Germany, still more are they true of England. Yet we do not ask the Government to send out expeditions; we only ask them not to give up what individuals have won, and to let the pioneers of English civilisation feel that they have the strong arm of the English Government behind them. And, as a set off to Lord Salisbury's words, I will conclude with a quotation from the same remarkable article I referred to before, which has exercised so much influence over the German mind—

"A new Empire, possibly more valuable and more brilliant than even the Indian Empire, awaits—in the newly-discovered Central Africa—that Power which shall possess sufficient courage, strength, and intelligence to acquire it."

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman move?

(8.45.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order?

DR. TANNER: On a point of order, Sir, should I not be precluded from speaking on public works if the hon. Member moved this Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; the hon. Member should have risen before.

DR. TANNER: I had no opportunity, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member might have intervened at the commencement of the speech of the hon. Member for the Whitby Division.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £15,000 (Foreign Office) be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Ernest Beckett.)

(9.13.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(9.16.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Sir, I desire to make a few observations on the subject on which the hon. Member who has just spoken addressed the House, namely, South Africa. I cannot entirely agree with all he said. It seems to me a great misfortune that we have had so few opportunities of discussing foreign affairs, and obtaining information from Ministers with regard to them. I do not myself believe very much in the system of secrecy in regard to foreign affairs which obtains in certain quarters. I can quite understand that it is not desirable to discuss the details of pending negotiations, still there are occasions when discussions would enable Her Majesty's Government to understand the opinion of the country, and thus strengthen their hands in negotiating with foreign Powers. I think we have suffered in the past owing to the absence of discussion—particularly with regard to our interests in Africa. I think if the public had been fully aware of what was happening, we would not have had the scramble for South Africa which has been spoken of. I think with regard to the question of Lingshan, five or six years ago, that our action there would not have been taken had the country possessed full information on the subject. Again, I think we would have avoided many of the difficulties we have experienced with Portugal had we possessed full details of the view taken by Her Majesty's Government. We find now that all along Her Majesty's Government have taken a much clearer and more decided view with regard to our interests in Nyassaland than has ever been stated in the House of Commons. And I think the discussion we are having to-night in regard to our negotiations with Germany and England will be of service to Her Majesty's Government and to this country. I am not going to make an attack on Her Majesty's Government, such as was made by the hon. Member who introduced the Motion. I think that Lord Salisbury, in dealing with African affairs, has looked far too much to our connection with Germany as a European Power. He has appeared too ready to sacrifice our interests in Africa to our interests in Europe. I think that to be a great fault in his conduct, and worthy of attention. I do not adopt the strong language of the hon. Member who moved the reduction of the Vote, nor could I agree with the line which he wishes Her Majesty's Government to adopt in Africa. There are three questions brought forward in this Motion—our relations with Germany with regard to Nyassaland territory, with regard to Nyanza territory, and with regard to Lake Nyanza. The discussion with regard to Lake Nyanza is, undoubtedly, caused by the rivalries of the two trading companies, and the German Company is backed up by the German Government. What I would impress upon Her Majesty's Government is this, to take care that no limitation should be placed on the commercial development of our subjects within the control of the African Company. We should see that they have a free hand under their charter, though I do not think it is incumbent upon us to go further than that. We should see that they get the full benefit of the concessions they obtain, and that they are perfectly free to open up trade, if they can, right from Central Africa to the Coast. I should like, if the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs could find it, some information with regard to Nyassaland. On a former occasion he told us that it was impossible to make a definite statement on the subject, but I think now he may be able to tell us something with regard to Nyassaland and the Shiré River. There are impediments placed in the way of our subjects having connection between the outside world and their settlement, and I think that Her Majesty's Government should tell us whether they are endeavouring to arrive at a settlement of our position in that country on a certain and permanent footing. Lake Nyanza covers the water basin of the Zambesi and the Congo, and freedom of connection would, undoubtedly, be of importance to the inhabitants of the regions around the Lake. The Zambesi should be a free waterway to the interior of Africa from all parts of the world. I maintain the same, also, with regard to the Shiré. It does seem to me very advisable that Her Majesty's Government should look towards the future development of Africa, and that, in the interests of our commerce, they should endeavour to make a clear and free route for the outside world to the interior of Africa. Not only the Zambesi, but the Shiré River should be free. In 1887 there was a correspondence between Lord Salisbury and the Authorities at Berlin with regard to certain encroachments made by the Germans upon the British sphere of influence. Negotiations took place, and the result was that the 22nd degree of east latitude was taken as the line between the British Protectorate and the Protectorate of the German Government. Therefore, in our negotiations with the German Government for the maintenance of our boundary, we have this precedent to go on. That, however, is a matter of detail which I do not wish to enlarge upon. What I would urge on Her Majesty's Government is that, as to the question of South Africa, we ought to have regard primarily to the opinions and wishes and desires of our fellow subjects of the Cape Colony and other colonists in South Africa. Our interests in this part of the world are comparatively slight and distant. They are also interests more or less individual, but to the people living in South Africa itself—to our colonists at the Cape and elsewhere in British South Africa—these matters are very much more vital. South Africa is their country and their home, and to its free expansion and development in the future they are bound to look with natural ambition and very sincere interest. I think we should look to carrying out what are beyond dispute the views and opinions and aspirations of our colonists in South Africa. We should take care that their commercial freedom is in no way retarded or impaired by our political arrangements with Germany; that there should be what we should all like to see, namely, a waterway, free to all the world, up the Zambesi to Tanganyika and Nyassa; that, as regards what is called South-East Africa, we should remember that our interests are small as compared with those of the colonists, and that it should be a sine quâ non in any negotiations with Germany that we should make certain that Cape Colony is with us.

*(9.36.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is always an uncomfortable task to urge on the House abstinence from discussion of matters of public interest, and it has been my lot more than once to be reproved for exhortations of this kind. I think, however, I may be excused if I offer to the Committee some considerations to show why a prolonged discussion on this subject at the present time is undesirable and will serve no useful purpose. I do not undervalue or deprecate the legitimate aspirations of my fellow countrymen, and I am not wanting in admiration for the sacrifices of those who have made the discoveries which have opened a Continent to civilisation and paved the way for the colonising efforts of our own and other nations. I hope that the mission of our countrymen is not yet fulfilled, but that further regions will be opened by them to civilisation and Christianity. What I say may give offence to some, but I am quite sure that the feeling I have expressed is deeply seated in this country, and that there are many who are ready to sacrifice themselves in those great efforts which in times past have conferred such honour on our nation. I cannot agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down that the object of negotiations conducted by the Government of this country is best promoted by public discussion while such negotiations are in progress. It places the Government in this position—either they must subscribe to or deny propositions. If they commit themselves to those propositions it is evident that they must stand by them, while, on the other hand, if they deny them they may be supposed to be indifferent to objects which many are in favour of. Therefore it is manifest that we must be silent, because it is impossible we can reveal our position or defeat our own efforts by premature declarations. I presume that the hon. Member who has moved the reduction of the Vote does not blame Her Majesty's Government for having entered into negotiations for the delimitation of our sphere of influence in South Africa. It is evident that were the nations of Europe are competing for influence in the comparatively untrodden regions which offer markets for our commerce and colonisation there must be rivalries and jealousies, and it is to the highest degree important that nations which have much in common and which wish to act fairly in regard to their respective claims should desire as far as possible to avoid friction and jealousy by timely settlement of their interests, so that they can move forward on their new missions on parallel lines. It is said that no satisfactory answer has been given as to the progress of the negotiations, but it is impossible to enter into the questions involved while the matters are under discussion. This country has interests to maintain, and I trust Her Majesty's Government will not be slow to maintain them, and when the negotiations are completed every explanation will be given to the House. Reference has been made to rumours which are current as to sacrifices which have been consented to after discussion by Her Majesty's Government. Some of those mentioned have not reached me, and I am quite sure that they derive no authority from those who are engaged in confidential negotiations on behalf of the English and German Governments. As the Prime Minister said the other day, it would be very convenient, no doubt, if Parliament sat in secret Session, for then Her Majesty's Government could communicate to hon. Members, who have the interests of the country as much at heart as ourselves, the details of pending negotiations, but that cannot be done. My hon. Friend has talked about land passing out of our possession. Some people talk and write about parts of Africa through which some of our enterprising fellow-countrymen have travelled as if it was our inheritance. While I hope the Government will not be behind-hand in Africa any more than elsewhere, people really must not talk as if we have an indefeasible right to the country. We must allow other nations to have similar aspirations to our own. What the Government and the House of Commons have to see to is that our interests are not neglected. Where we have acquired rights and asserted them we should not lightly give them up; but the Government are dealing with a friendly Power, and negotiations are going on on terms of mutual respect and confidence, which are engendered by past experience and by the remarkable unanimity which has attended the proceedings of Great Britain and Germany in the recent operations on the West Coast of Africa. The Government has a full sense of the claims which our fellow-countrymen possess on account of their past enterprise. They are not unmindful of the claims which our commerce has to legitimate expansion, and these objects are entirely consistent with a due respect to similar objects on the part of neighbouring States. The Government are endeavouring by the delimitation of spheres of influence to obviate causes of jealousy and friction in the time to come. The security that the country and the House has as against the Government is that the result of those negotiations cannot long be concealed, and if in any way the interests of the country are neglected a speedy retribution will attend those who have so neglected those interests. Having that speedy review and verdict before our eyes, the Government, hon. Members may feel sure, will not be likely to neglect the great interests which they, in common with all their fellow-countrymen, have at heart. The hon. Member for West Edinburgh has also referred to the interests of the region further south in the neighbourhood of Lake Nyassa, where the hon. Member's countrymen and my own have done good work in the cause of civilisation and Christianity. The Government, I think, have shown of late that they are fully alive to the rights which our fellow-countrymen have obtained there by being first in the field. They have maintained their right to the free navigation of the Zambesi River. They have refused to allow it to be closed against us. They have claimed that our fellow-countrymen in the Shiré Highlands and on the shores of Lake Nyassa shall not be endangered by the invasion of any other Power, and necessarily it will be their object to obtain and secure and retain access to other regions where we have interests. I would ask the Committee to show the same reticence and forbearance the Government are so sensible of in past years, which I hope they have not been unworthy of, and I can assure the House that the confidence I now ask from the Committee will not be misplaced. In that sense I deprecate prolonging the discussion.

(9.48.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, N.): I am sure we all trust that nothing will be said in these discussions which will have the effect of hampering the Government in these discussions. I am sure the delicacy of the situation will be so appreciated on the Front Opposition Bench as to prevent any prolonged discussion of the subject from that quarter of the House. But there are some of us who think that an opportunity for the expression of individual opinions would by no means hamper the hands of the Government. I can quite understand that the Foreign Office is not able to throw any light on the subject at present; still, the German Foreign Office is not so reticent as our own. The present Chancellor in Germany and his illustrious predecessor have never found any difficulty in expressing their views as to the conduct of Foreign Affairs by Germany, and I believe, from what I have seen, discussions in the Reichstag and in the French Chamber, whether upon Africa or upon Newfoundland, are more frequent and prolonged than the discussion of foreign affairs have been in this House during the last few years. In my opinion, the language used on this subject by certain organs and by the great explorer who has recently returned to this country has done more to revive the doctrines of the old Manchester school than to forward the objects which they themselves have at heart. The question before us seems to be how far unoccupied land shall pass into the absolute possession of Foreign Powers and out of the sphere of the legitimate commerce and enterprise of Great Britain, and of the world in general. We desire to have some reassurance that our actual interests in Africa are not in peril. There has been a good deal of anxiety as to the expedition which has recently started,

Sir J. Ferguson

and which includes in its ranks Emin Pasha. We have also to consider the future of our great African possessions which, when they are one day formed into a dominion, will be disposed to ask how far the course now adopted by Her Majesty's Government has affected their prospects. The policy of the Government is watched at the Cape with no less interest than in England. I do not share the fears of my hon. Friend who moved this Motion with regard to the Cape. The Cape will hold its own by its own enterprise, and if it stood by itself it would have little to fear either from the Dutch or the Germans. We wish also to know what lines are being drawn to further confine enormous areas to the exclusive enjoyment of Foreign Powers. Those areas have, to a large extent, been explored and partially developed by British and especially Scottish enterprise. The other day some interesting correspondence between Lord Salisbury and the Ambassador at Berlin was published regarding the delimitation between the German and the British sphere of influence in the neighbourhood of Lake Nyanza. There is a line leading from Lake Nyassa to the south end of Lake Tanganyika, and known as the Stephenson Road. The large region of which that road forms the centre has been developed and, to some extent, civilised by missionaries. Our position in that district was preserved by the action taken by Lord Salisbury last spring; but if it has been preserved from Portugal in order to be handed over to Germany, I think it will be hard to justify the action of Her Majesty's Government, because in that case the deduction would certainly be that what has been got from bullying the weaker Power has been given up by knuckling down to the stronger Power. It seems to me that the question of maintaining the line of the Stephenson Road is one of the very greatest importance to our interests in that portion of Africa. Then I would ask, what is the use of a sphere of influence if that sphere is not to be maintained? The result of the spirited foreign policy of which we have heard so much seems likely to be the sacrifice of our commerce in those regions. We have a right to know whether the Government, in the course of their negotiations, intend to permit the exclusion of British interests from the areas I have mentioned. In any event, by making this protest we lay upon the Government the responsibility of the negotiations, and there is no doubt that the country will require from them a strict account.

(10.2.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) : I have been a good deal disturbed by the remarks which have been going about as to the possibility of the delimitation of the great region south of the Zambesi being re-opened in the course of the present negotiations. There is south of the Zambesi a noble Empire which will some day be, and which ought to be, an Anglo-Saxon Empire, as it is ours by right of conquest and by right of the work we have done there. It was a stupid blunder when Damaraland and Namaqualand were given up, but stupid as was that blunder, we have hitherto kept the trump card in our hands, and it will not do to commit another stupid blunder by re-opening the question of the German boundaries south of the Zambesi. I think we may reasonably expect from my right hon. Friend an assurance that there is no intention of re-opening that question. Such an assurance will remove a great deal of misapprehension on both sides of the House.

(10.6.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : I hope, for totally different reasons from those which have been put forward, that the Government will afford the House and the country some more information than they have vouchsafed up to the present. I have listened to the discussion, and during its progress I have been forced to realise the feelings of Gil Blas when he found himself in the cave of the robbers. When they conducted him to his first exploit they exhorted him to go in for a spirited foreign policy, and when he picked up the wallet of the padre he had robbed no doubt he considered it was his by right of conquest. If the speeches which have been delivered this evening are to be taken as an indication of the views of hon. Members respecting the morality of the present position, it seems to me that this House is adopting a code of morality very different from that which is found in the Bible, and in the mouths of Christian Missionaries, whose work hon. Members are so anxious to help forward.

In that old Book, which is much more frequently referred to than read, there is a precept that you shall not covet your neighbour's goods. Now, I should like to know whose goods these are which you propose to divide with Germany and Portugal, and other despoilers in Africa. We were assured by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs some nights ago that all these matters were being discussed in a friendly spirit at Berlin, and that the important interests involved would not be prejudiced by abstention from discussion at the present time. Whose are the important interests involved? They are not the interests of Great Britain, or Germany, or Portugal. They are the interests of the innocent inhabitants of Africa, and I say that Germany, and Great Britain, and the other European Powers are acting the part of the bully and robber. You may talk about your "diplomatic relations;" this is only a large phrase to cover what is essentially immoral, unjust, cruel, and cowardly. This House proposes to deliver up Africa to the interests of Chartered Companies of adventurers—men who pretend to be promoting the interests of civilisation and the Bible, but who are nothing more nor less than a pack of robbers. I am very much afraid that there are Members of this House who are not altogether personally disinterested in some of these schemes. It would certainly be well if we could obtain some further information as to the intentions of the Government. I suspect, if Germany stands firm, Her Majesty's Government, instead of sending an armed expedition or a temporary message, will discover some modus vivendi, and if the robbers should fall out the Africans would get a good many goods restored to them. But I want to know, for my own satisfaction, and, as I believe, for the satisfaction of a large portion of the population of this country who have no interest and no sympathy with your robbing expeditions, what it is the Government propose to do in Africa, and what is to be the position of these unfortunate people, with regard to whom you say you have extended your sphere of influence. Suppose the inhabitants of Africa held a palaver and decided to divide this country into two portions, one tribe having the land from the English Channel to the Thames, and another tribe having the land from the Thames to the Humber? What would be your view of the matter? You would ridicule them, and say they had no possible right. Perhaps they would want to spread Mahomedanism. I have been rather proud to consider myself a Christian, but I am rather doubtful as to the sort of Christianity you are likely to spread in Africa. It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to urge the Government to maintain the prestige of the Empire, and to secure their sphere of influence. It would be more worthy of a great Government to show some ground for the aggressive policy which has been adopted with regard to Africa, to show that they have some right to go and claim a sphere of influence and territorial possession in a country with which they have naturally nothing to do, than to come down and talk about civilising influences, when we all know that it is nothing more than empty hypocrisy.

(10.12.) SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I should like to say a few words about the bullies and robbers who, the hon. Member seems to think, are likely to get hold of Africa. I am in no way interested, financially or otherwise, in the matter, but I wish to deprecate both jealousy of Germany and fear of Portugal. I have been in Africa, and I always hope we shall work hand in hand with all civilised Powers, who may set about the task of reducing Africa to civilisation. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but I think before I sit down they will agree with me that we ought to go hand in hand with others in the work we have yet to perform in Africa. I have no wish to detain the Committee at any length, but I would merely allude to the great works in which I am convinced hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite will support Her Majesty's Government, and those works are the suppression of the liquor traffic amongst the native population and the abolition of slavery. The hon. Member for East Donegal may talk of bullies and robbers, but these are the main objects the Chartered Companies have in view in Africa. I hope I may make the same remark as to the Portuguese. Certainly the Belgians are doing good work in the same direction on the West Coast of Africa. Still, I do not think we need in any way endanger the negotiations at present proceeding at Berlin. I understand our technical negotiator is at present in England, but is soon to return to Berlin. I hope he will go back fully assured that, as far as this House is concerned, we are determined to support the British race in co-operation with all other States in doing what is not only to our interest, but also our duty and obligation.

(10.16.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have very often admitted, and I am ready to admit on this occasion, that in matters of foreign policy I have great confidence in the head of the Foreign Office. So long as he does not yield to pressure, as I am afraid he is apt to do, from Members opposite and a few so-called Liberals on this side who adopt a quasi-jingo policy, I have every confidence in Lord Salisbury. I entirely agree with the words of wisdom which recently fell from him on this subject—that, after all, Europe is more important to us than Africa. I think it is more important that we should be safe at home than that we should be safe in Africa. At the same time, I quite agree with my hon. Friends that we should work in concert and good feeling with other Powers in Africa. I cannot, however, agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir George Baden-Powell) that the sole and main object of the Chartered Companies is to stop the liquor traffic and to abolish slavery. That distinguished traveller, Mr. Stanley, has told us that the people who bring noxious liquors into Africa are Europeans. As to the abolition of slavery, I know it is a proper thing to say we are going to abolish slavery. Whenever people want to get up a company in the City, and to make a good deal of money, they always say they are going to abolish slavery. I do not think, however, that we ought to condemn the Government because they are not inclined to go so fast as Mr. Stanley wishes them to go. I think the concessionaires who ask to enter Africa with the Bible and the bullet are people Her Majesty's Government ought not only not to encourage, but ought to be very careful about. Of course, we ought to do everything to spread Christianity, but I think we ought to have at heart first of all the interest of our own country. We have to pay the piper in all these matters, and I think we ought to look to our own interests first.

community are waiting to see the action which the Government will take in regard to Africa. It is very well for hon. Members on the other side of the House to make remarks as to our position there, but each of them knows how, with an increasing population, it is necessary to have a growing trade, and therefore we must be anxious, and deliberately anxious, to extend that trade as well as the outlets for the population. We have to meet the competition of nations who are protectionists in the highest degree, and whose only anxiety is to get for themselves colonies which they may keep entirely to themselves, and in the markets of which they may shut out Great Britain. Therefore, I maintain that the question of our position in Africa is one of the greatest importance, especially since if we lost in that country the prestige and power we have asserted elsewhere, we shall have descended from the position which we boast we hold among the nations of the world, and those who come after us will say that we have failed in this day to do our duty. My right hon. Friend was quite right in deprecating discussion when negotiations are going on. But my right hon. Friend has kept us in suspense on many questions. Twice last year I asked questions about our British Indian subjects, and I should like to know, even now, what reparation our British Indian subjects have received from Germany. I certainly believe that if Germany had been in a similar position to that which we occupy she would have demanded and obtained reparation. My contention is, that we should show that we are a great nation by demanding reparation in cases where injury is done to people whom we are bound to protect. I wish also to touch on the subject of Swaziland, as to which the Government had some months ago a Report from Sir Francis de Winton, and as to which we are still waiting with patience for further information. The natives of Swaziland are all in favour of having the protection of this country, and do not desire to have anything to do with the Boer population, or the so-called African Republic. Therefore, I think we should only be doing our duty by maintaining what we have a right to maintain, the sphere of influence over Swaziland, which I hope we shall never give up. There is another question. We had some islands that were conceded by the Sultan of Zanzibar to the British East African Company. Those islands have been taken possession of by Germany, and I should like to know what action the Government are going to take in the matter?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: What islands?

*SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: The islands of Lamu, Mauda, and Patta. If I am wrong in my statement, then I shall be very glad to hear that the Germans have not been there, that they have not hauled down our flag, and are not in occupation. I am sure it will be a great relief to learn that such is not the case. I presume the Under Secretary is aware of the actual state of things, whether the Germans have been there, or whether the place has been visited by a filibustering expedition. It was understood that the Germans were not to interfere to the north of a certain line. This country has rigorously kept to the position allotted to it by the agreement with Germany, and it is only fair to ask that the Germans should keep to the same position as we have undertaken to maintain towards them.

*(10.32.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am glad to be able to give some satisfaction to my hon. Friend on one point. With regard to one of the islands mentioned by the hon. Member—Lamu—the Government entered into arbitration, and the award was in favour of this country. As to the other two islands—Mauda and Patta—the policy at present is one of mutual abstinence.

(10.33.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): May I correct my hon. Friend's error as to Swaziland? My hon. Friend is wrong in supposing that Swaziland is within the sphere of British influence. It is a native State that has been administered by a joint European Committee, but negotiations are going on, and it is impossible while the negotiations are pending to say anything. [Several hon. MEMBERS: The negotiations are finished.]

*(10.34.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I think the observations we have just heard show that the House is not in possession of that correct information we ought to have. The Under Secretary deprecates discussion at the present time, and now and always we are anxious to yield to the wishes of the Government. But may I remind the Government that they have been four years in office, and there has not yet been a full discussion of their African policy? Not long ago Lord Salisbury said that the African question was probably the most important political question of the day. It is a little remarkable, therefore, that the House of Commons has not yet been taken into the confidence of the Government as to what their African policy is, and that there has not been any full discussion of what is going on there. I think it is of great importance to the Government itself that there should be a discussion of these questions in the House, because what could be more advantageous for the Government, which is really a Committee of the Representative House of this country, than to know what the national feeling is on a policy of this kind? Besides, the question is discussed everywhere in the Press, and Mr. Stanley is going about the country lecturing people and telling them what they ought to do, and attempting to dictate the Imperial policy of this country, and he is listened to by large masses of our countrymen, who are under the influence of the glamour of Stanley's name. I have been astonished by some of the speeches which have been made on the other side, and which seem to indicate a return to the old principles of the Liberal Party, because from articles in the Radical Press and speeches by Radical leaders I had been led to think that what used to be called the bastard Imperialism of Lord Beaconsfield had become the accepted gospel of the Radical Party. In fact, we are rather in danger of forgetting that there are other portions of the habitable globe of some importance to the Empire besides the Dark Continent of Africa. I do not myself believe that the value of the trade and the colonisation which may be developed in Africa is so overwhelming as is sometimes represented; but, at the same time, I am strongly of opinion that England ought to have her fair share of all the expansion that is going on there. There are a good many critics who blame the too great caution of Lord Salisbury in the view of what the Government of this country ought to do in Africa, but a Conservative Government is bound to be cautious. But when it is said that Lord Salisbury is to blame for giving in so much to Germany, we ought to remember that it was the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian who, in the first instance, invited Germany to pursue her glorious work of colonisation in that region. In a speech made in 1885, after that little quarrel between Lord Granville and Prince Bismarck had been brought to a close by Lord Granville making his apology in the House of Lords to Prince Bismarck for having said anything to offend him—in 1885 the right hon. Gentleman in glowing sentences said that if Germany was to become a colonising power—and the right hon. Gentleman wished her God speed—she became the ally of this country and partner in the execution of the purposes of Providence in carrying the light of civilisation to the backward regions of the earth. But the House is told by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that very important and delicate negotiations are going on, and that we ought not to interfere with them. It seems to me that while those negotiations are going on Germany is advancing all along the line. This country does nothing to attack German interests, although we read of the way in which the Germans are storming one position after another along the East Coast of Africa, and are equipping new expeditions to start into the interior of the country. Now, if the Government of this country instead of promoting new colonising expeditions—which I firmly believe are bound to fail; for I do not see, although a great deal is talked by Stanley of the advantage of settling there, that there is any part of the coast, except the south, where it is possible to settle colonies of white men—if the Government would remember the interests of this country we have an important trade there which the Government is bound in honour and interest to look after. The whole trade of the East Coast of Africa has been in the hands of Indian subjects of Her Majesty. Those traders have been settled there for several generations, and have carried on a very important and flourishing trade. From time immemorial the Indian merchants and the daring sailors from the West of India have had control of all the traffic round the coasts of the Indian Ocean. But the Germans have regularly harried all the settlements of British Indian subjects; men have had their homes destroyed and have been despoiled of their property; and scores of families have been carried by English men-of-war to Zanzibar in consequence of German interference. Is it to the credit of Great Britain that such interference by a Foreign Power should be permitted? With some knowledge of the East, I say that no more serious blow could be struck at the political honour and authority of England in the East than has been struck by the subordination of English power to Germany in East Africa. Will the Under Secretary give the House some information as to the decay of trade in that part of Africa as the result of German interference there? It would have been far better for this country if its Governments had stood up for the interests and the honour of British Indian subjects there, and had said that, whatever Germany might choose to do, we would suffer no interference with the interests of the British Empire. What have we to gain from the concessions to Germany in Africa? Why should we bind ourselves to one nation in particular? We have interests in Europe, Egypt, and in the far East, and it is necessary that we should cultivate friendly feeling with all European Powers; but why give any particular preference to Germany? What has Germany done for us? The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian spoke of civilisation as if German civilisation and English civilisation were the same thing. The civilisation of Germany is a much inferior article to the civilisation of England, and is very often quite antagonistic to it. The Germans are energetic and enterprising, and if they had some touch of magnanimity in them they might become the foremost nation in the world. But I believe that England, in the long run, will beat the Germans out of the field; and I maintain that the Government of this country is bound, in considering what they are doing in East Africa, to pay, first of all, some regard for national interests, and afterwards to keep on terms of a good understanding with other Powers. Germany will respect this country more if we stand up for our interests instead of conceding everything she demands. Now a word upon these Chartered Companies so often alluded to. Of course, these companies do not carry on their work for the sake of putting down the Slave Trade or stopping the drink traffic. Quite lately we had a Debate upon a subsidy to be granted to a line of steamers trading to the East African ports, and I find I have been upbraided in the newspapers for saying England is incurring responsibility by having those Chartered Companies. I am not at all afraid of responsibility, which England is now better able to undertake than she ever was before. But whether England should work with Chartered Companies is quite another question. I think that Chartered Companies are an anachronism. The Chartered Company which was established in India raised armies, collected revenues, established States, and reigned over vast provinces. But it would not have been able to do that under the direct and immediate control of the British House of Commons. As it was, it took 200 years and constant wars to establish itself in India. That is completely out of the question for the African Companies, which cannot move a step without having their actions reviewed and questioned in the House of Commons. Mr. Stanley said that if the House of Commons did not give the East Africa Company its help and support against the Germans, that company would have to give up its civilising and beneficent work. If that is the case, it becomes a question whether we ought to give the companies all the profits, while the taxpayers of England have the cost of protecting them. Surely it would be better for the State to undertake the business itself rather than trust to those Chartered Companies.

(10.47.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I do not think we are quite prepared to take the view of the hon. Gentleman. Of course, we all agree we are a great nation with a noble mission; the only question is to the manner in which we should extend British dominion and carry out our noble mission. Much has been said of the East Coast of Africa. I have something to say of the West, and wish to refer to a matter which occurred near Sierra Leone, and is referred to in the Blue Book C5740. Probably some hon. Member may remember that a little while ago I called attention to the manslaughter of a native by a British subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: An Amendment has been moved to reduce the Vote on Account of Foreign Office policy, and this is now under Debate.

MR. PICTON: I was not in the House, and was unaware that an Amendment had been moved.

(10.50.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham has a false idea when he blames the leader of the Opposition for encouraging the Germans to go to East Africa. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, in my opinion, pursued a very strong African policy, and left our position in Africa much better than he found it.

An hon. MEMBER: The Transvaal?

COLONEL NOLAN: But the Transvaal was annexed by a Conservative Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

COLONEL NOLAN: Well, I do not want to talk about that, though I am quite ready to do so. The hon. Member for Oldham spoke in a deprecatory way of Mr. Stanley, who is certainly the greatest traveller who has lived in our time. [Cries of "No," "Livingstone."] Well, it is matter of opinion; I think him the greatest traveller since Marco Polo. He certainly can speak with knowledge and experience, and he has told us that there are vast tracts of Africa fit for the settlement of white men. The hon. Member for Oldham speaks of the unhealthiness of the East Coast, and there he is right; but what Mr. Stanley means is inland territory, 600 or 700 miles above sea level, and he declares that he has seen immense tracts well adapted for white settlement. I am afraid there is a good deal of what is very much like cant talked about our noble motives and civilising influences. The Slave Trade, of course, we can take credit for endeavouring to suppress, and, naturally, we do not wish to have those under our authority debauched with bad liquor, nor would we here, if we could help it; but I do not believe that in Africa or here you can keep liquor out. Since exploration opened up the interior of Africa to European enterprise, there has been a scramble among Continental nations for a portion of it; and it has, therefore, become an absolute necessity for England to see that it gets its fair share. Unless the country is annexed in a formal manner, it must become a prey to filibustering expeditions. It is perfectly legitimate to extend British influence and dominion, though, of course, it is a matter that must be carefully watched. But a quarrel with Germany, leading to a war, would, whatever else might be the result, mean an expenditure that half a century's occupation of Africa would not balance. It is well to note that the spread of Christianity in Africa is but slight compared with the spread of Mohammedanism. This last is spreading among the African tribes at a tremendous rate. For my part, I have some respect for the Mohammedan religion; it is certainly better than Paganism, and there are points in it not unlike our own.

The Chairman

THE CHAIRMAN: But this has nothing to do with the policy of the Foreign Office.

COLONEL NOLAN: On that point, Sir, I bow to your ruling. Knowing that half the world's wars have arisen out of religious causes or pretexts, I very much doubt that this has nothing to do with Foreign Office policy. But though I am not convinced I shape my conduct by your ruling. I would only remark that I do not think the hon. Member for Oldham has any cause to reproach the leader of the Opposition, who has left this country in a splendid position in Africa, a position which Lord Salisbury seems in danger of frittering away.

DR. TANNER: I sincerely hope that hon. Members opposite, having spoken at such length and with such vehemence and caustic assertion, will now act up to the opinions they have advocated by going to a Division, and I shall support them with the very greatest pleasure.

(11.1.) The Committee proceeded to a Division:—

Dr. TANNER was appointed one of the Tellers for the Ayes, but no Member being willing to act as the second Teller for the Ayes, the CHAIRMAN declared that the Noes had it.

Original Question again proposed.

(11.4.) DR. TANNER: Several admirable works have been supplied to Members of this House, and this is a Report which I hold in my hand by one of the accredited Agents of Her Majesty's Colonial Office. It records a very sad state of affairs, indeed, in the Caicos Islands. We have had an extremely interesting discussion on land grabbing in Africa, and as to whether Germany or Great Britain is to become possessed of certain vast territories. Hon. Members opposite have spoken of a bastard Imperialism, and I thought of the Government policy at Tipperary. While all these discussions occur, here we have a Report of the condition of these islands, in which the state of affairs is most deplorable. The Report is signed H. M. Jackson, who says that experience shows that once in three years the rainfall is insufficient to nourish the crops to feed the people who grow them. One of three results, Mr. Jackson says, is certain. Either the lands must be abandoned, or the people must starve, or the Government must provide for the wants of the increasing population. This Report has been in the hands of Members since last October, yet it seems to me an extraordinary fact that we have heard not one word about the condition of these people. I know that there are hon. Members who are anxious to deal with certain other matters—to deal with a pauper population nearer home, pauperised by the savage action of certain individuals, aided and abetted by Her Majesty's Government. I am not, therefore, going to pursue the obstructive tactics of hon. Members opposite, who, after talking 2½ hours, have not the courage to go to a Division. This Report shows that the wells in the Caicos Islands are at least four miles walk from the town, and that a very small quantity of water can be obtained for drinking purposes. Means are required to enable these unfortunate people to exist; and the First Lord of the Treasury might have been here to subdue the intolerable ardour of his followers, who talked for hours without coming to a result, so that some attention could have been given to this subject. If Her Majesty's Government are so very anxious to conciliate the German Emperor, let them give up Heligoland, our possession of which is a menace to the German Empire. Heligoland is nothing better than a bathing place in the North Sea, patronised by the Germans. Her Majesty's Government, instead of allowing the German Emperor to say in Africa "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," might do more to conciliate the German people by giving up Heligoland than could be accomplished in any other way. The island is useless to us, either for commerce or as a shelter for our vessels of war. I think a great deal might be done if this little island were given up to the German Emperor in establishing a modus vivendi between the two countries. I sincerely hope that Her Majesty's Colonial Secretary will give some answer to these observations, notably as to the state of affairs in the Caicos Islands.

BARON H. DE WORMS: I shall be very happy to give the hon. Member the information he desires when the Colonial Vote is reached.

DR. TANNER: I was not aware the Colonial Vote was coming on. I learnt these facts when I was enjoying the hospitality of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—having got this Report in prison. Other Blue Books were sent to me there which I shall take opportunity to refer to. I had time to study them.

(11.17.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I move to reduce the Vote of the Charity Commissioners by £500. The first duty of the Charity Commissioners is to inquire into the administration of Charitable Trusts. The second duty is to compel the production of accounts of expenditure and to audit such accounts when produced. My charge against the Commissioners is that they are appointed by the country to be custodians of money left for the poor. I maintain that they habitually neglect that duty; that the money left for the poor is stolen by the rich, is used for the purposes of the rich, is often lost, and in many causes misappropriated. By this pamphlet I find that the Charity Commissioners have sent in no Report since 1887, and previous to that since 1861 and 1856. The pamphlet was drawn up on information got from the Charity Commissioners. I went myself to the Charity Commissioners on many occasions, and I am bound to say that each time I was met with the utmost courtesy, and every desire was shown to afford me information. I do not believe the fault rests with the Charity Commissioners individually. I believe it only rests with the office of the Charity Commission, which does not attempt to perform the most elementary duty of protecting the property of the poor. I do not know why they do not do it. Probably because they have not a sufficient staff. Now, in the case of one charity they have not sent in accounts since 1879—something like 11 years—and I find the Trustees are a Duke, a Baron, a Baronet, two squires, and two parsons. Yet these men, who ought to know their duty, have not sent in accounts for 11 years. It is the duty of the Charity Commissioners to make these people send in their accounts, and the Act of Parliament gives them full power to do so. The money, no doubt, was wisely expended; but the poor of the parish knew nothing about it. As a rule, the Charity Commissioners do not make the persons having charge of these small village charities send in their accounts, and I ask what remedy have the poor under such circumstances? What opportunity have those whose life is spent at the plough to protect their own interests if their richer neighbours fail to do so? The Trustees of these charities are usually the churchwardens and overseers. We have a special Department whose business it is to protect the poor in these small places, and the charge brought against those who compose that body is that in a large number of cases the Charity Commissioners fail in the discharge of their first and elementary duty. I assert that the Charity Commissioners permit the poor to be robbed of the money which is left for their use, and allow that money to be appropriated to some other use. What is this but theft? Take the case of the money left for Spiers' Charity as lately as in 1856. The amount was £8 a year, and I have the names and addresses of the churchwardens and overseers responsible for the distribution of that sum. I will not give the names, because I know that good work is not promoted by personal attacks on individuals. I may, however, say that that money is gone; it has been stolen by the men whose duty it was to distribute it amongst the poor. In another case, £3 8s. was left for the benefit of the poor, and of that sum £3 3s. was given to the Oxford Infirmary. In another parish £50 was left for the poor, and the executors refused to pay the money because of some difference as to whether it was left to the poor of one parish or of those of another parish, the result being that the executors have pocketed the money, and the poor have derived no benefit from it to this day. In another case, £35 a year was left for apprenticing the children of the poor. Of that sum £19

goes to a school account, which certainly is not apprenticing poor children. I have many more cases of the same kind in which money left for the poor has been appropriated to other purposes; but I will not go into them now. My third charge is that money left for educational purposes has been expended for other purposes. In one case the amount was from £120 to £130 a year. Then there is the case of Lady Saye and Sele's Charity in which £320 was left for apprenticing poor boys. How was that money expended? £30 went to the Brandon School, £40 to the schoolmaster, £150 for the repair of the parish church, and 10 guineas towards the salary of the parish clerk. Are we to pass these things over year after year? Who is to protect the poor if the Charity Commissioners do not? I hope I shall receive some assurance from the Treasury Bench that this duty imposed on the Charity Commissioners will be insisted on. I am sure that hon. Members opposite are as much interested in this subject as I am, and I trust they will support me in the action I am now taking, especially when they know, as many of them must know, that money left to educate poor children is really expended in saving the pockets of the rich, the poor deriving no benefit whatever from it. In many cases this is done deliberately, because in a large number of rural villages there is a strong objection to the education of the poor, those of the better class saying, "What are we to do for servants if the poor are educated?" My remarks are not meant in any way as an attack upon the Government; but I assure them that this is a matter of burning importance in the rural districts, where, in most cases, a small sum—say of £10 or £12—devoted to a scholarship would act as great a stimulus to a village school as an exhibition of £50 or £100 in a large public school. I hope the Government will see their way to press this important duty on the Charity Commissioners.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £7,000 (Charity Commission), be reduced by £500."—(Captain Verney.)

* (11.27.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I certainly agree with the

hon. and gallant Gentleman that the matter is one of great importance, and although it does not come within my special province, nevertheless as the appeal has been made to me in the absence of my hon. Friend (Mr. W. Lowther), I will ask leave to say a few words upon the subject. The cases quoted by the hon. and gallant Member are cases coming under Endowed Schools schemes, and it is clear, therefore, that the Charity Commissioners are in no way responsible.

CAPTAIN VERNEY: They are responsible to this extent, that all Charity Trustees are bound to send in their accounts to the Charity Commissioners, and if they do not insist on this being done they are in fault themselves.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: At any rate, the matter is one which I regard as important, and I shall take an early opportunity of bringing it under the notice of the Commissioners. The complaint that the money of the poor is taken away and devoted to other purposes is a very old one; but if the hon. and gallant Member will furnish information as to specific cases, I will see that they are inquired into. With regard to the general scope of the speech on matters of administration I only wish the hon. Member will give me concrete evidence in regard to two or three cases, and I can assure him they will receive the utmost attention from myself, and I will bring them under notice in the proper quarter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(11.31.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to dispose of this Vote on Account to-night, and therefore I will only detain the Committee two or three minutes. There is a rumour that a certain vacancy in the High Court in Ireland is about to be filled up, and I submit that, if that is so, the filling of the vacancy will be a breach of an undertaking given by the Chief Secretary on the 14th of April, 1887, a few weeks after he assumed office. I am not going into the question generally of the condition of the Irish Bench; it is admitted substantially on all hands that that Bench is immensely overmanned, immensely overpaid, and immensely underworked. In his speech, in April, 1887, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the excess of strength in the Supreme Court of Judicature as a recognised evil in Ireland, and promised to bring in a Bill to reduce the number of Judges, stating that, without pledging himself to the number, the reduction would be three or four. I am unwilling to believe, in the face of that declaration, the right hon. Gentleman is about to do as rumour says. He has not fulfilled his promise to bring in a Bill for the reduction of the Bench, the strength of which he admits to be in excess of the public requirements. I find that the Irish lawyers have distributed among them, in the shape of official salaries, a sum of £230,000 a year. The Irish bar is, I am told, about 1,000 strong, although there are only 300 in actual practice; therefore, the State pays at the rate of £750 a year for each practising barrister. I raise the subject briefly now, instead of on the Vote for the Irish Judicature, in order that the Chief Secretary may know that we protest in advance against the filling up of the present vacancy in the Queen's Bench Division.

*(11.37.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has, with great brevity and clearness, described the case which he has to make against our exercise of legal patronage in Ireland. Now, confining myself strictly to the question raised by the right hon. Gentleman, it is the case that I gave the pledge in question in 1887. Legislation was brought in accordingly, but it did not meet with any favour from hon. Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway, and it was found impossible, in the then state of Parliamentary business, to attempt to carry it that Session. I do not think any opportunity has occurred since in which the Government could possibly have brought in the Bill with any possibility of passing it. If that is true, the question is what course the Government should have pursued. The right hon. Gentleman would almost lead the Committee to suppose that it rests with the Government to determine whether the vacancy is or is not to be filled up. That is not the fact. In the absence of legislation it is obligatory on the Government to fill up the vacancy. No blame can attach to the Government if they fulfil a duty imposed upon them by Act of Parliament by filling up vacancies in the Judicial Bench. The right hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the present Government have never proposed to reduce the number of Common Law Judges. They have come to the conclusion that that would be inexpedient, and that the reduction should not be in that branch of the Judicial Service. But without further discussing what form legislation should take in the future, it is clear that if the rumour alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman is correct, and I do not suggest the contrary, no other course is open to the Government than to fill up the vacancy, and so to bring up the strength of the Judicial Bench to the limit fixed by Act of Parliament.

(11.41.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): As we are on the subject of judicial appointments, I wish to draw attention to a recent legal appointment in Ireland. Mr. Atkinson, Q.C., has recently been appointed Solicitor General for Ireland, and this gentleman was one of the counsel for the Times before the Royal Commission. I am given to understand that the Times has not paid its counsel their fees, and it appears to me possible that this appointment has been conferred upon Mr. Atkinson as a kind of quid pro quo. I should like to have an assurance from the Chief Secretary that, in his opinion, the obligation of the Times to pay its counsel remains as it stood before this gentleman was appointed Solicitor General, and is in no way wiped away by the appointment. Otherwise we find ourselves in the position of being called upon to vote money as a quid pro quo because this gentleman represented the Times gratuitously.

*(11.42.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government know nothing about the relations between the Solicitor General for Ireland and his private clients. Mr. Atkinson has been appointed to the post because there is no more eminent member of the Irish Bar.

(11.43.) DR. TANNER: I wish to ask whether the Chief Secretary has made any inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Gardiner, Resident Magistrate at Cork, and into the conduct of the Resident Magistrate at Macroom? Against the former gentleman a grave and serious charge has been made. We know well the character of the main portion of the scoundrels who are sent as officials to Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to maintain a body of extremely immoral and bad men in Ireland, he cannot do better than promote these two men. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to make an inquiry into the grave and horrible scandal attaching to Mr. Gardiner. Unless some investigation is made it will become my painful duty to follow the line of action which I adopted in regard to Captain O'Neill Segrave, whom the Chief Secretary had ultimately to dismiss. I call on the Chief Secretary to do his duty in the interests of justice.

*(11.48.) MR. F. S. WYKEHAM CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): I will only detain the Committee a minute, but I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is now prepared to grant to the Urban Sanitary Authority of Maidstone the sum of £300 to enable them to construct a main sewer, which is urgently needed in a district named Fant, where, owing to the present condition of affairs, diphtheria is raging, and there have already been some fatal cases? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give his immediate attention to this matter, as I feel sure the Local Government Board do not wish to be held responsible for any deaths that may occur.

*(11.50.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have given the matter my personal attention. What the borough of Maidstone are asking the Local Government Board to do is to enable them to borrow £300 for the purpose of committing a breach of the law. The Corporation of Maidstone desire to borrow £300 and to employ it in polluting a river. I have found myself quite unable to sanction the borrowing of this money for such a purpose. If the borough of Maidstone like to take upon themselves the responsibility of breaking the law, they have the means of doing so by taking the money out of the rates.

(11.52.) MR. SEXTON: Do the Government intend to suspend Mr. John Mackay, the County Solicitor of Tyrone? The facts of this case are that two men quarrelled outside that gentleman's house, and one having struck the other, he fell and broke a window in the house. Mr. Mackay came out of the house with a drawn sword, pursued the man, and struck him on the forehead, arm, and leg with the sword, and stated that if the man had refused to accompany him to the police barracks he would have murdered him. I wish to know what the Government intend to do with this man?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Although the criminal proceedings in connection with this matter before the Magistrates have terminated, there is still a civil action pending, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will see that it is premature to go into the case until that action has been heard.

MR. SEXTON: Of course; but I do contend that the offending official ought to be suspended from his office in the administration of the law. I am sure that no English official who had done such a thing as this man admitted before a Court of Justice he had done, would be allowed to retain his office.

DR. TANNER: I wish to know why Mr. John Slattery, now in Cork Gaol, is treated differently to myself? When I was in Clonmel Gaol I was allowed to see my wife in the Governor's room, and I ask that Mr. Slattery should be allowed to see his wife also. I asked for no favour for myself. We want no favour at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, whom we are always prepared to fight. With all his bravado and swagger in connection with his Irish administration, the right hon. Gentleman, although he draws a large salary, seldom ventures to enter the country. He gave us an assurance that this class of prisoners should be treated better than first-class misdemeanants, but he has broken his promise so far as Mr. Slattery is concerned.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that every prisoner in Ireland is treated strictly according to the rules prevailing with regard to the particular class to which he belongs. The rules that applied to the hon. Gentleman will be applied to Mr. Slattery if Mr. Slattery belongs to the same class.

DR. TANNER: Very well, that is all I ask for.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again to-morrow.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT BILL. (No. 264.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

Amendments made; Bill to be read the third time to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SLANDER LAW AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 278.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 2nd June.

WORKING CLASSES DWELLINGS BILL. (No. 279.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(12.10.) DR. TANNER: I beg to move that you, Sir, report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Tanner.)

(12.10.) MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): The object of this Bill is merely to enable gifts of land to be made for the erection of houses in populous places. According to the present law this cannot always be done, and it is in view of the munificent gift of a countryman of the hon. Member, made to the Metropolis recently, and to the gifts made by Earl Cadogan and others, that this Bill is introduced. I trust the hon. Member will not oppose the passage of this Bill, which is so obviously for the good of the community in Ireland as well as in England.

(12.11.) DR. TANNER: I would sooner be guided by the advice of my friends in this matter, and if the Bill is likely to be beneficial to Ireland I would rather take an assurance to that effect from hon. Members on this side of the House than from an hon. Member opposite. As my hon. Friends have given me that assurance I shall not oppose the Bill. I moved to report progress, but, understanding that the money which the measure has reference to is for the benefit of the working classes, I do not think I should be justified in offering further opposition to the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report the Bill without Amendment to the House."

(11.13.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to ask whether on the Report stage the Bill could be made general in its object? It may be general now, but we do not think so. Will it be so framed as to have regard to the working classes generally, and not merely the Guinness' Trust?

MR. LEES KNOWLES: The Bill is general in its terms. It has been submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, who approve of it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment; to be read a third time to-morrow at Two of the clock.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT (1876)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 247.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow at Two of the clock.

PAUPER LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) (OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 140.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 3, page 1, line 22, leave out from "payable" to "of," inclusive, in line 23, and insert "advanced, paid, presented for and raised in like manner as any other moneys advanced or raised for supporting and maintaining."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

(12.17.) MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the Attorney General for Ireland give us an assurance that between now and the end of the Whitsuntide holidays our representations in regard to this Bill will be considered?

(12.19.) MR. MADDEN: I considered the matter carefully when I put the Amendment down on the Paper, and the view I take is this, that it would be extremely inconvenient to extend this Superannuation Bill to a different class of officers than those provided for by the existing law. If the hon. Member will put down on the Paper what Amendments he thinks right I will give them the best consideration in my power.

(12.20.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): This is not a new measure in the House, and though it has been put forward by my hon. Friend to-night, it really comes from the other side of the House. Whatever course may be taken by the Government, I shall certainly not be able to assent to any proposal for enlarging the scope of the Bill.

*MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I appeal to the hon. Member opposite not to oppose the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not wish to disoblige the hon. Member, and I will not oppose the Bill.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): In the absence of any assurance from hon. Gentlemen opposite, I must move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Crilly.) put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday 12th June.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVANTS).

SIR J. GORST: I hope the House will allow a Select Committee to be appointed on the alleged grievances of the Uncovenanted Civil servants of India. It will be impossible for the Government to consent to the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) has given notice. I hope, however, he will not oppose the appointment of the Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I cannot consent to it.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I would appeal to the hon. Member to forego his opposition.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I appeal to the hon. Member to accept my Amendment.

OPEN SPACES BILL [LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday 9th June, and to be printed. [Bill 303.]

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.—(No. 298.)

Ordered, That the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills do examine the Aldershot Roads Bill, with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 23rd May, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—TITHE RENT-CHARGE.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he will state the amount of tithe rent-charge redeemed in Ireland since the Disendowment of the Church, and the average number of years' purchase at which the tithe rent-charges have been redeemed; and whether the Government have ever considered that any abatement in the tithe rent-charge ought to be made in consequence of agricultural depression?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The amount of tithe rent-charge in Ireland redeemed since 1869 is £230,579, the purchase-money for which has been £4,914,231, being 22½ years' purchase of the net rent-charge, poor rate being deducted, or about 21½ years' purchase of the gross rent-charge. The existing tithe rent-charges in Ireland are fixed by statute, and it would not be possible for any abatement on account of agricultural depression to be made without legislation.

RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a Post Office Circular was issued on 4th June, 1889, giving rural postmen in Ireland the option of starting on their return journeys one hour after their arrival at their respective destinations on bank holidays, and thus reducing their hours on duty; and whether this Circular has been acted upon; and, if not, would he explain on what grounds?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Yes, Sir, such a Circular was issued, and has been acted upon throughout England and Wales; but I understand bank holidays are not generally observed in Scotland and Ireland; and it has not, therefore, become necessary to apply it to either of those parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. HUGH GRAHAM, J.P.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. Hugh Graham, J.P., of Dromore, County Tyrone, recently suspended by the Lord Chancellor on charges of drunkenness and threatened assault, has yet been dismissed from the Commission of the Peace; and, if not, can he explain which of his magisterial functions Mr. Graham is forbidden to discharge by his suspension, and what is the distinction drawn between his case and that of Mr. George Sandes, J.P., recently dismissed from the Commission of the Peace by the Lord Chancellor, on the grounds that his retention in that capacity would not be in the interest of the Public Service?

MR. MADDEN: Mr. Hugh Graham, J.P., of Dromore, County Tyrone, has not been dismissed from the Commission of the Peace, as the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, after full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, was of opinion that the facts did not call for such a course. There was no charge of threatened assault, but of two cases of alleged intoxication. His suspension precludes him from sitting on the Magisterial Bench until further orders, meanwhile his conduct being under the Lord Chancellor's observation. The different decisions arrived at by the Lord Chancellor in the two cases referred to were arrived at after a full review of the facts disclosed in each case.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is this gentleman, in the meantime, discharging magisterial functions which do not relate to the administration of justice?

MR. MADDEN: He has been suspended from the discharge of all his magisterial functions.

COUNTY COURT JUDGE HICKSON.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the action of County Court Judge Hickson in the case of the "Guardians of the Mullingar Union v. Murray." heard at the recent Quarter Sessions for Westmeath, and to the resolution adopted by the Guardians on the same subject, published in the Westmeath Examiner of the 17th instant; if it is a fact that Judge Hickson first dismissed the case on its merits, and in two days afterwards stated to Mr. Downes, the solicitor to the Guardians, that he was anxious to have the case re-opened; whether the Guardians, having agreed to the proposal, the Judge, without re-hearing the case, again changed his mind and directed the Clerk of the Peace to inform the solicitor that he would allow the dismissal to stand; and whether he will ask the Lord Chancellor to request Judge Hickson to furnish an explanation of his reasons in acting thus with regard to this case?

MR. MADDEN: The matters referred to in the question are matters which occurred before the Judge in the discharge of his duty as a County Court Judge. It would be improper for me on behalf of the Government to communicate with him as to the discharge of his duty in the capacity he fills.

POSTAGE TO INDIA AND AUSTRALIA.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what will be the effect upon the Imperial Revenue if, consequent upon the reduction of the colonial postage to 2½d. (estimated by him to involve a loss of £88,400), the number of letters to India and Australia be doubled; and what will be the financial effect of the same increase of correspondence if the postage on letters to India and Australia be reduced to one penny?

MR. RAIKES: As every letter for India or Australia carried for a postage of 2½d. would involve a loss, to double the amount of correspondence sent would but be to increase the loss; and, if the same increase took place in conjunction with a 1d. postage, the loss would, of course, be very largely augmented. With reference to the answer which I gave in this House on the 15th of May as to the estimated additional loss which the revenue would sustain by the establishment of universal penny postage, I may say that the sum of £400,000 then mentioned would be largely increased by any considerable addition to the correspondence.

THE INDIAN SALT TAX.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is a fact that the Indian Salt Tax was mainly if not entirely imposed in consequence of the loss which the Indian Government sustained by the fall in the gold value of the rupee; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State for India will, in view of the rise in the gold price of silver which has now taken place, bring the matter under the notice of the Governor General in Council, with the object of securing that at least a corresponding reduction shall be made in the Salt Tax?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State cannot admit that the increase of the Salt Tax in India was caused mainly, if not entirely, by the loss in exchange. That was one, but not the only one, of the causes which made the increase necessary. The Secretary of State and the Government of India are both anxious to reduce the Salt Tax to its former amount, so soon as it is possible to do so, but any statement at present would be premature.

THE LAND TAX.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardigan-shire): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that, on the 17th January, 1889, and 27th February, 1890, the Land Tax Commissioners for Banbury, Oxfordshire, obtained from Major H. C. Maul, of Horley House, Horley, two several sums of £5 12s. each, on the representation that the same were due from him to the Commissioners for Land Tax in respect of his tenancy of Horley House and premises, the last of the two sums having been obtained by the Commissioners under a threat of distress, although the Land Tax for the said premises had been for many years redeemed, and nothing was due to the Commissioners from Major Maul in respect thereof; if he will explain why it is that, although the Commissioners have admitted this to be the case, they refuse to refund the two sums of £5 12s. each to Major Maul; and whether he will institute inquiries, and direct that the two sums of £5 12s. each be returned to Major Maul?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be good enough to ask the question after the recess.

MAINTENANCE OF URBAN ROADS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has considered the effect of the recent decision in the Warminster case (with respect to the maintenance of urban streets and footpaths); and whether, in view of the fact that during the passage of the Local Government Bill, he more than once assured the House (see Hansard, vol. 327, pp. 1667, 1752), that it was not intended by the Act to throw upon the County Councils the whole cost of maintaining urban streets and footpaths, he will now consider the advisability of legislating to define the law and carry out the intention of the Local Government Act?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have as yet only seen a newspaper report of the judgment in the case referred to. From that report it would appear that the Court placed an interpretation on Sections 13 and 15 of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, entirely different from that which was usually adopted by the Local Authorities prior to the passing of the Local Government Act. The judgment, as I understand it from that report, is that the liability to maintain footways devolved on the County Authority under the Act of 1878, and that as the powers of the County Authority under that Act have been transferred to the County Council, the like liability now attaches to them. I am not aware whether it is the intention to bring the question before the Court of Appeal. At present, I can only state that the question will be further considered by the Government when they have seen a full report of the judgment in the case.

MEETINGS OF POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now aware that the police have, in certain towns in the Home Counties, made inquiries as to intended meetings of Post Office employees; whether the result of such police inquiries have been communicated to him; and if he will state through whom any correspondence or communication from the Post Office as to such inquiries has been made?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir, I am not. No such inquiries have been made with my knowledge, and I should certainly be aware of them if they had been made from the Post Office.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that instructions have in any and what case been forwarded from Scotland Yard to local police to inquire and report as to meetings of Post Office employees likely to be held in the Home Counties; whether these instructions have been sent to the local police at the request of the Postmaster General, or at whose request; and whether he will state the precise nature of the instructions to the police sent from Scotland Yard, and to what towns such instructions have been sent?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that no such instructions have in any case been sent to the local police from Scotland Yard.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: In consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to give notice that on the Estimates I will give details of cases in which the police have acted as I have stated, either with or without instructions.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): Have there been any inquiries by the police? May there have been communications which would not be called instructions?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware that there have been any. The information I have received is an absolute negative of the question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). If a different question is put on the Paper I will answer it.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Would the words "no instructions" used by the Commissioner of Police include telegraphic directions from Scotland Yard to the local police?

MR. MATTHEWS: Undoubtedly, Sir. If any such telegraphic communications have been sent I ought to have been informed of it, and I should not have given a negative as an answer.

BOW CEMETERY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to take any action on the Petition of the Mile End Vestry about Bow Cemetery?

MR. MATTHEWS: The resolution of the Mile End Vestry, which was in favour of closing Bow Cemetery, was referred by me to the Inspector of Burial Grounds, and he reports that, though the cemetery is gradually filling up, there is still room for common graves to be made. The cemetery has been placed under regulations sufficient to prevent any injury to the public health, and the Inspector has instructions to satisfy himself, by occasional visits, that these regulations are duly and fully observed.

MALTESE MARRIAGES.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether many mixed marriages, that is to say, marriages between Protestants and Catholics, have been celebrated in Malta during the present century, especially by the English chaplains resident there; and whether the project of law which the British Government has announced is to be introduced in the Council of Malta will have the effect of invalidating such marriages, and of rendering their issue illegitimate?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is believed that marriages between Protestants and Catholics have been celebrated by English chaplains in Malta, but that the same marriages have also been celebrated by the Roman Catholic priests. Care will be taken that the project of law to be introduced in the Council of Malta shall not have the effect of invalidating any past marriage.

THE RIDLEY COMMISSION.

MR. ROYDEN (Liverpool, W., Toxteth): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is intended that the provisions of the Treasury Order, dated 10th August, 1889, which gave effect to the recommendations of the Ridley Commission, and which are now under the consideration of the Treasury, on their application to the clerks of the Customs in London, will also be applied to the clerical staff of the Customs at Liverpool; and, if so, whether the Treasury will apply the same treatment to clerks of the present staff at both places whose positions are analogous?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer this question until the House meets on the Monday after the holidays.

THE CORPORATION "DESTRUCTOR."

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the nuisance (to which his attention was drawn in June last) arising from noisome smoke issuing from the chimney of the "destructor" belonging to the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, situated at Lett's Wharf, still continues; that it was particularly offensive on the 15th instant; and that complaint has been made to the Lambeth Vestry by Mr. Shiel, Police Magistrate; and whether he will take further, and effectual, steps to abate the nuisance?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am informed by the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London that the inquiries which they have made lead to the conclusion that the noisome smoke nuisance complained of does not proceed from the chimney of the "destructor" belonging to them, which is situated at Lett's Wharf. The Vestry of Lambeth, within which parish is the wharf referred to, state that there appears to be little doubt that smoke issues from the chimney of the "destructor," which gives out a faint, sickly smell, but the Vestry have never been able to obtain from the Medical Officer of Health a statement that such smell is dangerous to health. In the absence of this evidence the Vestry have been unable to take any action, except to keep a watch on the wharf from time to time. Looking at these replies, I will direct one of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board to inquire and report to me on the subject.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): As the matter is one which is causing a good deal of feeling, will the right hon. Gentleman receive any Memorials upon it?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly, Sir. I am glad at any time to receive communications bearing on matters connected with my Department.

SEA FISHERY COMMITTEE.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if, before publishing any Order for the formation of a Sea Fishery Committee for the coast from the Tees to the Donna Noth Beacon, he will consider the practicability of awarding at least two members to each considerable fishing port, so that the skilled fishermen of the ports may be represented on the Committee as well as the owners and other persons interested in the trade?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The question of the representation of the fishermen does not form part of the Order creating the Sea Fisheries District. As soon as the Order shall have come into force, the County and Borough Councils will appoint one-half of the Committee out of their own body. The other half of the Committee will consist of fishery members; and in making their selection I am most anxious to secure the services of representatives of all fishing interests, including, of course, skilled and practical fishermen.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD— MEDICAL REPORTS.

MR. ROWNTREE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if arrangements can be made to furnish copies of the Medical Report of the Local Government Board to the Medical Officers of Health in the more important centres of population without imposing upon them the cost of procuring them as private individuals?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board cannot undertake to supply generally to the Medical Officers of Health of the more important centres of population copies of the Reports of the Medical Officer of the Board as suggested. At the same time, I am fully aware that the Reports referred to would be of considerable assistance to the Medical Officers of Health in connection with their duties, and I think that the Sanitary Authorities would be justified in purchasing copies for the use of the authorities and their officers.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great interest which is taken, not only in Western Australia but in all the other Australian Colonies, in the passing of the Western Australia Constitution Bill, he can state on what day the next stage of the Bill will be proceeded with?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am not yet in a position to state on what day the next stage of the Western Australia Constitution Bill will be taken.

SUGAR CONVENTION BILL.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government consider that they have the power, and whether they have the intention, to ratify the Sugar Convention Bill without the previous consent of Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It does not appear to us that the Sugar Convention can be ratified consistently with the obvious intention of its provisions until the legislation which is necessary to carry it into effect has received the sanction of Parliament.

THE GOVERNMENT LICENSING PROPOSALS.

MR. A. C. CORBETT (Glasgow, Trade-ston): I beg to ask whether the Government have any further information regarding the public meeting in Bridgeton, which the President of the Local Government Board quoted as an indication of public sympathy with the Government proposals which conflicts with the facts stated in the following telegram:—

"From inquiries made find that it was publicans not public meeting in Bridgeton; about dozen present. Brown, the sender of telegram to Ritchie, is a publican.—(Signed) MACKAY."

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Are the Government prepared to make any statement on the subject?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no information on the subject. It is usual when an hon. Member asks a question of this character to give notice of it.

DISTRESS IN THE SOUDAN.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he has received any information as to the appalling condition of the people at Suakin, Kassala, Berber, and elsewhere? Perhaps I may be allowed to read the following extracts from letters I have received:—

"You have no idea of the awful state the country is in. The population are actually starving, and the people are like living skeletons. The greatest misery is amongst the widows and children of the men we have killed, of whom there are over 100,000. Cannibalism has taken place; everything has been eaten; dogs, cats, rats, donkeys, snakes, lizards, old bones, and leather are eagerly devoured; and the stronger take by force from the weaker. I have seen a big boy seize a small one and try to strangle him for the food that was in his mouth. This is at Suakin. At Tokar things are worse. From 50 to 100 and sometimes more die daily. Kassala they say is still worse, whole families being found dead in their houses. At Gallabat and Gedair the population nearly cease to exist. At Berber, Shendy, and Metemmeh the same. At Halaib, Mahamed Ghoul, and Aghig the distress is also intense."

I beg to ask the Under Secretary whether, considering our national responsibility, we ought not to be prepared to take further measures to alleviate the distress, or whether an official communication cannot be made to the Lord Mayor to call a meeting to consider this exceptional and dire distress?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman showed me the question as I came into the House. I answered a similar question a few days ago, and I then stated that the Government have every reason to believe that distress in the Soudan is extreme, principally owing to the failure of the crops in successive years—a failure that has produced a state of things with which the Government are unhappily acquainted in India when actual famine has occurred. Some of the figures of the hon. Member are, I think, exaggerated, but, notwithstanding, the Government are informed that there is extreme misery, and that many widows of persons killed in the war are in a state of destitution. The places in the interior are entirely beyond our jurisdiction or control. In the neighbourhood of Suakin the officials of the Egyptian Government are giving liberal supplies to the necessitous. The last account states that at the least 2,000 a day are being fed, and that the worst cases are being treated in the hospital. No doubt a great many deaths have occurred, and there is room for benevolence in the shape of relief; but, as regards the interior, it is not in the power of the British or of the Egyptian Government to give any relief.

THE BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: I wish to put a question to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he has seen in the newspapers a telegram to the effect that a United States Revenue cutter has been ordered to cruise in the Behring Sea, and to dismantle any vessel violating the Statutes? I wish to know whether the British Government have given instructions for the protection of our vessels engaged in their legal trade?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In answer to my hon. Friend, I can only say that as communications on this subject are still proceeding, I am not at present in a position to make any further statement with respect to it.

MR. S. HILL: In view of the grave public importance of the matter, I beg to give notice that I will bring it before the House on the Motion for Adjournment.

THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will extend the same consideration to Scotland as he has to Ireland, and undertake that no Scotch business should be taken in the first week after the Recess? I wish, at the same time, to express my personal obligations to the right hon. Gentleman for the extension of the holidays.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If it is the wish of hon. Members from Scotland that no Bill affecting Scotland should be taken during the first week I will endeavour to comply with it. It is probable that some measure may be taken that might refer in a general way to Scotland, but that would hardly come under the hon. Member's objection.

MR. B. ROWLANDS: When will the Tithes Bill be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Probably on the first Thursday after the holidays.

MR. SEXTON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer promised to announce what course would be taken in regard to Supply after Whitsuntide.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: So little time has elapsed since that statement was made by my right hon. Friend that the Government have been unable to consider the question, and I cannot state the exact course that will be taken.

MR. SEXTON: I will renew the question on the Motion for Adjournment.

MEETING AT NEW TIPPERARY.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether, in view of the extensive arrangements which have been made for the meeting at New Tipperary next Sunday, when many public men will be present, and excursion trains run, the Government intend to exercise their powers to suppress the meeting? I think it would probably be inconvenient, if not dangerous, to allow the matter to remain as it is.

MR. MADDEN: The Chief Secretary, in answering the question yesterday, gave all possible information on the subject, namely, that a meeting of a certain character could not be allowed. I understand that at the time my right hon. Friend gave that answer no formal announcement had been made as to the character of the meeting. The authorities must hold themselves free to act in the matter as they think best for the preservation of the peace of the locality.

MR. SEXTON: The House will agree that an intolerable situation is created. Everybody knows what has been arranged. Four Members of Parliament intend to address an open-air meeting of their constituents. I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to define what kind of meeting is to be prevented and what kind allowed.

MR. MADDEN: I would suggest that the hon. Gentleman should repeat the question on the Adjournment, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be in his place.

MR. SEXTON: Very well.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: I wish to ask whether, if the people insist on assembling, force will be used to suppress the meeting; and, if so, whether that pillar of our civilisation, the Hotchkiss gun, will be employed?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES.

Return ordered—

"Showing the number of Public Houses that have a certificate from Licensing Justices, but whose owners, in respect to whom the certificates have been granted, have not applied to the Excise for an Excise Licence."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 220.)

Lords Amendments to be considered upon Monday 2nd June, and to be printed. [Bill 317.]

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.)

*(245.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise to move the Resolution which stands upon the Paper in my name, namely,—

"That after Whitsuntide, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at Three of the clock, and that Government business have priority on Tuesday; that Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the other days of the week."

I can assure the House that no explanation is necessary for my making this proposal. The circumstances of public business require it, and I hope it will be accepted without much discussion. I observe that the hon. Member for Crewe

(Mr. M'Laren) has an Amendment on the Paper to exclude from the operation of the Resolution Tuesday, June 3, so that the Motion on the extension of the franchise to women may be discussed. I would suggest, however, to the hon. Member that instead of moving an abstract Resolution on that subject he should, early next Session, bring in a Bill dealing with the question, and so test the feeling of the House in that way.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That after Whitsuntide, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at Three of the clock, and that Government Business have priority on Tuesday; that Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the other days of the week."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(248.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am very much surprised that no reason has been given for a Motion which, at this period of the Session is absolutely unprecedented. But, while expressing my astonishment on that point, I am bound to say that, having regard to the deplorable condition of the public business, my right hon. Friends on this side of the House have already indicated, in what passed yesterday, that they do not intend to oppose the demand of the Government. The condition of business in the House is indeed deplorable, and I do not think that it has been so bad for many years. Up to now only six nights of the Session have been devoted to Supply, whilst in 1888, which was supposed to have been a particularly backward year, eight nights were devoted to Supply before the end of May, so that matters are really worse now than they were in 1888. But let me point out the great difference between this year and 1888. In 1888 the legislation of the House was sympathised with and generally approved of, while this year, unfortunately, the Government have so contrived that every Bill of the first class which has been introduced is not only objectionable in its details, but objectionable in its main objects, so that behind the legislative business there is no such momentum as in 1888. I am very much mistaken if even the supporters of the Government, to whose loyalty and constancy I am willing to pay a tribute, do not give their support with much reluctance and with very grave misgivings as to the wisdom of the measures for which they vote. The obvious remedy for the present backward state of business is for the Government to sacrifice certain of their measures, and they will have to do so before the end of the Session. But, in the meantime, considering that the necessary business of Supply and the whole condition of affairs are so backward, I do not think it is altogether unreasonable on the part of the Government to make a large claim upon the indulgence of the House. Nor can I forget that upon private Members' nights we have had a number of counts out, which further strengthens the claim of the Government. But while I am not prepared to resist the Motion, I must protest against the Resolution being looked upon as a precedent, inasmuch as it is only accepted in consequence of the backward state of the public business, which is due to the mismanagement of the Government. I am sorry that the Government have not resolved to take Day Sittings on Tuesdays and on Fridays, and to devote the Evening Sittings on those days to Supply. However, as the Government have decided otherwise I will not raise an objection to the Motion on that score. I do not think that hon. Members will vote against the Government proposal, however much they may dislike it, because I think that, in the circumstances of the Session, the proposal is justifiable.

(255.) MR. SEXTON: I wish to move an Amendment to the proposal of the Government which will come in earlier than the Amendment of the hon. Member for Crewe. I wish to point out that if the proposal of the Government is adopted there will be no opportunity for bringing forward grievances. Although £7,000,000 have already been voted in Supply, not a single penny of Irish Supply has been taken up to the present time, and, therefore, no regular opportunity has been afforded for discussing Irish grievances. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) holds a strong view that the proposal of the Government should not be assented to unless an undertaking is given that Supply shall be taken regularly once a week after Whitsuntide. As a matter of protest, I shall oppose the Motion, unless the right hon. Gentleman gives an assurance that after Whitsuntide Supply will be taken at least once a week, and I beg to move to amend the Resolution by inserting after the word "Whitsuntide" that "Supply be taken at least one day in every week."

Amendment proposed, after the word "Whitsuntide," to insert the words "Supply be taken at least one day in each week and."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry the hon. Member has thought it necessary to move a formal Amendment. It is one to which I cannot consent, because, in the making of arrangements for business, it is necessary the Government should have their hands free, so that they may adopt the course that is most convenient to the House, as a whole, and most conducive to the progress of business. The arrangement for the first week after the recess includes two days for Supply, at least—Monday and Tuesday. I am sure the House will see it is impossible for the Government to have their hands tied by a Resolution of this kind. The Government wish, as far as they can, to consider the convenience of hon. Members. The suggestion that the House should meet at 3 o'clock meets, I understand, with the concurrence of a majority of Members, for many Members rather object to coming down at 2 o'clock and again at 9 o'clock. This is a matter about which the Government have no strong feeling; but it is one they are bound to consider with reference to the conduct of business and the convenience of the House as a whole. In these circumstances I trust the hon. Gentleman will accept my assurance that I will endeavour to make progress in Supply as rapidly as I can.

MR. SEXTON: It is not rapidity I ask for, but regularity.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: At all events, the hon. Gentleman will see that whoever is in charge of the business could not accept a positive direction of this kind, under which it would be absolutely impossible to conduct the business. When the House gets into Committee on a Bill, I believe the House is in favour of proceeding with it from day to day until the Bill is through Committee. The Government will at all times be glad to give the most careful consideration to suggestions from any part of the House with a view to making such arrangements as will, on the whole, best meet the convenience of hon. Members.

*(3.5.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): In making future arrangements for the conduct of public business in this House there are two Government measures to which I wish to draw special attention. One is a Bill which has been sent down from the House of Lords—the Indian Councils Bill—in regard to which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is under a specific pledge to the House. I will only remind the House that I refrained from raising any question on this subject by Amendment to the Address on the distinct understanding that at least a real opportunity would be afforded for discussion. One of the matters which I should have felt it my duty to urge was the question of the extension of the Legislative Councils of India and the introduction of some principle of representation in reference to members. Although that Bill came down to this House from the House of Lords before Easter it has never yet been put down on the Paper as the First Order or even as an early Order. I am not prepared to deny that there is great pressure upon the Government in reference to public business, but I would venture to suggest that some day soon after the re-assembling of the House after the Whitsuntide recess might be fixed for the Second Reading of the Bill, so that hon. Members may know when it will be taken, and might be prevented from coming down day after day, simply because the Bill is on the Paper, with very little prospect of its being brought on. The question is a very grave one, affecting, as it does, the interests of more than 210,000,000 persons in India, and as I refrained from raising any Indian question upon the Address I think I am entitled to make this demand. All that I ask is that the Bill may be taken on an early day, and that a couple of days' notice may be given, so that Members may not come down fruitlessly. The next measure is the Employers' Liability Bill. The Government have been under a pledge, repeated for years in succession, to amend the law, but they have made no real effort to do so. In 1888 they did introduce a Bill which went before a Grand Committee, but it was not introduced at all last year, and in its present state it would raise more discussion than the earlier Bill did. The Bill has been mentioned three times in three Queen's Speeches, and the Government ought to let the House know whether it is to be persevered with now.

(3.10.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): May I ask what is going to be done about Scotch Private Bill legislation?

*(3.11.) MR. C. GRAHAM: I wish to support, as strongly as I can, the claim for time to discuss the Employers' Liability Bill, and also to urge that the Miners' Eight Hours Bill should receive some attention. Both of these are measures of vital importance to the working classes, and at the earliest moment they ought to be discussed by the House, in order to convince the working classes that we do sometimes occupy ourselves with their affairs. The Miners' Eight Hours Bill has also been introduced for three successive years, and it is a measure upon which we have had a distinct expression of opinion from a large majority of the persons concerned. A conference of miners, representing 350,000 men, have unanimously declared in favour of the Bill. Then, again, there is an important measure which affects the extension of the Parliamentary Franchise to Women. On this side of the House we have received a whip to-day asking us to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Crewe to secure a discussion of this measure on the 3rd of June.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now discussing a Motion in regard to which there is a notice already on the Paper.

(3.13.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am not convinced that there are a majority of miners in favour of the Eight Hours Bill. In reference, however, to the remarks of the First Lord of the Treasury, I fear that he does not quite appreciate the motive with which the Amendment has been moved by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sex-Mr. Bradlaugh ton), which is that Supply should be fairly taken at a reasonable period of the Session, and not put off to the close of the Session, to be taken under pressure and in a perfunctory manner. What is desired is that Supply should not be put off until the far end of the Session, and then run through in one day.

(3.14.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I must remind the Government that hopes have been held out that the Eight Hours Bill would have been discussed before this period of the Session. There are many thousands besides miners who wish to have this question discussed.

(3.15.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I do not believe that business has ever before been so backward at this period of the year. In the last three Sessions the average number of days required for Supply has been 37; and last year at this date 20 had been already given to Supply, and in the previous year 10 had been devoted to it, in spite of which it was necessary to have an Autumn Session, in which 22 days were given to Supply in the months of November and December. In the present year only seven days have been devoted to Committee of Supply, and between the present time and August 20 there are only 44 days which could be devoted to Government business. If 30 of these are given to Supply, to make up the customary 37 days, only 14 will be left for other Government business. There ought to be an understanding that a reasonable proportion of the remaining time will be given to Supply. Personally, I should have been glad if the Morning and Evening Sittings were continued—[Cries of "No, no!"]—but at least one day a week ought to be given to Supply. I hope the leader of the House will take the figures I have given into consideration. Our real difficulty has been caused by the ambitious Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the introduction into the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill of highly contentious matters, which have already occupied the attention of the House for 11 days.

(3.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 117.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

Main Question again proposed.

* (3.32.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to move as an Amendment, after "Tuesday," to insert—

"Except on Tuesday, June 3, when the first Notice of Motion, Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women), shall take precedence."

I am obliged to the First Lord of the Treasury for the kindly tone in which he referred to this Amendment, but I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the advice which he has given to me is advice which I cannot possibly accept. If my Motion were to be carried, the subject to which it refers would certainly be considerably advanced in Parliamentary importance. It should not be forgotten that earlier in the Session—on March 4th—I obtained precedence by the Ballot for a Motion similar to the one which now stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for the Leigh Division of Lancashire (Mr. C. Wright), but the exigencies of the business of the Government rendered it necessary that I should give up that day. On that occasion I asked the First Lord to promise that he would not again take our day away, and he said he would not do so mischievously or wilfully. He is now breaking the spirit of that promise, for there is no need to take this evening. I will suggest instead that the Government should take Wednesday, June 4, which is the Derby Day, for their business instead of taking four hours on the previous evening, which would do them very little good indeed. The opportunity is not taken away by the mere exigencies of public business. There is always what I must call an intrigue to prevent the subject of Women's Suffrage being discussed, and it is a matter of common notoriety that the senior Member for Northampton has a full share in making these arrangements. I do not say that the First Lord of the Treasury knows of it; perhaps these things are purposely kept from his knowledge, in order that he may be in a position to deny them. But they are within the knowledge of his Whips. I now press the Government to leave us one evening of four hours. We have had great ill-fortune with this Bill. In 1887, it had the first place on the Paper on July 20th, and that day was taken from us by the Government, on the plea of the exigencies of public business, although they refrained from giving us a day later on in the Session. In 1888 we had a very good place on June 6th, and we lost that day owing to the operation of the new Rule under which Bills not read a second time before Whitsuntide lost precedence. In 1889, one of my hon. Friends had first place for this Bill on the Wednesday before Good Friday, and a Memorial, signed by 170 Members, was presented to the First Lord, asking him to allow us to sit on that Wednesday. I am aware it is not a usual thing to sit on that day; but the Government have no hesitation in appointing Wednesday Sittings when they desire to get a stage of the Coercion Bill, although they seem to hold very different views when a Women's Suffrage Bill is under discussion. On the 25th April this year this Resolution stood second on the Paper, the first Motion thereon having reference to the duties on dried fruits. The Member who had that Motion on the Paper persisted in keeping it down in order to prevent the Women's Suffrage discussion taking place, though his subject had been dealt with in the Budget, and as I did not see why we should try to keep the House for him under those circumstances, I consequently took this Motion off the Paper, and immediately I had done so that hon. Member removed his Motion. I have reason to believe a similar arrangement has been made in regard to Tuesday, 3rd June. Now, I think we are making a reasonable request in asking the Government to defer the operation of the Motion they are proposing now until Friday, 6th June. The right hon. Gentleman, in moving his Resolution, said that four hours was, no doubt, a very short time, but a great deal of business could be done in it if the House only chose. Now, the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that on the 4th June we are going to waste six hours by not sitting on that day, which is Derby Day; and I will make a practical suggestion to him, that the Government should take their business on Wednesday, the 4th June, and give us this Tuesday. The right hon. Gentleman refuses. That only shows what a sham is his plea about the necessity of taking our four hours. We are now three or four months from the end of the Session. We desire to get a discussion on this question. It has been agitated a very long time by a large number of women throughout the country, and I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to do us this justice, and allow us to debate the matter. One of the women who have been most actively engaged in this movement asked me the other day why we were prevented having a Debate—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not adhering to his Amendment.

*MR. M'LAREN: Well, then, Sir, I will simply say I ask the House to pass my Amendment simply as an act of justice. As the subject has been deliberately shelved by this Parliament, I intend to divide the House.

Amendment proposed, in line 4, after the word "Tuesday," to insert the words—

"Except on Tuesday, 3rd June, when the first Notice of Motion, Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women), shall take precedence."—(Mr. Walter M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(3.45.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I rise to second the Amendment, as this is a subject in which I take great interest. I desire to put forward some reasons why this question should be discussed. There are a large number of reasons—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That line of argument is not in order.

*MR. WEBB: The question has been before the House on many occasions since 1870, and on many grounds it is desirable—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*(3.47.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): It is not often that I indulge in the luxury of voting with the Government, but on this occasion I shall certainly avail myself of the opportunity of going into the Lobby with them. I do not share the views which have been expressed by the hon. Member for Crewe. There are questions of far greater importance requiring debate than that of female suffrage. For instance, only the other night, by tactics which some of us took occasion to condemn, we were prevented discussing the grievances of a large number of working men—a subject which was to have been brought forward by the hon. Member for Woolwich. Then, again, there is the registration of voters question. Many of us—most of us I believe—desire to get rid of the anomalies that surround the present system; but we have never yet, either by Bill or by Resolution, succeeded in getting a day to consider that question, which is of supreme importance. The hon. Gentleman is, therefore, not alone in the difficulty of which he complains. In the early part of the Session I was fortunate enough to get a good place for the consideration of a Registration of Voters Bill which I have brought in for four years, but the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury deprived me of the opportunity. I had just as much right to complain as has the hon. Member for Crewe, but I did not come down to the House with a whine on that occasion, but have ever since been trying for another chance to bring it forward. Then, again, there is the question of the water supply of London, which vitally affects the millions of people of London, and which we are anxious to get discussed. Many other questions also press for solution, all of them of far greater importance than that which the hon. Member for Crewe is anxious for the House to consider.

(3.50.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I intend to indulge in the same luxury as the hon. Member who has just spoken and to vote with the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe ascribes to design what really was chance. It is a mere chance that the hon. Gentleman has no opportunity of bringing forward his Resolution. As one of his own fair clients, the Duchess of Gerolstein, said, it is fatality. The hon. Member has accused the First Lord of the Treasury and myself of intriguing in order to prevent this Resolution from being brought forward. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord will allow me to protest in his name that there has been no sort of intrigue. The position of the hon. Member for Crewe is, I repeat, due solely to chance. He has referred to the fact that on one occasion a Memorial was presented to the First Lord asking him to pursue the exceptional course of making a House on the Wednesday before Good Friday, and he suggests that, owing to certain intrigues, that privilege was refused him. The hon. Gentleman forgets that there was another Paper signed—and signed by a large number of Members—against his proposal, and that, possibly, will account for the refusal of the First Lord to adopt his suggestion. Again, the hon. Gentleman complains that on the occasion on which he had secured second place for his Motion, the hon. Member for Glasgow would not yield to him and withdraw his Resolution upon dried fruits. He also states that, immediately he had taken his Motion off the Paper, the hon. Member for Glasgow also removed his, and this he quotes as another instance of intriguing against him. But the hon. Member for Glasgow had a reason for what he did. He spoke to me on the subject. He pointed out to me that he did not want to be interrupted in the middle of his speech by a count, and he asked what course he should take. I told him I thought it was a pity that he should only be able to deliver a portion of his speech, and that it might possibly be as well for him to choose a better moment for bringing it forward. That is why he took it off the Paper. Now, I am a person of principle. I have always opposed Ministers taking private Members' nights, and, consequently, I am opposed to this Motion of the Government. But I have another principle upon which I act, and that is, that, when once such a Motion is carried, it is not wise to make exceptions in favour of anyone. I sympathise greatly with my hon. Friend in his disappointment; but I cannot consistently support his Amendment, because if it were carried it would be my duty to move a series of Amendments, asking that about 20 subjects should be exempted from the operation of this rule. Under these circumstances, I think it is no use further debating this Amendment, and that we may as well take a Division on the proposal of the First Lord of the Treasury. The hon. Member for Crewe has simply been unlucky, and he will have to grin and bear it.

(3.56.) SIR R. KNIGHTLEY (Northampton, S.): I think it is time some protest was made against this fresh raid on the rights of private Members. We have some right to complain of the mode in which this Motion has been brought forward. Had we had fair notice we might have secured an attendance of Members sufficient to defeat it; but as it is, we are completely powerless. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has got us by the throat. I do appeal, however, to that amiable garrotter to make this one exception to his Resolution.

(4.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 145.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

Main Question again proposed:

(4.10.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, Darwen): I desire to thank the First Lord of the Treasury and the Government on behalf of a great number of Members greatly interested in the Tithes Question for having promised to put down the Tithes Bill for the first Thursday after the Recess. I hope I may take that promise to imply a determination on the part of the Government to pass the measure with all due despatch. I am not disposed to blame the Government for having so long delayed progress with the Bill. I know the circumstances of the last few days have made it impossible to redeem the promise made that the Bill should be taken before Whitsuntide. At the same time, however, we cannot, in face of the history of the question, view without some anxiety the postponement of the Bill until a later day than was originally promised. Although I have every reason to suppose my right hon. Friend intends to pass the measure with all due despatch, in consideration of the fact that there is considerable agitation in the country on the question—and in matters of this kind, when agitation once begins, it is better to have the question settled one way or the other—I urge upon the First Lord to risk nothing. I hope we are to understand that the Bill will be passed this Session.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The right hon. Gentleman has not said whether the Tithes Bill will be the first Order on that day.

*(4.12.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall not put it down late.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Is it to be the business?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) thinks that the state of business is due to the fact that the Government have not proposed measures entirely agreeable to the Opposition. It is very singular that they have not done so. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite have themselves done what the Government now propose for the promotion of public business. I will leave it to the right hon. Gentleman to say how far the prolonged Debates upon the Budget Bill and other measures of the Government will account for the condition of business. The Government cannot propose measures to Parliament with reference solely to the views of the Opposition. They must have regard to what they believe to be for the public interest. I recognise the claim of the hon. Member (Mr. Bradlaugh) for the early consideration of the Indian Councils Bill, and it shall be brought forward so as to give him an opportunity of stating his views upon it. With regard to the Employers' Liability Bill, I desire that it shall be read a second time and considered again by a Committee, and I hope the result will be, what the Government very much desire, to settle the question in the interest of all parties. Supply will be taken on the Monday and the Education Estimates on the Tuesday after the holidays.

(4.16). Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved—

"That after Whitsuntide, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at Three of the clock, and that Government business have priority on Tuesday; that Standing Order 11 be suspended, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the other days of the week."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.—(No. 231.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

(4.18.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I do not want to occupy the time of the House unduly, and I do not want to prevent hon. Members getting away for their holidays, but some hon. Members on this side of the House feel that on every occasion they must oppose this Bill. They look upon it as part and parcel of the whole scheme for the compensation of publicans and the endowment of public house property. They can see the evil which this Bill is already doing. Accounts are arriving from the country as to the increase in the value of public house property since the measures of the Government have been before the House; and it is clear that if this goes on there will be a very heavy burden placed on the public. Two days ago the President of the Local Government Board said that he had received a telegram giving an account of a public meeting in Glasgow in support of the measure. The public meeting turned out to be a meeting of 12 publicans in a back parlour. That is the public opinion in support of the Government on this occasion. We would consider ourselves to be absolute traitors to our constituents and to the public good if we did not on every possible occasion offer every possible opposition to the passing of the most mischievous and most abominable measure which even this Government has proposed. I beg to move that the Bill be read a third time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(4.21.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I merely wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why it is a Return I moved for 10 days ago showing the military expenditure during the present year has not been already laid before the House? It is as well we should have had the Return before the Third Reading of this Bill, because I think it will be found we are spending for military purposes £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 over and above the amount provided for by taxation.

*(4.23.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): I had no opportunity on the Second Reading of entering my protest against the Bill. I therefore wish to join with my hon. Friend the Member for Cokermonth (Sir W. Lawson) in opposing the Bill. I look upon the Bill as introducing a principle most disastrous and most mischievous. I am informed by a leading man in the City that the shares of those large Brewery Companies interested largely in tied public house property are going up day by day since the policy of the Government on this point has been initiated. Whatever the good intentions of the Government may be, the actual effect of their policy is seen in the augmented value of public house property and brewery shares.

(4.24.) MR. T. FRY (Darlington): As I, too, had not an opportunity upon the Second Reading, I wish at this stage to join in the protest against this Bill. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer must now be satisfied that public opinion is growing exceedingly fast against this measure. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will find time on Saturday week to attend the Hyde Park meeting and see the large numbers who will flock to the Park to protest against the Government proposals. Reference has been made to the character of the public meeting held in Glasgow. To some extent the same remarks will apply to the meeting of the Church of England Temperance Society. Hon. Members have read that Canon Wilberforce has said he will never again go to a meeting of that body until the Council have purged themselves from the invitation which they have issued to their members to support the licensing proposals of the Government.

(4.25.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The right hon. Gentleman has promised a Select Committee to consider the financial arrangements as between the three countries. I suppose the Motion for the appointment of a Committee will appear in the Orders of the Day immediately after Whitsuntide. As to the Irish share of the money, I should also like to have a Return showing how the money is to be distributed during the first financial year, and eventually between the several counties and the corporations as soon as the principles of Local Government are extended to Ireland.

(4.27.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am sorry that it has not been possible to present the Return asked for by the right hon. Member for Bradford. I had hoped to present the Return yesterday, but the right hon. Gentleman is aware that it refers to Navy expenditure as well, and this involves dealing with two Departments instead of one. It has been found that it is not possible to follow exactly the wording of the Return, or to give the figures in the form in which they are asked for. There is not much alteration, however. It is extremely important in presenting the Returns to remember that the Treasury become responsible for the accuracy of the figures, and we, therefore, ask for a little indulgence, in order that we may have time to examine the figures carefully. I hope to be able to present the Return on the first day after the recess.

*(4.28.) MR. S. GEDGE (Stockport): Reference has been made to the action of the Church of England Temperance Society in this matter, and to the secession of the Rev. Canon Wilberforce. As everybody knows, Canon Wilberforce is a very extreme man. The action of the Society has been dictated by sound common sense, and by an earnest desire to promote true sobriety and temperance in every part of the country. It was because they recognised that the Bill was an honest and well-devised effort in that direction that they were glad to support it. If, as is alleged, brewery shares have gone up since the introduction of this Bill, the fact is solely due to the tactics of the Opposition. It is because of their constant misrepresentations of the scheme that people outside who have not closely studied the Bills believe their statements to be true, and that the Government really propose to compensate the publicans. Believing these misrepresentations, they naturally rush to buy the shares. They will find they are mistaken, and that the Bill does not propose compensation. The scheme is voluntary, and need not be put into operation at all by the County Councils unless they like.

(4.30.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I take the opportunity of expressing my opinion that there is no more hollow, unsecure Society to be found in England than the Church of England Temperance Society. I do not know of a single instance in which of two candidates before a constituency, the one in favour of temperance principles and the other not, the Church of England Temperance Society gave its support to the temperance candidate. I have never heard of a single instance. Canon Farrar has referred to the fact that of the 12 working-class Representatives in this House who are temperance men not one received support from the Church of England Temperance Society.

*(4.31.) MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know whether it is expected that I should answer the questions that have been put. I cannot undertake that the names of the Committee shall be put upon the Notice Paper immediately after Whitsuntide. The nominations and terms of reference will require a good deal of reflection. The hon. Member will recall to mind that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) expressed some doubt whether the Committee could be appointed this Session. We shall do our best for this Session, and, if the Committee cannot be appointed at once, at all events, we will proceed without delay to put together the information to be laid before the Committee. As to the Return asked for, I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but, of course, the points mentioned can be raised on the Local Taxation Bill.

MR. SEXTON: It will be rather late then to enter upon it.
Mr. Gedge

*MR. GOSCHEN: Well, it shall be provided at the earliest possible date. I will confer with my right hon. Friend on the subject.

(4.34.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I only wish to say, in regard to the hollowness of the Church of England Temperance Society, that I think there is something more hollow in the declamations against the Society by hon. Members who support the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson). Looking over the Amendment Paper I find the only Amendments of importance standing in the name of the hon. Member for Barrow (Mr. Caine) are those which emanate from the Church of England Temperance Society.

(4.35.) The House divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 67.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.—(No. 168.)

As amended, considered.

(4.45.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The new clause I have to propose has relation to the commencement of the Act. I have named the 1st of September next, on the assumption that the Bill will receive the Royal Assent by the end of June, and thus an interval of two months will elapse before it comes into operation.

New Clause, "This Act shall come into operation on the first day of September one thousand eight hundred and ninety," read a first and second time, and added to the Bill.

(4.46.) MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): In moving the new clause, of which I have given notice, I need not detain the House beyond a few minutes. I am glad to say that when the Bill was passing through Committee the right hon. Gentleman showed a certain amount of sympathy with the question which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Longford and myself, and promised to meet us as far as he could on the Report stage of the Bill. This new clause proposes to put some limitation upon the powers and duties of the officers who may be appointed under the Act. As the Bill at present stands those powers are absolutely undefined; but we want to provide that those who carry out the provisions of the Bill shall take action within a certain time, and practically the right hon. Gentleman has assented to the first part of the clause, for I understand he proposes to insert 21 days in Sub-section 6 as the period within which the powers of compulsory slaughter shall be carried into effect; but what I want the right hon. Gentleman to do is, when the slaughter has taken effect, to declare the area free from infection as soon as possible. Suppose the slaughter has taken place within the 21 days, and it is found that the slaughtered cattle were actually not suffering from pleuro-pneumonia at all, but were perfectly free from that disease, then I say there should be no delay in declaring the area free from the disease. Without some limitation of time, that will happen which happens under the existing Act, that the officials will allow a great number of days to pass without taking action at all, simply from thoughtlessness or carelessness, and dairy-men and others will thus be subjected to an unnecessary amount of expense and annoyance. I by no means insist on the two days mentioned in the Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman thinks that a longer interval is necessary; but, at all events, there should not be an unlimited time left open. Then the other branch of my clause refers to the other contingency, that after slaughter it appears that the cattle were infected with the disease. Here I propose that, in the same way, there shall be a limit to the ban which is placed upon the area or place. Upon the best advice I can get, it appears that 56 days is a sufficient interval wherein to decide that infection has disappeared after the diseased animals have been slaughtered, and I provide that the loss and annoyance to the proprietor shall not have an indefinite continuance. It is too often the case that in legislation on this subject the interests of the owners is lost sight of, and the officials are left too free a hand. The right hon. Gentleman has shown sympathy with our object in inserting the 21 days' limit in the first instance, and I hope he will see his way to meeting us so far as to fix some definite limit within which the declaration shall be made.

New Clause—

"The Board of Agriculture shall, within five days from the putting in force of the powers given them by Sub-section 6, Section 16, of the principal Act, cause all suspected cattle to be slaughtered.

- (1.) Upon such slaughter being carried into effect, should it appear that such suspected cattle were not affected with pleuro-pneumonia then the Board of Agriculture shall within two days declare by order any field, shed, yard, or other place, where such suspected cattle may have been, free from pleuro-pneumonia;
- (2.) Upon such slaughter, should it appear that such suspected cattle were affected with pleuro-pneumonia, then at the end of 56 days from the date of such slaughter the Board of Agriculture shall declare by order any field, shed, yard, or other place, where such suspected cattle may have been, free from pleuro-pneumonia."

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Clause be read a second time."

(4.53.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I join with my hon. Friend in recognition of the spirit with which the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to meet our wishes in providing that the decision as to exercising the powers of slaughter shall be carried out in a reasonable time. These powers having been carried out, it is reasonable that the declaration of infection should not be indefinitely continued in either contingency, whether the disease is found not to have existed or whether there is proof that it did exist. At present there is a minimum period within which the area cannot be declared free, and if the right hon. Gentleman thinks that under all circumstances it would not be safe to limit that period we do not seek to alter it, but, on the other hand, I agree with my hon. Friend there should be some maximum period within which the declaration of freedom from infection should be made.

(4.55.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am glad to find hon. Members approve of the Amendment I have placed upon the Paper proposing the limit of 21 days, and which I proposed with a view to meeting what, I think, were reasonable objections raised. Now, as to the first point raised in the present Amendment, that if animals are slaughtered, and it is subsequently found that they were not suffering from the disease, then the locality shall be declared free within two days, that contemplates a contingency which it is almost impossible can arise, because no slaughter could take place unless there was reason to suppose the disease existed. It is true that a number of animals suspected of disease might be slaughtered, but I do not think that circumstances could arise under which a general slaughter could be ordered, unless it was proved that some animals were infected with the disease, and the disease can always be detected. Then, as regards the second contingency with which the clause purposes to deal, the period of time within which it shall be obligatory upon the authorities to declare the locality free. This matter has been arranged, and is now carried out under the Act of 1878, and I have not found that the arrangements are defective, or that serious complaints have arisen of the administration under that Act. So many contingencies, so many conditions may arise known only to experts, who have to put into operation the provisions of the Act, that it is important to leave the officials the widest discretion. As a matter of fact, I am of opinion that to accept this second part of the clause might be to place the infected locality in a worse position. One good reason submitted to me is this:—A man in buying stock very often buys from one herd, and the stock when sent home are perhaps distributed over two or three farms. A case of disease breaks out in an animal in one locality, and the animal there being slaughtered, and within 56 days the place being declared free, what is the result? Immediately other stock are imported from the other two farms, with, perhaps, the consequence that there is a fresh outbreak of disease, among animals from the same herd originally. There is every desire on the part of the Board to administer the Act with the greatest possible consideration for the convenience of all concerned, but I am strongly impressed with the importance of leaving the widest discretion possible to those who have the responsibility of carrying out the Act, and I hope the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press the Motion.

(5.0.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): What I would point out is that we should secure uniformity of action and the co-operation of the different authorities in the boroughs and counties. That is far more important, I think, than laying down a hard and fast line. It is to be deprecated that while one Local Authority is doing its duty another one should be acting carelessly.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRILLY: In view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has an Amendment on the Paper which covers mine, I do not think it necessary to propose that which I have on the Paper. I am quite sure that when the Bill becomes law it will be carried out with spirit by the right hon. Gentleman, and that local officers will be subjected to a supervision which will free the owners of cattle from unnecessary delay.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would have no objection to issuing a Memorandum to the local officials.

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Amendments made.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 3, line 23, to leave out the word "General," and insert the words "Cattle Pleuro-Pneumonia."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. SEXTON: I believe the effect of this Amendment will be to enable the special losses incurred by certain Unions in Ireland, especially by the North and South Dublin Unions, to be defrayed out of the moneys provided by this Act. I should be glad to be assured of that fact.

MR. CHAPLIN: That is the effect, for the reason that much of the work to be accomplished has already been done.

Question, "That the word 'general' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'cattle pleuro pneumonia' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to move that the Bill be now read a third time.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I only wish to make one observation. I think there is one defect, though I thoroughly approve of the principle of the Bill. The Lord Advocate is not in his place to answer for Scotland. We have three alternatives—the local taxes, the taxation of the Nationalities, and—which the Government have been good enough to step in with—the Imperial Treasury. To that extent I take this opportunity of saying that I think the measure is defective.

MR. CRILLY: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has consented to send out a Memorandum to insist that the work under the Act shall not be delayed. I have received a telegram this morning which gives an instance of the vexatious loss caused by official delay.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am very much obliged to the House for allowing me to move that the Bill be read a third time. I readily undertake to issue the Memorandum to local officials.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 147.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4.

(5.7.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to move in Clause 4, page 2, line 27, at end, to add "whose deliberations shall be public." I do not think it likely that the President of the Local Government Board has the smallest idea how this clause will work; and I dare say he does not know much of the composition of County Councils. I have got a little information about the Bucks County Council, and who are likely to be the Committee to deal with allotments, one piece of information the right hon. Gentleman will be very glad to have. The Bucks County Council consists of three-fourths of Conservatives and one-fourth of Liberals, and I am very proud to know that the Liberals come from the constituency which I have the honour to represent, who are the gentlemen who are going to form the Committee and whose deliberations are to be private. I find no less than 40 Guardians on the

Buckinghamshire County Council out of 68 Members. There are 13 elected Guardians and 27 ex officio Guardians. These men are not likely to wish to upset the decision of the Rural Sanitary Authority, who are the Guardians. What check have we got upon them? The only check is publicity. If these men are going to try to shirk the duty imposed upon them, as I believe they will, it will only be a natural result. They do not wish to come to a decision against the Guardians, who have already done all they can to prevent the men getting their allotments. Therefore, I think we want publicity. Now, then, we have got, to begin with, out of 68 members, 40 Guardians. Out of the remaining 28 members of the Committee there are 10 tradesmen, eight gentlemen, three brewers, two farmers, two soldiers, two parsons, and one labourer. It is a singular thing that there are only two farmers out of that rural constituency on the County Council. Who are likely to be the gentlemen appointed? According to the Act they must be, I think, more than one-third of the County Council. That is not more than 27. That number would make a cumbrous Committee. Unless there is something in the Bill, the Committee will be able to hold its meetings in private. I suppose they would only appoint a small Committee, and the question is, what class of men are they likely to appoint? I should hope they would appoint some labourers upon it; but they are more likely to appoint Magistrates and gentlemen resident in the district, who, in the future as in the past, will do their utmost to prevent the labourers obtaining allotments under the compulsory powers of the Bill. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite say "no," but I can assure them I have been informed by different gentlemen that they strongly disapprove of these compulsory powers. I do not wonder at this. It is quite natural that they should disapprove of these powers, and do their best to oppose them. They say: "If you carry these compulsory provisions we will do all we can to prevent their being carried into execution." This has been said to me in the County of Bucks, which is a typical county, and I am very anxious that the Twyford men should get their allotments as soon as possible. I mean to go down there on Saturday and tell the men the Government are doing all they can to prevent their getting their allotments for the next two years. Why should these Committee meetings be held in secret? The Rural Sanitary Authority always holds its meetings in public with reporters present, and I believe that is the case everywhere. I think it would be deplorable if a body holding its general meetings in public and preventing the labourers from getting allotments should give them an appeal to a body meeting in secret. I believe the Committees of most of the County Councils hold private meetings; and unless the Bill renders these meetings public, I am afraid they will continue to be held in private. The labourers have already been waiting three years for their allotments; they are now told they must wait till next Michaelmas two years, and that then they must go before a body sitting in secret conclave if they wish to assert their rights, in which case they will be subject to all the pressure and influence which those who live on the spot know so well how to exercise. During the Committee on this Bill all the Amendments proposed have had but one object, namely, to make a bad Bill work better if possible. We have told the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) that the Bill will not work. He said it would; but if it is to work at all, we ought not to be kept waiting for two years to see how it will work. I cannot see why my Amendment should not be accepted. Why should not the tribunal of appeal to which the labourers must go be a public tribunal? As the meetings of the Sanitary Authority are held in public, the same rule should apply to the meetings of the County Council Committees to which the labourers must appeal.

*(5.20.) MR. RITCHIE: I cannot quite see the force of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's logic. He argues that, because the Sanitary Authorities have held their meetings in public, and have failed to do their duty, therefore we must compel the Committees of the County Council to hold their meetings in public likewise. How the hon. and gallant Gentleman can satisfy his own mind with such an argument I cannot possibly conceive. He has said a good deal of what is done in Bucks, and has told us that a large number of Guardians have there been elected on the County Councils. That, of course, is a matter for the electors of that county, but it would seem that if there be a large proportion of Guardians on the Bucks County Council, they have been put there because the electors have thought they have done their duty as Guardians. Unlike the hon. and gallant Gentleman I have full confidence in the discretion of the County Councils, and in their anxiety to perform their duties in a manner most in accordance with the interests of their constituents, and, for my part, I decline to be a party to fettering their action in this matter in a manner which is not applicable to any other portion of their duties. County Councils, including that of Bucks, do not hold their meetings in public. I remember the discussion which took place on this question of holding public meetings of the Committees of the London County Council, and on that occasion it was resolved by a large majority that those meetings should not be held in public.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 4, page 2, line 30, after the word "division," to insert the words "any County Alderman residing within and."—(Sir R. Knightley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.28.) MR. H. STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I hope that, as the House has already decided not to give prescriptive rights to Aldermen, the Government will not accept this Amendment. We had this question fought over and over again on the principal Act, with the result I have just stated; and as the right hon. Gentleman has hitherto resisted all the pressure brought to bear upon him in regard to this matter from the opposite side of the House, I trust he will not now listen to the Amendment moved from his own side, the effect of which would only be to delay the passage of the Bill.

*MR. RITCHIE: I quite sympathise with the object of my hon. Friend in the Amendment he has proposed, and, for my own part, I think that the presence of an Alderman residing in the locality might have a beneficial influence on the deliberations of the Committee. Still, I cannot but feel the importance of the objection taken by the hon. Member opposite; and, feeling that it would be illogical for us now to take up the position suggested by the Amendment, I trust my hon. Friend will not deem it expedient to persist in his Amendment.

SIR R. KNIGHTLEY: After what has been said by my right hon. Friend, I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

(5.30.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I am surprised to find that my right hon. Friend is accepting Clause 4, which has the direct result of limiting the powers of the County Councils, and also that he has accepted from an hon. Member who objects to the powers given to the Councils an Amendment which makes this clause still more drastic. If we are going to give these powers at all we ought to give them freely and to let the County Councils do their work in their own way. Why should we insist on having a Standing Committee at all? If the Council desire to have more than one-fourth, why should they not? We have already got three Committees, two of which—the Lunacy and Finance Committees—are, to some extent, independent, and why should you have another independent Committee, which may still further hamper the work of the Council? Everything which is proposed might be done by the Council itself, and the appointment of the Committee would only hamper the Council and detract from its dignity and general use. There can be no reason whatever for insisting on this limitation being placed upon the Council, whose powers are already unnecessarily and improperly limited. I wish we could persuade my right hon. Friend to withdraw this clause; but, failing that, I am glad to have this opportunity of entering a strong and vigorous protest against this bad system of limiting and violating the powers of the County Councils.

Motion made, and Question, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 5.

(5.35.) MR. H. STEWART: I propose to move the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division, the object of which is to substitute for the Sanitary Authority, as a body to which the County Council may delegate their powers as to the management of allotments, a Committee consisting of a member of the County Council for the district, two ratepayers chosen by the allotment holders, and two ratepayers chosen in open Vestry. By the Bill, as it at present stands, the County Council is to give the first consideration to a body which is discredited. For my own part, I would have preferred a Parish Council; but as we have been beaten on that point, I do press the Government to accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 3, line 20, after the word 'to,' to leave out the words 'the sanitary authority,' and insert 'a committee consisting of—(1) The member of county council for the district; (2) two ratepayers chosen by the allotment holders; (3) two ratepayers chosen in open vestry.'"—(Mr. Halley Stewart.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(5.38.) MR. W. H. LONG: I think the hon. Member who proposed this Amendment must have overlooked the fact that under this Bill the County Council has double powers; that it may either delegate its duties in this respect to the Sanitary Authorities, or, on the recommendation of one-sixth of the electors of the parish, appoint allotment managers. You thus have introduced the element of local administration. I think it is hardly worth while to appoint another method and to create another local Parish Authority. I trust that the Amendment will not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6.

Amendments made; Clause agreed to.

(5.42.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to move the new clause of which I have given notice. I think the proposal is a very reasonable one. It is that the school of the parish should, if in receipt of a Government grant, be a the service of the authority to which the allotment powers are delegated; of course on payment of any expenses that may be incurred. I do hope that the Government will accept this proposal.

New Clause (Use of School on Payment of Expenses.)—(Captain Verney.)—brought up, and read the first and second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

(5.44.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I trust the Government will accept this new clause. It must be borne in mind that the case of a rural parish is very different to that of a town. In the latter there is usually a town hall, where public business may be transacted, but most villages are entirely without a public hall of any kind, and the parish school is the most suitable building for the purpose. Surely the Government might consent to allow schools to be used for this purpose?

(5.46.) MR. W. H. LONG: I can assure the hon. and gallant Member that the Government entirely sympathise with the spirit of the Amendment, but all those who are conversant with village life must be aware that the Educational Authorities have found great difficulty from the somewhat too frequent use of the school buildings. The Government do not disapprove of the object of the Amendment at all, and they will consider the question between this and the Report stage.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.48.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Between this and the Report stage I hope the Government will have the Bill re-printed.

MR. LONG: Certainly.

Bill reported as amended, to be considered on Tuesday 3rd June, and to be printed. [Bill 318.]

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution, 22nd May, reported (see page 1632.)

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Captain Verney

(5.50.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I have now to demand from the Irish Government an explicit declaration of their intentions with respect to a public meeting, fixed to be held at Tipperary, on Sunday next, in order to afford the Members for the district an opportunity for conferring with their constituents on public affairs, and especially on the legislative proposals with regard to Ireland which are at present before the House. I insist that there is nothing in the state of popular feeling in the district constituting anything like a menace to public order or the public peace. It cannot be pretended that the Plan of Campaign is in operation there now. On the 13th of last month a public meeting on a very large scale was allowed at this very spot, without interference on the part of the authorities, and the result justified such non-interference, and I maintain that there is no rational ground for apprehending danger in the present case. The meeting has been advertised for many weeks; extensive arrangements have been made for holding it, and contingents of Nationalists are to attend from various parts of the country. We are now within 48 hours of the time fixed for the meeting on Sunday, and yet the people and all concerned are left in ignorance as to whether the meeting is to be permitted or not. Such a policy, I contend, is calculated to create disorder. I know that within the last few hours the right hon. Gentleman has had a private conversation with Mr. Smith-Barry and his agent. There can be no worse enemy of the public peace than the Minister or the Government which allows arrangements for a meeting of this kind to go forward throughout a wide district, and up to the last moment leaves everybody in doubt as to their intentions in the matter. I claim for the people of Tipperary the right to hold this meeting as an essential and indispensable part of their system of Parliamentary government.

*(5.47.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The information I have received does not bear out the notion that extensive local preparations have been made for the meeting announced for next Sunday at Tipperary. The information I have regarding the meeting is drawn from certain statements which have appeared from time to time in the Freeman's Journal, and the report of a speech of the hon. Member delivered, not in Tipperary, but in Dublin, on the occasion of a recent meeting of the National League. These are very imperfect sources of information from which to ascertain clearly or explicitly what the character of the demonstration is to be, and it was from the mouth of the hon. Gentleman himself that I first learnt that what is contemplated is a great open air demonstration in the town of Tipperary.

MR. SEXTON: I am aware of five special trains to be run from Cork, Waterford, Dublin, Kanturk, and Clonmel.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am obliged for the information; it is not yet in possession of the authorities in Dublin Castle, and, of course, I will take advantage of it to prevent the intending excursionists from being put to inconvenience. The intended open air meeting cannot be permitted by the authorities. I am sure the hon. Member for West Belfast will agree that nothing could be more concisely explicit than the statement which, as the Representative of the Irish Government, I made on this subject yesterday.

An hon. MEMBER: In the William O'Brien Arcade.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, in the William O'Brien Arcade. I was not certain what the meeting was. But I did say, in a most explicit and categorical manner, in regard to Sunday's meeting, that if one of the great open air demonstrations which from time to time had taken place in Ireland was contemplated, that could not be permitted in a town in the condition of Tipperary at this moment. The hon. Member desires to convict me of inconsistency, because, holding these views, there was no attempt made to prevent the meeting in connection with the formal opening of the William O'Brien Arcade. I would point out, however, that the circumstances were entirely different. The programme of the demonstration held, I believe, on the 13th April [An hon. MEMBER: "The 12th"] was well-known to the Government, and those who were responsible for organising the banquet were informed that if the programme was adhered to there would be no objection to its being gone through. An open air meeting was no part of the programme, and though I believe it is the fact that some ceremonial or other took place at the door of the William O'Brien Arcade, the whole of the proceedings were certainly not of the character which I understand attaches to the proceedings which are to take place on Sunday, and had they been, the meeting of the 13th April would have been stopped precisely as two preceding meetings, at which the hon. Member for North-East Cork was announced to speak were stopped earlier in the year, or at the end of last year. The consistency or inconsistency of the Government in this matter is, after all, a small affair. What is of importance is whether the Government are or are not justified in interfering with this meeting, and I say—and I say it confidently—that no one who has really studied not merely the rights or wrongs, or the origin of this dispute, but the history of the method by which it has been carried on, can entertain the slightest doubt that meetings of this sort must lead to boycotting and intimidation, and ought, therefore, to be prohibited. I do not think it would be convenient or suitable that I should, on this occasion, dwell upon the not only insufficient but absurd reasons that have been alleged for stirring up the tenants of my hon. Friend who sits below the Gangway (Mr. Smith-Barry), reasons which amount, in short, to this: that my hon. Friend is one of those who resists an illegal conspiracy to which another landlord might probably fall a victim. I am not going into these reasons, but I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite will persuade the people of this country that the actions of the Member for East Cork and others were otherwise than wholly unjustified in their origin, as they have been criminal and disastrous in their consequences. What I am more concerned with is what is actually taking place in Tipperary itself, and I do not think it at all necessary to go into disputed matter on this point, nor is it necessary that I should rely on the reports of police constables and inspectors, because it is not denied by the chief actors in the drama that intimidation and boycotting have gone on to a great extent. I observe that the Member for North Wexford gave a description of the state of things on the 14th September last. In the Wexford People the hon. Member was made to say that—“He had never seen such excitement in his life as there was in the town of Tipperary. The houses of the men who paid their rents were there left alone by everyone. The houses of these men have been nearly wrecked.”

That is a statement made by a Member of this House, an influential Member of the organisation which has produced the existing condition of things in Tipperary—a statement in which he actually triumphed at the disasters which his action, and that of others, had brought to the town. Another Member of the House, the Member for Longford, is reported in the Freeman's Journal, with regard to the conspiracy not to pay rents to my hon. Friend (Mr. Smith-Barry), to have said—

“Would the hon. Member (Mr. Smith-Barry) seek to eject these tenants. The way to consider this matter was to consider it calmly, and he should like to see Smith-Barry trying to eject a score or more of the principal shopkeepers of Tipperary! Ballycoohy would be nothing to it.”

Ballycoohy is well-known. It is a place in Tipperary where a landlord had some dispute of an agrarian character, the result being that a constable and the steward of the landlord were shot dead. I do not misinterpret this speech of the Member for Longford when I attribute to him the opinion that it was as impossible for my hon. Friend to do what, I think, as a matter of fact, he has done, namely, evict a score of the principal shopkeepers of Tipperary who have not paid their rent.

MR. SEXTON: It was done in perfect peace.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I observe that at a meeting of the Tipperary branch of the National League Dr. J. F. O’Ryan made a speech in which he moved a Resolution directed against my hon. Friend (Mr. Smith-Barry), and in which the meeting pledged itself from that day forward not to hold any dealings whatever with the men who paid their rents, or their aiders or abettors. I could multiply examples of that kind. It is not denied, and cannot be denied, that there is a conspiracy against the payment of rents, that that conspiracy is supported by intimidation and violence, that the houses of those who venture to pay their rents have been wrecked, or nearly wrecked. [Cries of “No.”]

MR. JOHN O’CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Give a single instance.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The instances are given by the Member for North Wexford in the speech I have just quoted. It is not denied that not once or twice but many times there have been attempts by means of explosives and otherwise [“No, no!”] to terrorise and intimidate those who have done anything to fulfil their legal obligations. It is not denied, and cannot be, that boycotting exists to an enormous extent in Tipperary, and since this meeting of the 13th April, to which allusion has been made, Father Humphrys, a clergyman of the Roman Catholic Church, has written a letter, the authenticity of which has never been denied, in which he said,—

“As one of the Catholic clergy of Tipperary he protested against the libel that he was doing all he could to stop boycotting.”

I say if that is the attitude of Catholic clergymen in Tipperary, if that is the result of the agitation started by the Member for North-East Cork and his Friends, if the means I have described were being used to intimidate the shopkeepers of Tipperary, the Government would be neglecting its primary duty if it permitted a vast mass meeting under the auspices of the Member for East Cork, and the Member for East Mayo, to be held, a meeting, the only possible consequences of which would be that the terrorism which has existed for the last few months would be redoubled. I have had made out an account of certain crimes which have taken place in Tipperary during the last four months of 1887, 1888, and 1889 respectively, which is significant. I find that the number of persons convicted of drunkenness, assaults, or other crimes affecting the public peace in these periods was, in 1887, 143; in 1888, 162; and for the last four months of 1889, 274. [Laughter and cries of “Police statistics.”]

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): You run them up when you like.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Though this may appear a laughing matter to some hon. Gentlemen, I apprehend that those who have the good of Ireland at heart will regard it as a serious result of the agitation of hon. Members.

MR. SEXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman, instead of giving us the last four months of last year, had given us the first four months of this year, it would have been more to the point.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know why it would be more to the point. I may say that these are figures which I got prepared for me some months ago, thinking that this question might be raised; but if the hon. Member thinks it desirable to go into the matter I will have further statistics collected. I think I have said enough to convince the House that the Government are more than justified in doing all they can to stop this proposed demonstration in Tipperary. I can prove without going to police statistics, but relying on the utterances of Catholic priests, Members of Parliament, and members of the National League, that a system of terrorism and boycotting exists in Tipperary which the Government is bound to put down by every means in their power, and which they will be responsible for encouraging if they permit meetings of this kind to take place without doing their best to prevent them.

(6.17.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: Anyone who has listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman must have come to the conclusion that the interview he had with the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Smith-Barry) and his agent from Tipperary has not been without effect.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I forgot to allude to that part of the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) in which he insinuated that the action of the Government had been in some way directed, or dictated, or suggested, by my hon. Friend below the Gangway. I need hardly say that I did not consult with anyone but my own officials in determining what to do.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is it denied that the right hon. Gentleman last night conferred with Mr. Maurice Townsend, the agent for the hon. Member opposite?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is absolutely untrue to say that the interview I had with Mr. Townsend last night—[Ironical Irish cheers—]yes, and which I am not ashamed of having had, decided the line I should take. That interview took place many hours after I had sent over a telegram to Ireland saying that under no circumstances would an open air meeting be permitted in Tipperary.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Well, there was a good deal of uncertainty in the replies given yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman to our questions as to the proposed meeting, and there was a good deal of uncertainty to-day in the mind of the learned Attorney General for Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I stated distinctly, when asked the question, that my right hon. Friend had stated yesterday that a meeting of the kind which he described—a large open air meeting—could not be held, and that I had nothing to add to the statement.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: That explanation may be all very well in its way, but people of common sense will draw their own conclusions. It is a very strange thing that the certainty of the Government as to prohibiting the meeting should synchronise so completely with the meeting between the right hon. Gentleman and Mr. Townsend. In order to justify the proclamation of the meeting the right hon. Gentleman has quoted a list of crimes which have been committed in the district. But what is the nature of those so-called offences? In one instance a constituent of mine was charged with riot, and the Magistrates, having heard the case against him, found that there had been no riot, but because they thought that the meeting had been an exciting one they sentenced him to six weeks' imprisonment. In another case 15 persons were charged with taking part in a riotous assembly, and although they were acquitted of having committed the offence with which they were charged, for fear that they should do it again they were all sent to gaol for two months. The statement that a Mr. Phillips was boycotted, that a policeman attending a funeral was stoned, and that the services of a midwife were refused to the wife of a policeman, are absolutely untrue, though it is true that at the funeral a number of little children, all of whom were under seven years of age, seeing several policemen gathered together, shouted out "Balfour," which is an epithet of opprobrium in Ireland. Those are the kind of crimes which the right hon. Gentleman relies upon as justifying him in destroying the liberties of the Irish people, and in taking away their right of public meeting. People who make these and similar statements to the Chief Secretary have done so knowing them to be false, and the right hon. Gentleman has not been ashamed to repeat them, to the misleading of the House and the country. The speeches which were made at the previous meeting at Tipperary, which was conducted most openly, and during which the people and the police fraternised, were of a Constitutional character—of the same nature as those which we intend to deliver next Sunday at Tipperary, for we will hold that meeting at the risk of our lives in spite of the right hon. Gentleman's buckshot and bayonets, and will continue to hold such meetings until the liberties of Irishmen are restored to them. The right hon. Gentleman may send his police with their buckshot to the place of meeting. We have faced them before, and we will face them again.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): All he wants is blood.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that we will continue to hold meetings when he and his name are relegated to an obscurity from which history will never redeem them. It does not matter to Irish Members under what Government they are, when the only effective argument that is used against them is that of force. The Irish authorities are not willing that a good feeling should exist between the Irish people and the police, and that is the reason why this meeting is to be proclaimed. We will hold our meeting in the town of Tipperary, and we invite the right hon. Gentleman with all his force to come forward in aid of the hon. Member opposite, who is engaged in his unmanly and wretched crusade against the homes of the Irish people, backed up by the arms and repression of a tyrannical Government.

(6.30.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has told the House, like another celebrated Irishman, that he is "agin the Government." I do not see why the hon. Gentleman should blame the Chief Secretary for employing force, because the hon. Gentleman has told the House it is the only argument he will yield to. I have observed that hon. Gentlemen opposite are very reticent about the question of Tipperary. It has not been a favourite theme with them, because I suppose they know as well as I do that their action at Tipperary is condemned by the vast majority of the British people. I do not think hon. Gentlemen will describe to the British people how the action of the inhabitants of Tipperary was developed into the present condition of affairs. It has been represented by hon. Gentlemen that it is a sort of spontaneous manifestation on the part of the tenants of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) because of his action with regard to the Ponsonby estate. How were the men of Tipperary got up to high-water mark? Boycotting notices were sown broadcast about the town. Within the last three weeks boycotting notices have been posted throughout Tipperary condemning the action of certain unpopular persons who have offended against the League, or who have held communication with those who are under the ban of the League. I think it a very good thing that the House and the country should remember that the action of the men of Tipperary has not been a spontaneous but a got-up action, under the authority and threats of the National League and of hon. Members below the Ganway opposite. Within the last three weeks a boycotting notice was posted in the Division which the hon. Member who has just spoken represents, holding up to execration a certain Mrs. Peer and a certain Tom Coghlan, of Fermoy, who supplied meat to a certain landgrabber named Noonan.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Fermoy is not in Tipperary, but in County Cork, 100 miles away.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Similar boycotting notices have been posted in Tipperary. I hold some in my hand—

“Boycott Smith-Barry. Boycott Horace Townsend, the long, oily, slippery, petty agent of a Syndicate. Boycott Walter Nolan, the emergency attorney from God knows where. Boycott”

Several others in similar terms. The action of the Tipperary people was not spontaneous, but got up and caused by the pressure and tyranny of the League which hon. Gentlemen opposite represent. Let hon. Gentlemen opposite who have advised the men of Tipperary to leave their good houses, built with stone and roofed with slate, and to go and live in the lath and plaster shanties in which they shiver at the present time—let those hon. Gentlemen give a banquet to the men who have followed their advice, and try to persuade these men that it is a more comfortable thing for them to live in their present huts than in the houses they have left. I think it matter for the greatest satisfaction that hon. Members have thought fit, just before the Whitsuntide recess, to bring this matter before the House and the country, because I believe the Government never had, and never will have, a better case to go to the country with than Tipperary. I believe nothing will do more damage to the cause of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

*(6.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: May I be allowed to make an appeal to hon. Members. It is that they will now allow the Report to be taken, in order that I may make the Motion for the Adjournment?

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman closure the Motion for Adjournment?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly not. If the House desires to sit on Monday I shall not offer any opposition.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I shall not occupy more time than is necessary; certainly I shall conclude my remarks in time to allow the right hon. Gentleman to make his Motion. We have heard the hon. and gallant Gentleman's description of what he is pleased to call the terrorism going on in Tipperary. He has read to us a boycotting notice which referred not to County Tipperary but to County Cork, and he has argued that the men of Tipperary in surrendering their homes as a protest against the action of their landlords did not act spontaneously, but in a got-up manner. We must have a very great deal of power indeed in Ireland if our influence is so great as to compel men to give up their comfortable houses and properties and go out upon the roadside and occupy the shanties the hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of. I cannot conceive a more forcible way of bringing home to the minds of the people the heroism of the people of Tipperary than the description the hon. and gallant Gentleman has given. We will await the verdict of the English people on the action of the men of Tipperary with absolute confidence: we will await their verdict on the action of the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry), and the Government, which does not scruple to enter with the hon. Member and his agent into a conspiracy to suppress the right of public meeting in Ireland. The Chief Secretary has cited a number of statistics and reasons why this meeting should be suppressed. He told the House that at Ballycoley the tenants barricaded the houses and shot a constable and the steward of the landlord. Does he mean to insinuate that the people of Tipperary have carried out the programme of Ballycoley? I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to assert that in any single instance in Tipperary was there the slightest resistance to the process of eviction. I maintain that this attempt on the part of the Chief Secretary is a most monstrous and unscrupulous attempt to benurich the character of the people and to misrepresent the great problem with which the Government in Ireland have to deal. Suppose that all the right hon. Gentleman has said were true; suppose every one of the so-called outrages which he describes had taken place before the meeting of April the 12th. If the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman has cited are valid reasons for suppressing the meeting of next Sunday, they were still more valid reasons for suppressing the meeting of last April, because they had occurred still closer to the time of meeting. I ask the House to consider what is the reason which common-sense can alone deduce from the action of the right hon. Gentleman for the suppression of next Sunday's meeting and the allowing of the meeting of April the 12th. A large English contingent, consisting of a considerable number of English Members of Parliament and English leaders and representatives of English organisations, attended the meeting in April, and that is the sole and single quality which differentiates the meeting in April from the meeting next Sunday. I ask the House and the English people to consider well the extraordinary and glaring state of things which the Government action now reveals—to bear in mind the fact, that if the Irish people wish to hold a meeting in their own country they must hold it under the protection of Englishmen. In face of his action in regard to next Sunday's meeting, will the right hon. Gentleman ever assert again that the Irish people enjoy the same liberty as the English people? The right hon. Gentleman cited a passage from a letter of Father Humphrys, in which that reverend gentleman said, in effect, he would be ashamed to refrain from defending boycotting. I repeat the sentiment expressed by Father Humphrys in his letter, because I know well what it means. I should be ashamed to refrain from defending boycotting as it is understood in Tipperary. Boycotting has taken place in Tipperary, but it is of the class which I am prepared to defend here or before any civilised audience. It is simply and solely exclusive dealing, the exercise by the community of one of the rights they possess, to protect themselves against the hostility of individuals of their own class.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed this day.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 2nd June.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EVENING SITTING.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

(9.2.) MR. SEXTON: I beg leave to explain that there was no intention on the part of Irish Members to prevent the Motion for the Adjournment being decided at the Morning Sitting; but it was prevented by two circumstances, the length of the speech of the Chief Secretary and the superfluous intervention in the Debate of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). It was simply by inadvertence that my hon. Friend (Mr. Gill) overran the time.

(9.2.) MR. GILL: The fact that I happened to talk out the Debate on the Report of Supply arose from my want of knowledge of the Rule that governs an Afternoon Sitting. I was under the impression that we did not break off Debate until 7 o'clock.

(9.3.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): Upon this Motion I am anxious to say a few words, and they shall be very few, in corroboration of the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. J. O'Connor). [Cries of "Agreed."] Well, if you agree with the statement of my hon. Friend, then the question is settled; but the Chief Secretary has made a statement entirely at variance with the statement of my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend has referred to the English Members who accompanied him, and I intend, in a few sentences, to emphasise what he has said. The Chief Secretary states that the arrangements for the public meeting at Tipperary were not made with the cognisance of the police. But, Sir, these arrangements were made in the light of day and ought to have been within the cognisance of the police, if the police did their duty. The preparations for the meeting were apparent to every inhabitant, a platform was erected, and, I suppose, 10,000 people must have seen it. Speeches were delivered to an immense concourse of people in the open air at New Tipperary. Personally, I addressed large crowds at some eight or 10 meetings standing by the side of my hon. Friend (Mr. J. O'Connor). [Interruptions.] I can assure hon. Members that I am as anxious to get away for my holiday as any of them can be, but I consider I have a public duty first. On the day my hon. Friend has referred to there were meetings held in the town and outside, and thousands of people gathered. During the time the Ponsonby evictions were proceeding, I addressed a meeting of the evicted tenantry; and a day or two afterwards at Youghal I spoke to a crowd estimated by Canon Keller, who is a good judge of numbers, at 3,000 or 4,000 people. It is vain for the Chief Secretary to assume that the police were ignorant of these proceedings. Irish Members and English Members spoke at these meetings. When Irish Members speak alone, they are interfered with by the police; but when they are accompanied by English Members, there is no interference on the part of the police. You may explain it as you will, the fact remains, and we desire to record it here, where the statement may be challenged and disproved if it is capable of disproof. You deal out one measure of justice to your Irish fellow subjects and another to Englishmen. [Cries of "No!"] The facts are in evidence. Will you agree with me now? Let hon. Members opposite, with that spirit of honour which has always been supposed to characterise the Tory Party, put themselves in the place of Irish Members; let them imagine, if their imaginations are sufficiently fertile, what would their feelings be if they were governed by an Irish majority, and Irish Members were permitted to visit their constituents unmolested, while they themselves were denied the right to hold public meetings. The only way to appreciate the feelings of Irish Members is to put yourselves in their place. Look at the position from an Irish point of view, and I do not understand how the Tory Party, with all their traditions of Constitutionalism, can support the action of the Chief Secretary. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to keep peace and order in Ireland let him keep the police away from public meetings; they are the origin of the troubles; the source and fountain of the confusion that arises is the action of drunken policemen. [Cries of "Oh, Oh!"] You cry shame, perhaps, on the drunken policemen, but the Chief Secretary does not repudiate their conduct. Irresponsible Members behind the Government Bench may interject denials, but it is a fact that we were followed from Cashel to Tipperary by four drunken policemen on a car. They were armed with loaded revolvers, and we travelled in peril of our lives from Cashel to Tipperary. This is the sort of protection offered to Members of Parliament. I have intervened most reluctantly in this Debate. There will be other opportunities for English Members to make good their case, but, knowing how my hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary enjoys the esteem and confidence of tens of thousands of his countrymen, I could not allow his statement to go uncorroborated when it is the fashion to attach more importance to the word of an Englishman than to that of an Irishman.

*(9.10.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I wish to add my protest to that of the hon. Member against interference with the meeting appointed to be held on Sunday next. Every Englishman must revolt at the suppression of rights always considered to be the possession of Irishmen and Englishmen. Hon. Members on that side, as well as hon. Members here, in their addresses and speeches at the General Election, declared they would insure equality of rights to Irishmen and Englishmen. I do not apologise for intervening in this Debate. The interference of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh was totally unwarranted. He occupies no official position—to his disappointment, perhaps—but he has adopted the position of judicious bottle-holder to the hon. Member for South Hants (Mr. Smith-Barry). I can add my experience to what has been said by the hon. Member who has just spoken in reference to the meetings in Tipperary. The Chief Secretary does not seem to be well informed upon what is taking place in Ireland. His predecessors in office, the right hon. Gentleman who is now President of the Board of Trade and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, were continually going backwards and forwards between London and Dublin sifting evidence, and endeavouring to learn facts for themselves; they were not satisfied with Reports from Dublin Castle; but the right hon. Gentleman is chiefly employed in following his favourite pastime on the breezy downs. I regret this interference with the meeting on Sunday. The open-air meetings in April were attended by English Members and English ladies, and we all felt the greatest admiration for the pluck, the energy, and sympathy with their fellows shown by the men of New Tipperary. It shows the solidarity of the Irish tenantry that, when they found a body of their fellow tenantry treated as they were treated on the Ponsonby Estate, they determined to carry the war into the enemy's country, and I am glad they have done so. I have no reason to doubt that the hon. Member for South Hunts will bitterly regret that ever he entered on this internecine struggle. I have no wish to detain the House beyond expressing my admiration for the conduct of the gallant men of Tipperary, and my abhorrence of the policy of the Chief Secretary.

(9.14.) MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): As one of the Members against whom this attempt at muzzling is directed, I do not think it necessary to make any apology, but I do make my most earnest protest. The Chief Secretary will find, later on, that never in his political career has he made a more egregious mistake if he supposes he will be successful in his attempt to intimidate the people of Tipperary. I can tell him, as one of the Representatives of the county, that we are not to be intimidated. I shall exercise my right to meet my constituents in Tipperary on Sunday, and I challenge the right hon. Gentleman or any of those whom he may send there at their peril to interfere with the just rights of the people. Is this not the time in this brief Parliamentary Recess when Members should meet their constituents? Where are the equal rights to all if we are denied the right to meet our constituents in peaceful assembly? I assert for my constituents that they are peaceful, well-disposed, intelligent, respectable men, and our meetings, if not interfered with by the police, will be orderly as they hitherto have been, honourable alike to the constituents and the Members who address them. I tell the Chief Secretary again that he will find he never made a more fatal mistake than to attempt to intimidate the Members and people of Tipperary.

(9.15.) MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I do not think any apology is needed for our intervention in this Debate. It is not my habit to intervene very often in debate; but here is an occasion when a great public issue is at stake in Ireland, and though we subject hon. Members to the inconvenience of sitting here for an hour this evening, we are impelled by duty to our constituents and the assertion of public rights. You, the English Members, can go away on your Whitsuntide holidays without fear or danger of having your free right of public meeting in your constituencies being interfered with, but we can indulge in no such expectations. I have been present here during the day, and I listened to the previous discussion this afternoon, and I can say that it is due to the tone and temper of the speech of the Chief Secretary that we are here now. Had the duty of replying to my hon. Friend the Member West Belfast, who raised this discussion, been left to the Attorney General for Ireland, I venture to say the House would not be now sitting, and we might have been on our way to the enjoyment of our brief holiday. But the Chief Secretary, after having been absent from the House during the greater part of the day, and being sent for when my hon. Friend raised this subject, has made a speech, the effect of which has been to exasperate every Irish Member and every English Liberal Member who heard it. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of that speech, followed as it was by the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, based his interference with the meeting on Sunday on the assumption that the meeting would lead to intimidation and boycotting. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the tenants of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smith-Barry) were engaged in a policy of intimidation. Now, it was pointed out by my hon. Friend (Mr. Gill) that the tenants upon the estate of the hon. Member for South Hunts had gone out of their holdings without any protest whatever. It is a fact known to the Chief Secretary himself that these tenants are engaged in a lawful and peaceful combination against a combination of landlords. Let me quote words used by the right hon. Gentleman himself on this very subject, speaking in this House on July 1, 1889. On that occasion the Chief Secretary said—

“He had been told that he had interfered with combinations of tenants, and that he ought, therefore, to interfere with combinations of landlords. He did not care how much the tenants combined or how much the landlords combined. If he were a tenant in Ireland and he found the landlords were combining against him, he would combine against them.”

Will the right hon. Gentleman truthfully answer—I do not use the expression in any offensive sense—my question how he explains the combination of tenants which exists in Tipperary to-day if it is not a combination against a landlord conspiracy, against which he has said he in like circumstances would enter into combination? The tenants have combined peacefully and legally to carry out their policy of protection; and if the tenants in Tipperary fail to carry out that policy, including as it may do boycotting to a certain extent, the man who will be mainly responsible for driving the tenants of Tipperary to that very policy he has indicated to-day will be the Chief Secretary. He wants to put down conspiracy. So do we. We want to give utterance to our feelings and to express our indignation in open meeting; but when we want to come together for the purpose, when Members for Tipperary want to address their constituents, then the right hon. Gentleman tries to prevent open discussion, tries to do that which Lord Cowper once boasted of having done when he said he had “driven disaffection beneath the surface.” The right hon. Gentleman is attempting the same thing. He is trying to drive the Members for Tipperary from the public platform, to suppress the public discussion of grievances, and to induce a return to the vices of that evil time when an exasperated tenant was driven to find vengeance for his wrongs with a musket from behind a hedge. For a recurrence of these evil times, this infatuated policy of yours will be responsible. I ask Tory Gentlemen on the other side, are they afraid to listen to the Irish people? You listen readily enough to Irish Representatives here in the House of Commons; are you afraid to hear the same opinions expressed in Ireland? And yet you have declared your willingness that the people of Ireland shall enjoy equal rights with the people of England! You are anxious to get away for your holiday; you will not recognise the condition of affairs in Ireland; you will not realise that deep down in the heart of the Irish people is the intense desire for some sort of self rule. You are impatient because your holiday is delayed for a few hours; but whatever may be said of our motives, if it were possible and necessary, we would keep your Parliament sitting until doomsday to make these facts known. No answer has been given to the facts put forward by my hon. Friends. You permitted meetings to be held on April 12, and at those meetings English Members and English ladies were present, but other meetings are prohibited. Why do you behave in this fashion? You laugh now; but we shall win in the end, and those laugh loudest who laugh last. The Irish National cause is winning against all your efforts. The Chief Secretary has admitted that he had an interview with Mr. Townshend and the hon. Member for South Hunts. The policy of his Party in Ireland is shaped by the landlords. According to the supporters of the Government, the government by repression and tyranny is to continue until the youngest among us has a grandson buried. But I tell you that to persist in this policy will leave you no cause for laughter. The Attorney General for Ireland may laugh now, and Attorneys General and Chief Secretaries have laughed before, but the attachment of the Irish people to the old and sacred cause of self-government will survive all the laughter from the Ministerial Bench. We are determined, and the determination has been expressed to-night by my Colleagues to support our people. You have not passed the threshold of the Irish difficulty, and you will have to face it until you adopt a higher, nobler policy than you have indicated to-day. I tell you that you but intensify your difficulties by such exasperating speeches as that we have heard from the Chief Secretary to-day, and some day you will have to admit there is no way to govern Ireland but by applying the policy advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian.

(9.30.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has, in effect, admitted that he determined to prohibit next Sunday's meeting at Tipperary on insufficient information as to what its character would be. He has said that until speeches in the House and, in particular, until the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast, the information which reached him had not led him to believe it would be of a large or dangerous character, and, therefore, he must have taken action on insufficient grounds. To prohibit the right of public meeting in any place is a most serious step which ought only to be taken after the most careful consideration. If bloodshed should ensue from the action of the Government in regard to this Tipperary meeting the country would hold the Chief Secretary responsible, and the House would call him to very severe account. I rise for the purpose of appealing to the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider the situation. If, after the assurance given that the meeting will be held in a peaceable manner, and that its main object is to give hon. Members an opportunity of taking counsel with their constituents, the right hon. Gentleman can see his way to permit the meeting, I trust he will do so. The right of public meeting is a very sacred thing in this country. It ought not to be lightly interfered with, and as the right hon. Gentleman has been assured that the Tipperary meeting will be a peaceful one, he ought to see that there is no justification for prohibiting it. I have not sympathised with extreme measures in the Irish agitation. I have never at any time said a word in favour either of the Plan of Campaign or boycotting; I have never justified any violent resistance to authority in Ireland; and I trust my appeal will be met by the right hon.

Mr. Crilly

Gentleman in the spirit in which it is made, and that he will not adopt a course which may lead to serious occurrences in Ireland. I do not wish to make a long speech, or to stand in the way of the adjournment; but I feel it my duty as an English Member to advocate the proper and just treatment of the Irish people in relation to this matter of holding public meetings.

(9.36.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): We have been told by the hon. Member for Tipperary that he desires to take advantage of this Whitsuntide recess to address his constituents; but we have had no such assurance from other hon. Members who are expected to attend this meeting that the gathering will be a peaceful one, and I would ask—Is it not possible to give the Government some such assurances; can they not give an undertaking that the addresses delivered at the meeting shall be only those which are ordinarily delivered when an hon. Member meets his constituents and that there will be no appeal to the people to break the law.

DR. TANNER: There never is.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR: Hon. Gentlemen have said that from shore to shore of the island the law of the League is the law of the land, and we cannot forget that that assertion has been made. I say that if hon. Gentlemen who are to speak at the meeting will promise that their speeches shall be of the character I have indicated then I think an appeal may fairly be made to the Government not to proclaim the meeting.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I promise to deliver any speech I may make next Sunday to the Falkirk Burghs when I return.

(9.37.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: Does the hon. Member (Mr. Sinclair) submit the speeches he is about to deliver for the opinion of the Lord Advocate? A more indecent proposal, in the Parliamentary sense, has never been made in the House of Commons than that which the House has just listened to. My hon. Friends have not proclaimed their intentions to break the law, but merely to assert their Constitutional right to address their constituents; and yet here we are having it laid down as a Constitutional doctrine that Members about to address their constituents in Ireland are to give an undertaking to the Government of the day as to the language they will use. If the right hon. Gentleman adopted a wise and statesman-like policy he would judge this meeting by those which have previously been held at that place. He has prosecuted no one who spoke and attended at the meeting at Tipperary on the 12th April, and he has no right to assume that the meeting of Sunday next will in any way differ from that meeting. The hon. Member for St. Pancras has tried to throw oil on troubled waters. I quite recognise the force of what he says: that every allowance must be made for the Government when they have avowed a settled and determined policy. But then, also, some allowance ought to be made for hon. Members who believe that they are within their right and are pledged to meet their constituents. They have not proclaimed that they will break the law, they are only claiming to exercise a Constitutional right which the Government are seeking to abrogate. This policy of repressing public meetings in Ireland, which hon. Gentlemen opposite treat so lightly, is, to our mind, a very serious grievance; and I say, with the force of my 11 years' experience, that by pursuing this policy you are fostering and encouraging secret societies, and that you will thereby bring about a crop of far more dreadful crimes than anything in the shape of intimidation. Why cannot the Chief Secretary rise to the greatness of a statesman? I thank those of our English friends who have come down to support us to-night. We should have been glad, if we could, to release hon. Gentlemen at an earlier hour, but we were forced into the course we have taken by the temper and tone of the reply of the Chief Secretary, backed up by the very ungallant references of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh to a man who is head and shoulders—morally and physically—above him. I recognise that for anyone to run the risk of bringing the people into close proximity with the forces of the Crown is a serious thing, but I consider that the right of public meeting is so sacred that men are bound to run some risk; and the answer of the Chief Secretary has left nothing open to us but to run that risk.

*(9.48.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): When the hon. Member for Falkirk finds it necessary to address a caution to the Government, we may judge pretty well what the feeling of the country is. I listened to the speech of the Chief Secretary with amazement. A speech more atrocious, a speech more utterly devoid of argument, a speech more deliberately intended to wound, annoy, and insult than the Chief Secretary's it would be impossible for a man to make. That speech has convinced me that there is not a shadow of justification for interfering with this meeting. I have no hesitation in saying that the country will not hold him guiltless if one drop of blood is shed on Sunday. I advise my hon. Friends not to take the right hon. Gentleman seriously; he is dressed in very brief authority, and the day is coming with rapid steps when the right hon. Gentleman will be hurled from power and visited with the punishment he so richly deserves.

*(9.52.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): When I came down to the House to-night I had not the slightest intention of interfering in this Debate; but I cannot help supporting the appeal so well made by the hon. Member for North St. Pancras—an appeal which was really an attempt to throw oil on the troubled waters. The speeches delivered by hon. Members from Ireland have all been in a like direction; that of the Member for South Kerry was most conciliatory. We are told that this meeting is to be suppressed. Well, I can only say that when hon. Members declare that they desire to address their constituents in a peaceable, orderly, and Constitutional way, very considerable responsibility will be cast on the Government if any disaster occurs from the attempt to hold this meeting on Sunday next. I cannot conceive any wisdom in the policy of the Government. Since 7 o'clock Ministers have had an opportunity of conferring together, and now there seems to be a conspiracy to allow the Debate to close without any one of them saying a word. I am sorry we have no Members present on the Front Bench on this side of the House. But the Government must not construe their absence into a sign that they approve the policy adopted in regard to this meeting. I believe that it is due to the belief that the House would be adjourned at 7 o'clock. I hope Her Majesty's Ministers will not take advantage of the fact to remain silent, and in that way to support the Chief Secretary and Attorney General for Ireland in carrying out their policy of suppressing this meeting. I do make a most earnest appeal to the Chief Secretary to re-consider his decision. I think the speeches which have been delivered from below the Gangway must satisfy him that this is intended to be an orderly political meeting. I hope that some independent Members of the Tory Party will support this appeal. I am sorry that anyone should have been put to the inconvenience of returning to the House, but now that we are here I trust we shall turn the time to profitable account.

* (9.58.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I feel that there is a point at which silence becomes almost criminal. I am not prepared to play the part of a political criminal or a misrepresentative of my constituency in face of the addresses we have heard from the opposite side of the House to-night. I am here to say, as the Representative of a not unimportant English constituency, that none among the many actions of the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be more applauded in England on Monday morning than the announcement of his having prevented a disloyal and criminal meeting in Ireland. I am prepared to stand any odium which may be cast on me by hon. Gentlemen opposite, in consequence of my having pronounced this opinion. I am bound to say, in answer to the pleas of hon. Gentlemen opposite for the right of public meeting, that we on this side of the House are not usually deprived of that right except by the low Irish element resident in Great Britain. I have never received insult or contumely or disrespect from any body of my constituents whom I have addressed, save in one instance from a number of Irish voters whose votes I had declined. I then expressed myself in very plain terms, and said I should consider myself insulted by the votes of the disloyal Irish Party.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: There was not one of them but was better than you.

Mr. Causton

*MR. BYRON REED: I am very sorry that hon. Gentlemen opposite should be at all affronted.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Withdraw your insults, then.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask hon. Gentlemen to restrain themselves on both sides.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: There is no need to introduce any irritation or any thing disgraceful and to the scandal of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I rose for the purpose of allaying any feeling there might be.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Allow me to explain. I should be very sorry to introduce into the Debates of this House a scandal—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. BYRON REED: I made no reflection on hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, I am bound to say, while ready to rain down charges of the most odious, atrocious, and untruthful character upon the head of the Chief Secretary, show themselves singularly thin-skinned when the mildest criticisms are addressed to themselves. Now, I would address myself for a brief moment to the proclaimed meeting at Tipperary. I can understand an hon. Member addressing his own constituents; but it is a different thing when Members from other places flock together for the purpose of flouting authority, setting the law at defiance, and causing disorder. What use would be made of it if this meeting were permitted to be held? It would be used in the columns of United Ireland as another instance of the weakness of the "base, brutal, and bloody Balfour." I am prepared to measure swords upon this point with hon. Gentlemen in my constituency, and to tell my constituents, what the House and English Members know, of the feeling and the views that prevail among Englishmen as to the disloyal action of the Irish Party in the past and the plans of the disloyal Party in Ireland for the future, and the obstruction of public business that takes place in this House. I believe that each English Member who goes to his constituents, as I will go to mine, to tell them of the action of the disloyal Irish Party, who obstruct our business by the "dreary drip of dilatory declamation," and to tell them of the more than veiled insurrection which takes place night after night on the floor of this House. I say any English Member who goes to his constituents and tells them that will receive rich approval and hearty endorsement of his action at the next General Election.

*[10.5.] MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. Member who spoke last has added very much to either the interest or the dignity of this discussion. He complained of being driven from his platform. I do not wonder at a certain impatience being manifested at any speaker making such a speech to his constituents as that which the hon. Member has just delivered. I am very sorry that any speaker should be driven from any platform; but if the hon. Member speaks habitually to his own constituents as he addressed this House to-night, I cannot wonder that some demonstration should have been made. Although I do not approve of violent measures, one must make allowance for human nature, which after all, is weak and passionate, and could not stand many hours of declamation such as that with which the hon. Gentleman has just favoured us. In my position I cannot regret the course which has been taken by the Government, because we wish to accentuate and emphasise our protest against the system of ignoble personal rule which is now going on in Ireland. I think it an anomaly in a country like this, and in a Parliament like this, to have a system of Government like that which the Chief Secretary proclaimed and defended to-night. It reminded me of some of the chapters in Charles Lever's novels, when the Chief Secretary is interviewed by some "Con Heffernan," of importance and significance in his own district, in some room in this House, where is arranged a system of governing Ireland under which right of public meeting is not allowed, and all because this Con Heffernan had an interview with the Chief Secretary, and told him what ought to be done. The real anomaly is that this system should be allowed to go on by a country like England, where people may hold a meeting without caring three straws whether the Government like it or not. But in Ireland, when a Member is going to address his constituents, the meeting is announced three weeks before, and no word is said against it until Con Heffernan interviews the Chief Secretary, who tells the Member that he cannot address his constituents unless in some room or small hole and corner place. I do not know whether there is any distinction in the Constitution of this country between a meeting held in a room and an open air meeting. I should like to know what you would think in this country if a Member were told that he may address his constituents under a roof and within walls, but that if he attempts to address the same men on the same subjects in the open air, the force and strength of the State would be employed to stop the meeting, even if bloodshed should be the result.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: There is no National League in England.

*MR. J. M'CARTHY: The hon. and gallant Member only shows his ignorance by making that statement, because there is a National League in England, on the Council of which I have the honour to sit. Let me remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman of what happened in the old days of the second French Empire, where the sort of system he advocates was carried into execution. In those days the people had to apply to the police for permission to hold their meetings, and the conditions were that they were not to exceed a certain number of persons, and that the meetings must be held under a roof and within four walls. We all know what a brilliant success was achieved under that system, and I am perfectly sure that a similar fate will await any English Government which attempts to enforce in one part of the Empire that French Imperial regulation which they dare not attempt to enforce elsewhere.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—Committee upon Monday, 2nd June.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House, at its rising, adjourn to Monday, 2nd June."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR W. LAWSON: I desire to ask, before the Motion is agreed to, the Government whether if a Motion is made for the adjournment of the House in order that hon. Members may attend a horse race at Epsom they will support that Motion? The business of the House is now in such a congested condition that I think it desirable to take every day we can obtain for the advancement of public business, and, therefore, the Government ought not to countenance an adjournment for such a purpose as I have indicated.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I can only answer the hon. Baronet by leave of the House; but I would point out that however congested the business of the House may be the Government have not proposed to take Wednesdays for the purpose of proceeding with Government business.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House at its rising do adjourn till Monday 2nd June.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SUPPLY [22ND MAY].

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question, this day,

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Resolution 'That a further sum, not exceeding £3,929,500, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charges for the Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891.'"

Question put, and agreed to.

BARRACKS BILL.—(No 234.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I would only remark that the sooner it is passed the sooner will it be possible to remedy the insanitary condition of certain barracks.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

DR. TANNER: This Bill is one that is brought in at a late hour, and I have to state that certain military gentlemen with whom I am acquainted have asked me to give attention to the matter, and have furnished me with certain details. The reason why I now object to proceeding with the measure is that I think it ought to be taken at a time when it can be discussed. I hope, therefore, that instead of trying to push it through at this juncture it will be put down for the first day of the re-assembling of the House, when we may have a full opportunity of considering its details.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 2nd June.

TEACHERS' ORGANISATION AND REGISTRATION BILL.—(No 178)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is competent to put down for the Evening Sitting a Bill which has been put on the Paper for the Morning Sitting?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question is that this Bill be now read a second time.

MR. KELLY: I desire, Sir, to point out that this Bill is one of a very extraordinary character, and has been so drawn that I am perfectly unable to understand to what schools it really refers. It certainly cannot apply to all the schools mentioned in the Act of 1868—that is to say, Winchester, Harrow, Rugby, Shrewsbury.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Ten of the clock till Monday 2nd June.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 2nd June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

LEPERS IN JAMAICA.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that in the Island of Jamaica there is a considerable population of lepers, the number of which is daily increasing, in consequence of there being no law compelling them to remain in the hospital until cured; and whether he can see his way to recommend the Governor to introduce a law compelling the isolation of people who may be suffering from leprosy?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): There is a considerable number of lepers in certain districts of Jamaica, but the Secretary of State is not aware whether the number is increasing. The question of the compulsory isolation of lepers is under the consideration of the Governors of Jamaica and other West Indian colonies.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, when moving the Second Reading of the Savings Banks Bill, he will give the names of the persons to be appointed under the First Schedule?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I will ask the House to read the Bill a second time, and then, before going into Committee, I will announce the names I propose to insert in the Schedule. I believe that course is in accordance with the usual practice of the House.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Would the right hon. Gentleman give the names the same evening as that on which the Bill is read a second time?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The names will be given before the Bill goes into Committee, soon after the Second Reading.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: The same evening?

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

*MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot undertake to say that.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I presume the right hon. Gentleman will not take the Second Reading to-night?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I hope the House will assent to the Second Reading to-night, as the Bill is one I should like to get before the Committee as soon as possible. Unless there be any general objection on the part of hon. Members, I shall take the Second Reading to-night. I certainly shall not ask the House to interrupt the ordinary course of business at an early hour in order to take the Bill.

SCHOOLS IN LEWIS.

DR. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether complaints have reached him that under pressure from Mr. Robertson, Inspector of Schools in Lewis, the teacher of Lionel School, about a month ago, felt compelled to show Mr. Robertson all the telegrams, private or otherwise, which he had received since the 1st of January; and whether Mr. Robertson requires the services of an assistant to enable him to superintend the comparatively small number of schools in the island?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have inquired into the matter and find that the teacher of the Lionel Public School, without pressure and voluntarily, showed to the Inspector two telegrams, and that he did so in order to clear himself of a charge of having attempted to inveigle another teacher into giving telegraphic intimation of the movements of the inspecting staff. A complaint as to this had been made to the Inspector by the aggrieved teacher, and the evidence goes to prove that it was well founded. The special duties of Mr. Robertson in these islands necessitate not only the constant services of an assistant, but also the occasional assistance of another official.

EYEMOUTH HARBOUR.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is competent for the Scottish Fishery Board to allocate any of the funds at their disposal for harbour construction and improvement as security for advances to harbour authorities in Scotland by the Public Works Loan Commissioners; and, if such is the case, whether the Secretary for Scotland would consider the expediency of recommending this course to be adopted by the Fishery Board in the case of Eyemouth Harbour, where £25,000 advanced by the Public Works Loan Board has been expended in improving the harbour without any improvement to the harbour entrance, which is impracticable to fishing boats during large periods of each tide?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Secretary for Scotland is favourably disposed to consider the case of Eyemouth Harbour, and if it be found possible to arrange for a portion of the funds coming into the hands of the Fishery Board to be allocated as a guarantee, he will be willing to give his sanction.

DIRECTOR OF CHANCERY IN EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether there is any foundation for the rumour that the vacant office of Director of Chancery in Edinburgh, worth £600 a year, is to be bestowed on one of the already highly paid officials in the Register House, notwithstanding the Treasury Minute of 1881, which recommends the abolition of the office and the saving of the salary?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No, Sir.

THE EDINBURGH REGISTER HOUSE.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether promotion by service and merit is recognised in the staff of the General Register House, Edinburgh; and whether it is true that a vacancy in the Inspectorship of Births, Deaths, and Marriages for the Northern Counties of Scotland has been filled up by the appointment, over the heads of several well qualified officials, of a Mr. Gordon, entirely unconnected with the service, and inexperienced in its duties?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I assume that the hon. Member refers to the appointment of a Mr. Gibson to the Examinership of the Northern District. The Examinership of this District, which includes the Hebrides, Orkney, and

Mr. Marjoribanks

Shetland, and a large part of the Northern Mainland, involves duties of a very special nature, and requires very special qualifications. Mr. Gibson, so far from being, as stated in the question, inexperienced in those duties, had acted during the absence of the late Examiner, on sick leave for some months, and he proved himself to be so efficient that it was decided to appoint him to the vacant office. The appointment of Mr. Gibson implied no disregard of the services and merits of the staff.

ARRESTS FOR TRIFLING OFFENCES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the arrest, in Manchester, in February last, of Donata Cholla, charged with begging; whether the woman was far advanced in pregnancy; whether bail was offered at the police station and refused; whether, after some 24 hours' detention in the cell, the woman's state became so alarming that she was sent home in a cab, in the charge of two policemen, and shortly after died; and whether any steps can be taken to ensure either the liberation of persons charged with trifling offences who are in a dangerous state of health, or, at any rate, of placing them under proper medical care?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Constable that this woman was far advanced in pregnancy, but that her condition was not perceptible on account of her excessive corpulence. Upon her arrival at the station bail was offered by her husband, but, the Inspector being out on special duty, the husband was told that bail would be taken if he returned at 11 o'clock. He returned, but did not again tender bail, and consequently the woman was detained. She made no complaint until 12 o'clock on the following night, when she was at once sent home, and died two days afterwards from blood poisoning. The City Coroner held an inquest, and acquitted the police of all blame, and the Watch Committee, who made a special inquiry into the matter, found that the police had treated the woman with every kindness. I believe the practice of the Local Authorities to be in conformity with the suggestions in the last paragraph.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the woman died two days after she was sent home, because I understand that she was sent home on the Monday morning, and died the same night.

Mr. MATTHEWS: She was sent home on the Sunday night.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: It was after midnight, and was practically Monday morning.

"MITCHELL v. REGINA."

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Naval and Military Argus of 22nd May, 1890, stating that the War Office people have given way in Major Shiel's case, but hold out in the case of the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina," and whether it is true, as stated in the Argus, that the suppliant is practically in a state of beggary, owing to the manner in which the War Office have acted; whether it is true that the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" officially applied to the War Office, on 15th May, to be permitted to commute a portion of his pension of £215 a year, owing to his pecuniary distress, and whether that application was officially refused the next day; whether, under the Commutation Acts of 1871-82, an officer has a right to commute his pension less £80 a year; if it is the intention of the War Office to persist in pressing the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" for the payment of the costs of the Crown; whether it is true that the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina" is the same officer who, as Lieutenant and Captain Mitchell, reported officially the illegal deduction of the Income Tax from himself and brother officers by the War Office; and whether, in consequence, the Duke of Cambridge issued a Corps Circular Memorandum on the subject, and a considerable sum of money was refunded to the officers so concerned?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My attention has not been previously called to the paragraph in the military journal referred to. I may state, however, that Major Shiel's case is in no way analogous to that of Colonel Mitchell. I have no means of knowing in what pecuniary circumstances that officer now is. He was granted a pension of £600 a year, of which he has been allowed to commute £385 a year for the sum of £4,506. An officer has no statutory right to claim commutation, which can only be allowed on the recommendation of the Secretary of State. Having regard to the circumstances of Colonel Mitchell, I am unable to support his request to further reduce his annual income. The payment of the costs to the Crown, reduced by the omission of certain charges to about £260, will be insisted on. Colonel Mitchell is the officer who complained of certain assessments of Income Duty, which were decided in favour of the Royal Engineers.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston): May I ask if it is not the fact that the War Office sent in a claim for costs to this unfortunate officer which were nearly double what was received after they had passed through the hands of the Taxing Master?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. HANBURY: I should be glad to learn who the official is from whom the fact can be ascertained.

COLONIAL INSURANCE OFFICES.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the Colonial Mutual Insurance Company, of Australia, whose head office is in Melbourne, has an affiliated office in London, which has deposited £20,000, and gone through all the legal formalities necessary to allow it to do insurance business in England; whether it is a fact that, when the English insurers in this office claim to deduct Income Tax, they are refused, because their parent office is in a colony, and are told that the law "knows no distinction between a foreign and colonial country;" whether this Colonial Insurance Office, being a British office, the only ground upon which equality is denied is its colonial connection; and whether he is aware that there are in Australia 20

English Insurance Companies upon which no special restrictions are placed, and they are placed on an exact equality there with the four leading Australian Insurance Companies?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Law Courts have decided that the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, which regulates the deduction from the assessment to the Income Tax, does not apply in cases where life insurance premiums are paid to companies over which Parliament have no jurisdiction, and, consequently, under the existing law, no deduction can be allowed in respect of life insurance premiums which are paid to Colonial Companies. Of course, it is open to Parliament to alter the law in that respect, and such alteration might be effected before next year. At the same time, I do not think that the Australian Insurance Companies have a very strong locus standi in the matter, considering that they themselves make a difference between colonial and British insurance.

QUEENSLAND.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government has any further information, which could be laid before the House, from Queensland, as to the movement for setting up separate colonies in Northern, Central, and Southern Queensland; and whether the Governor has recently reported specially on this question?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A despatch on the subject has been received recently. I need hardly add that the important and difficult questions raised will receive the fullest consideration.

TAXATION OF AERATED WATERS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware if it is a fact that the lowest estimate of production (by a manufacturer) of the 300 to 400 aerated water manufacturers in London is 20,000,000 dozens per annum, and that the total amount consumed or exported of aerated waters, untaxed temperance or other drinks or mineral waters, amounts to probably 250,000,000 dozen per annum; and whether, having regard to the fact that the profits upon a majority of these are stated to be in excess of those derived from any beverage sold by clubs, hotels, restaurants, public houses, &c., he will consider the advisability of causing these waters, being luxuries, to contribute something towards Imperial taxation?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I might say that I would consider the advisability of proposing such a tax, as one might say that all such proposals may be considered, but I should create a false impression, as I do not think I could possibly see my way to taxing aerated waters.

INDIAN LETTERS AND PARCELS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, by receiving prepayment, the Post Office is held to undertake the safe delivery of letters, packets, and parcels from India; whether there are, nevertheless, numerous complaints made of the tampering with letters, packets, and parcels in transit, and of their contents being removed or injured; and whether these robberies, chiefly affecting private soldiers in India and their friends in the United Kingdom, can be stopped?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that, in the case of all letters, whether paid or unpaid, the Post Office does all in its power to deliver them safely. During the year ended the 31st of March last, the number of parcels received from India was 47,671, and of these the number alleged to be tampered with was four. There is good reason to believe, however, that in two of these four cases the tampering, if tampering there was, did not take place in the Post Office. Out of the 47,671 parcels the number alleged to have been damaged was 55. In many of these cases the contents were very fragile, such as butterflies, clay figures, and soap-stone models, or were not securely packed. As regards letters, we have no exact information of the number received from India during the same period, but the hon. Member will understand that they were very much more numerous than the parcels. Out of the total number, whatever it was, the number alleged to have been tampered with was nine; and in two out of these nine cases the articles abstracted were eventually recovered. Whether the losses chiefly affected private soldiers or not I am unable to say; but, be that as it may, the hon. Member will, I think, agree with me that it is not a bad record, and that there is not very much to correct.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the arrangement made by the latter to proceed with the Committee stage of the Tithe Bill this week still holds good?

*MR. GOSCHEN: In the absence of my right hon. Friend I should not like to give a definite reply at this moment to the right hon. Gentleman's question. My right hon. Friend will be in his place to-morrow, and will then be able to answer any question on the subject. I may, however, say that the arrangement holds good so far, subject to any alteration my right hon. Friend may propose.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I wish to ask the Secretary for War how it was that the Second Reading of the Barracks Bill was taken on Friday before the adjournment for the recess, when on Thursday, the 22nd of May, the First Lord of the Treasury stated that he would only take four other pieces of Government business? The right hon. Gentleman was then asked whether, assuming that arrangement to be accepted, no other business would be taken, and he replied that, although he had no desire to impose conditions upon the House, in the event of the four Orders in question being concluded, and the Motion adopted for taking over Tuesdays and Fridays, he would move the adjournment. The question I wish to put to the Secretary for War is whether, on the evening of Friday, the 23rd, he had overlooked the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, when he asked the House to pass the Second Reading of a very important Bill establishing a very important principle?

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I had intended to put a similar question to the First Lord if he had been here to-day. Upon questions affecting the conduct of public business I think there ought to be no mistake. I withdrew my block to the Report of the Resolution on which the Bill is founded on the distinct understanding that I would have an opportunity on the Second Reading of the Bill of raising certain Constitutional objections to the measure.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question. There was not the slightest intention on the part of the Government to deprive the right hon. Gentleman of the opportunity of expressing his views with regard to the measure referred to. I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for the course I took in the matter on Friday. What was done in reference to the Bill on that day was due entirely to my mistake. The right hon. Gentleman will have a further opportunity of raising his objections to the measure. I understood that there was no opposition to the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): If the Bill met with unanimous support, and there was no opposition to it, why was it not put down as the first Order of the Day rather than that the Government should render themselves liable to be charged with breach of faith?

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): Will the arrangement with respect to taking the Educational Estimates to-morrow hold good?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes. The Estimates will be taken first and then the Code Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In what order will Supply be taken after Class V. is disposed of?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I believe that it will be taken straight on.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the Committee stage of the Barracks Bill be put down for next week?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that that must be left to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury. Under the circumstances it will not be taken to-night.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Education Code will be put down for to-morrow; though no unfair pressure will be put upon hon. Members. It is intended to follow the precedent of the right hon. Member for the Brightside Division (Mr. Mundella), and to discuss the Code with the Estimates.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES DISPUTE.

MR. J. MORLEY: I wish to ask the Under Secretary to the Colonies whether the Government propose to lay speedily before the House the Papers relating to Newfoundland? No Papers have been laid before Parliament in connection with the subject since the mission of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and, considering the state at which the question has arrived, it is important that the House should have information with regard to it.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am able to answer the right hon. Gentleman's question at once. The Papers are being prepared with all possible despatch. I inquired this afternoon, and I understand that the Papers will be in the hands of hon. Members next week.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): When may Papers be expected with respect to Behrings Sea?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot promise Papers at present, because, as my hon. and learned Friend is aware, negotiations are still in progress with respect to this matter, and until they are completed it will be impossible to lay the record of the proceedings before Parliament.

MR. S. HILL: Were not the negotiations closed when Sir Charles Tupper retired from Washington?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No; I think I have already stated that.

*MR. GOURLEY: Is the report correct that a body of French marines have been landed in Newfoundland, and that the English Government have ordered a war vessel to proceed to those parts which are now considered to be disturbed?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have no information of any such events, and I am able to state that the French Government also have no such information. I believe that until some arrangement has been arrived at we may expect that the officers of both countries will maintain a conciliatory attitude.

Sir W. Hart Dyke

*MR. GOURLEY: Then we may take it that the reports of the landing of the French troops and the sending of an English cruiser are inaccurate?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have every reason to believe they are incorrect, because it is most probable that if any such occurrences had taken place intelligence would have reached one of the two Governments.

THE LICENSING QUESTION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the result of the further inquiries which were proposed to be taken as to the incidence of the Liquor Tax, which is proposed to be appropriated for local purposes?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be good enough to repeat his question to-morrow or on Thursday. It has been impossible during the recess to continue all the business with which we were occupied up to the last moment before the rising of the House, and I am not able to say what progress has been made in the direction indicated by the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman place on the Table the terms of the reference?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Government have every desire to satisfy the wishes expressed in all parts of the House, but the matter is one which will require very great care.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can inform the House when the Army Estimates will be taken?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I cannot fix a date for these Estimates, but I have no doubt my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury will give some reasonable notice of the time when they will come on for discussion.

MERCHANT SHIPPING, 1889.

Copy ordered, "of Tables showing the Progress of British Merchant Shipping."
—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.—
[No. 192.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.*SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS V.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £114,920 (including an additional sum of £30,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for sundry Colonial Services, including Expenses incurred under 'The Pacific Islanders' Protection Act, 1875,' and certain Charges connected with South Africa."

(4.5.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): The Government promised that these Estimates should not be left over this year until the month of September, when there would be no opportunity of discussing them, but they have considered it desirable to bring them on upon the first day after the vacation, when there are very few Members present. I have given notice of my intention to move various reductions in these Votes, especially in regard to Bechuanaland; but before we come to that item I wish to put a few questions to the Under Secretary for the Colonies upon several of the previous items. The first which I desire to put has reference to the Norfolk Island Mail Service. The sum which is asked for that Service is very small—£67 I think; but I want to know if the island itself belongs to us, or whether it belongs to the colony of New South Wales, or any of the other Australian colonies. If it has been made over to one of the colonies I do not see why the British taxpayer should be asked to pay even this small sum. The next item to which I would refer is that for the Mauritius Mail Service. As far as I can make out we appear to be paying the whole cost of the subsidy to our old friend the British India Steam Navigation Company. Hitherto, I find that the Government of the Mauritius has voted £5,600 for the maintenance of the Service, but I now find that Her Majesty's Government have thought it right to subsidise the company as well, and a sum of £7,500 is proposed to be given to the British India Steam Navigation Company, of which we are asked to pay £2,813 this year. I want to know upon what ground this money is to be paid, and whether any new service has been undertaken by the company in addition to their ordinary trading occupations. I would ask further what is the necessity for a mail service between Colombo and the Mauritius to justify the Government in asking the taxpayers of this country to vote a subsidy of £7,500, in addition to an equal sum voted by the Government of the Mauritius, and what we gain from the arrangement? It is an item which appears in the Votes for the first time this year, and I wish to afford Her Majesty's Government an opportunity of explaining what it means. In order to enable them to do so I will move the reduction of the Vote for Norfolk Island and the Mauritius by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That item D, £2,813, Mauritius Mail Service, be reduced by £100."—
(Sir George Campbell.)

*(4.10.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In answer to the first question of the hon. Member, I have to say that Norfolk Island does belong to this country, and that an Imperial Grant of £100 was made on April 1st, 1889, for improved communications between that island and New South Wales, and was promised for five years, on condition that one-third of the cost should be borne by the island.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Do I understand that Norfolk Island is practically a Crown colony?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: It certainly belongs to us. In regard to the Mauritius Mail Service, it has been found necessary to improve the service.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: It is a new Vote altogether.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Both the Admiralty and the War Office have impressed upon the Colonial Office the necessity, from an Imperial point of view, of providing an improved mail service. In reference to the amount inserted in the Estimates this year, it represents for 1890-91 three-fourths of the expense.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What advantage do we gain from the new service? Is a new service to be maintained, or is it merely the subsidising of the old service already carried on by the British India Steam Navigation Company for local purposes?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The War Office and the Admiralty are, as I have already said, of opinion that there should be an improved communication for Imperial purposes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: As I did not give the right hon. Gentleman any notice of the question, I will not press the Amendment, but will rest satisfied with the answer I have received.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(4.12.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The next Amendment I have to propose is the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,275, for the salary and establishment of the Governor of Heligoland. I have been a good many years in this House, but I have never heard yet any satisfactory explanation given of our possession of Heligoland, or what object the British Empire has to serve by retaining it. Being anxious to know all about it, I first obtained a map of Europe, and it was with some difficulty that I discovered the island at all. It appears to be situated in a bight of the German Ocean, somewhere off the mouth of the Elbe. As the map did not throw much light on the matter, I referred to the Encyclopædia Britannica, where I find Heligoland described as a small island with a population approaching 2,000, who principally live by entertaining German bathers during the summer months. I find that there is no wheeled vehicle whatever on the island, except a wheelbarrow and a few bathing machines for the use of the bathers. There are a few horses there in the summer, but they are withdrawn in the winter. They get their supplies from Hamburg and Bremen; the bathers are all Germans, and when they go away the place is so dismal and desolate that there is an unusual preponderance of suicide and insanity. All the residents except the Governor and the garrison are Germans, and, looking at the history of the island, it certainly does seem extraordinary how it ever came into our possession. It originally belonged to Denmark, but in

Sir G. Campbell

1817, being at war with Denmark, we took the island and found it useful when we were engaged in blockading Hamburg and other ports. But, although it might have been serviceable in those days, its possession now is an absurd anachronism. I, therefore, cannot understand why we should keep a Governor there at a salary of £800 a year, and a garrison of three coastguardsmen at a cost of £475 a year. The island is of no use whatever to us, and in the event of a war, the retention of it might be followed by humiliating consequences. I think it would be better to give up the island altogether, at a moment when we could do so with honour, dignity, and credit. Surely, in some of the negotiations which are going on with Germany, we might trade Heligoland against some territory in Africa, and save this £1,275 a year, which I cannot help looking upon as a most unnecessary tax upon the British taxpayer. With that view, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,275.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item E, £1,275, for Heligoland, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(4.16.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) says we ought to give up Heligoland, but he did not say to whom we ought to give it up. The only reason he has alleged is that we ought not to pay £1,275 a year for an island which is principally used by German bathers. I think he also alluded to the fact that it is near the German Coast. But it follows from the hon. Member's argument that if, as he suggests, possessions of the Crown are to be given up for no better reason than because of their propinquity to other Powers, we might on that ground surrender not only Heligoland to Germany, but also the Channel Islands to France and Gibraltar to Spain. That is the natural consequence of his argument, but that view is shared neither by the present Government nor by those which have preceded them. When the question was discussed in 1885 Lord E. Fitzmaurice, the then Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and a firm supporter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), said—

"He would ask the House to consider what would happen if he or his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies were to bring in a Bill to hand over Heligoland to Germany. The Government would be denounced as cowards, and as crowning the edifice of their disgrace."

Those were the views of a Minister of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Not a shadow of reason or excuse for giving up one of the possessions of the Crown has been brought forward by the hon. Member. The annual imports of Heligoland are over £30,000, almost entirely from the United Kingdom. I do not think it is necessary to waste the time of the House with arguments to show why we should not give up Heligoland. I certainly do not think the hon. Gentleman has shown any reason why we should do so.

(4.20.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy has perfectly convinced me that we ought to give up this island of Heligoland. The only reason which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has assigned for not doing so is that it might lead to the cession of other possessions, and that we must necessarily give up the Channel Islands and Gibraltar. I will not enter into the question whether it is desirable that we should give up the Channel Islands and Gibraltar or not, but surely anybody but an Under Secretary of State, who is obliged to defend anything, should know that there is a very wide distinction between giving up Gibraltar and this wretched little sand-bank called Heligoland. Gibraltar is a harbour, and there are harbours in the Channel Islands upon which we have wasted several millions of money. Heligoland has no harbour; it costs us £1,275 a year, and it is absolutely worth nothing. I will tell the Under Secretary why we do not give it up. It is because there is a nice comfortable little office attached to it, and while we can have a little sand-bank, and place a Governor there with £800 a year, we shall never be ready to give it up. I have been there, and I may tell the right hon. Gentleman that it is not even a fishing island—only a wretched little sand-bank. If we gained anything in the world by it, it might be a matter for consideration whether it would not be desirable to retain it, but, as it is, we gain nothing whatever except the power of spending £1,275 a year upon it. The right hon. Gentleman has told us what some Liberal Minister said in 1871.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: In 1885.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Five years ago. A great deal has happened since then. The Liberal Party is not now what it was five years ago. The Liberal Party has consolidated itself, and has adopted more drastic Radical views with regard to these matters than in 1885. This is 1890, and I look upon the matter from the 1890 standpoint. We are spending this money, but there is no object in keeping the island. My hon. Friend says that German bathers go there, and it seems that the only object of its existence is that German bathers should go there<sup>e</sup>. So far as I am concerned, I do not care who gets it, so long as we get rid of this damnosa hereditas. During the wars with Napoleon it was made a dépôt for contraband goods we wished to introduce into the Continent, but it is practically of no use now.

(4.25.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I entirely agree with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and as to which Power the island should be handed over to, that is, I take it, a matter for the Foreign Office to decide. Personally I think there is a strong case for giving it up to Germany, as it is practically a suburb of the City of Hamburg. The Germans go there to bathe and enjoy their summer vacation, and there is no analogy whatever between Heligoland and Gibraltar or the Channel Islands. Even the Under Secretary has not ventured to assert that the island is of any value for strategical or military purposes, and I agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that it is quite enough to deal with Heligoland now, and wait until the question of what is to be done with Gibraltar and the Channel Islands arises. I believe that the people of the Channel Islands are very much attached to this country, and very properly so, because under the government of this country their prosperity has very much increased. Indeed, I would suggest to this House that if they were to study the case of the Channel Islands a little more carefully they might find it greatly to their advantage to extend the same principle of government in other directions. The people of the Channel Islands are attached to this country because we have left them alone, have allowed their local institutions to grow up under their own control, and have not interfered with them in the assertion of their rights. The case of Heligoland is entirely different. We have only a garrison and a Governor there, and if we gave up the island to Germany to-morrow it would not involve us in one penny of loss.

\(4.26.)* MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I wish to remind the Under Secretary for the Colonies that the speech of Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, which he has quoted, was made in answer to a Resolution brought forward in this House by the present Under Secretary for India (Sir J. Gorst), who suggested to the then Liberal Government that they should hand over Heligoland to the German Government. The view then expressed by the Under Secretary for India was, I think, the correct one. I have myself visited Heligoland, and I am satisfied that it is of no use whatever to this country. It is merely, as has been described by the hon. Member for Northampton, a useless sandbank, and no analogy whatever can be drawn between it and Gibraltar or the Channel Islands. Gibraltar we all know is of immense service to us, and so would the Channel Islands be in the event of a war with France. But Heligoland is of no value to this country whatever; and I agree with the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that it would be a graceful act on the part of this country to hand it over to the German Government, to whom it properly belongs. At the same time, he thought that the concession might be dealt with in what is understood to be disputes regarding German and British influence in Africa.

(4.28.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has invited us to enter into the question whether if we gave up Heligoland we ought not also to get rid of Gibraltar and the Channel Islands. I decline to enter into that question. I have no wish to get rid either of Gibraltar or the Channel Islands. The Channel Islands afford us a good example of the advantages of Local Government and Home Rule. The Under Secretary justifies the course he takes by quoting a passage from the speech of a former Liberal Minister in 1885. But two blacks do not make a white, and I am afraid that it is too much the habit of the Front Bench to cover their own imperfections by a reference to those of others. My opposition to the retention of Heligoland is that it is altogether useless to us, and that it entails upon the British taxpayer an entirely unnecessary expenditure.

(4.30.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I must say that, in my opinion, Heligoland would be a very valuable station in time of war. It would be a great centre for receiving intelligence both upon naval and military matters. Its possession would enable us to keep a good watch upon a very large portion of traffic from Hamburg, and therefore it has some strategic importance. Germany is an extremely friendly Power, but no people know better than the Germans that if one wants peace he must prepare for war.

(4.33.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): Whatever we may think of the importance of Heligoland, it would, in my opinion, be extremely foolish to give it up as an act of grace without getting something substantial in return for it.

(4.34.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Though I suggested that the island should be given to Germany, I never proposed that it should be given for nothing. On the contrary, I think we should drive the very hardest bargain we can.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: My suggestion was that the island should be traded away to Germany, and, of course, I meant in consideration of something else.

Question put, "That Item E be omitted from the said Vote."

(4.35.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 150.—(Div. List, No. 110.)

Original Question again proposed.

(4.45.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): I want to ask a question about the salaries paid to Governors in the West Indies. I find that there is a population of over 1,500,000, and that there are no less than 10 Governors at large salaries. This is a relic of the ridiculous system of old days, and I do not know why so many Governors should be employed at such high salaries. Why should not a Governor-in-Chief of the whole of the West Indies be appointed? If I get a satisfactory answer from the Government I shall not think it necessary to move any reduction, but I think it is only reasonable to ask that the Government should look into the subject.

(4.49.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The question raised by my hon. Friend is a very large one, and one on which he could not expect me to give any pledge off-hand. Most of the West Indian Islands are at a great distance one from another, and it would, therefore, involve great inconvenience to place them under the same Governor. It is, however, a question of great importance, and one which will receive the full consideration of the Colonial Office.

(4.50.) COLONEL NOLAN: I would suggest that in the future the names of all the Governors should be printed in the Votes.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) referred to the number of Governors in the West Indies. I do not think he can be aware that during the last few years a very considerable reduction has been made in the number of Governors. It is possible that something more may be done in the same direction. I should be glad if the Government will look into the matter.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I will consider the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway.

(4.52.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Under Secretary has said that the Colonies have not asked that the number of Governors should be reduced. Why should they? We pay the Governors, and I ask why we should do so? I know of no reason whatever. Colonists will not pay for a Governor if they can get us to pay him. I find that lower down in the Vote mention is made of Leeward Islands. We pay no less than £3,000 for a Governor there. I understand these islands are a number of trumpery islands in the West Indies. We pay £300 for a Secretary to the Governor, and—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has a notice down to reduce a previous item. He must not go to the Leeward Islands until he has disposed of that notice.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I only wanted to abbreviate the Debate. There is a vast number of Governors in the West Indies for whom we pay. It is unreasonable that we should do so. If it is important that the colonies should have Governors the colonies ought to be taxed to pay for them.

(4.54.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I wonder if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) thinks he has got a satisfactory answer; for I can tell him from some experience of these matters things will go on this year, next year, and the year afterwards precisely as they do now. The best course for the hon. Member to pursue is to move some sort of reduction. He will get beaten at first, but his supporters will gradually increase. That is the only thing which produces any effect upon the Government, whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative Government. As to the Bahamas the Under Secretary admitted that the islands ought to pay the salaries of the Governor, but said there was not sufficient revenue. I see the right hon. Gentleman has got a colonial work there which gives him all the information which perhaps he did not possess at the commencement of the Debate. Possibly he will tell us what are the imports and exports of the Bahamas, what is the population, and what is the revenue, and in what way it is raised. It is very easy for the Representative of the colonies here to say, "Oh, the Bahamas do not pay because they have not got sufficient revenue," but it seems to me the question really is, whether the revenue could not be raised. The first business of any particular island is to pay its own way. If it does not we ought to get rid of it, no matter where it is situated. I want to have colonies which are of benefit to us, not wretched islands like the Bahamas. I cannot believe the Bahamas are so very poor that they cannot pay £1,000 per annum for a Governor. It is very probable that they do not want a Governor; or possibly they think £500 a year would be amply sufficient to pay a Governor. We have a sort of notion that when we send a Governor to one of these wretched islands he is to be a sort of regal person. I once knew a Governor of the Bahamas, and he told me all about the thing. He told me how he had to give receptions, and he laughed and jeered at the idea when he ceased to be Governor.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member has asked me what is the revenue and expenditure of the Bahamas. The local revenue in 1888 was £45,578, and the expenditure £44,429. The present debt is £83,136.

(4.59.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: While I agree with the general observations of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I am rather glad the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) has not moved any reduction. The present Governor of the Bahamas is one of the most excellent Governors we have ever had, and has done a great deal to increase the resources of the colony. I invite the Under Secretary to prolong the discussion by giving us some information as to the recent measures taken. The Under Secretary seems shocked at the idea of giving us some information as to the proceedings in the Bahamas. I am sure the information must be at his disposal, and it is only fair he should give us an opportunity of knowing what these measures are. It may not have come to his knowledge that a former Governor of the Bahamas, named Sir Henry Blake, is taking credit for reforms which have been effected by Sir Ambrose Shea. I should be glad to have from the Under Secretary a statement giving credit where it is due. With the exception I have mentioned, I agree with my hon. Friend in his general contention, that there are too many Colonial Governors appointed, and that their salaries are far in excess of the duties they perform. Discussions such as these have been raised continually during the past 10 years, but have failed to lead to any practical result.

(5.0.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The figures put before us show a surplus of revenue over expenditure in the colony, but yet we are called upon to vote this item. Why is it that we have to supplement the revenue by the payment of the Governor?

Mr. Labouchere

*(5.0.) BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member forgets, I think, the debt of £83,000.

(5.1.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I presume in the estimate of expenditure the interest on the debt is included? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can tell us also what becomes of this large surplus?

(5.1.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: We seem to get very little information from the Under Secretary. If the right hon. Gentleman will not tell the Committee, perhaps I may be allowed to explain that it is the oligarchy in these colonies who do not like to be taxed, and the Revenue is raised by taxation of the food of the people, contrary to all the doctrines of Free Trade, so dear to the people of these islands. Throughout the whole of the West Indies a select oligarchy rules in each colony and escapes taxation, while revenue is squeezed out of the food of the people.

(5.2.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman say by whom the Import Duties levied in the colony are fixed?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: By the Governor and Legislative Council.

*(5.3.) MR. PICTON: The matters I have to raise in connection with administration at Sierra Leone and the neighbourhood are of the gravest importance, and this will be allowed by anyone who has given attention to the latest Blue Book in reference to this part of our colonial possessions. In the first place, I think I have a right to make some complaint of the delay in the issue of this Blue Book. It was presented to Parliament in June last year, but it was not available to Members of this House until nearly the end of the year; and when it came into our hands, we found that much information we had a right to expect was omitted. But the information we do possess shows how heavy is the responsibility resting upon us. I am not, I think, using language of exaggeration when I say this Blue Book tells a tale of slaughter and incendiarism. The actions described in this book include the slaughter of an indefinite number of people in several native towns, the burning of six or eight towns, and punishments inflicted of a cruel character unknown to our laws on natives in the Colony of Sierra Leone or the neighbourhood. When I speak of the slaughter of an indefinite number of people, I mean that we have no information as to the numbers; they must have been at least 300, and may have been 700 or 1,000. On page 74 of this Blue Book we have a document signed by J. C. Ernest Parkes, the superintendent of the Aborigines Department, which document gives the information gathered from prisoners taken at Fanima—

“All the inhabitants of two of the three towns which formed Fanima were killed when the attack was made by the police.”

Of course, we have no means of knowing the number, but the statement is that “all” the inhabitants were killed. I may be told that such are inevitable incidents in the administration of a great Colonial Empire. That may be so, and it is a misfortune if it is; but the point I insist upon, and I support my assertion upon the information in this Blue Book, is that this slaughter was to a very large extent due to the unauthorised action of an underling anxious, I suppose, to distinguish himself, and contrary to the express and repeated warnings of those who were in authority over him. The lesson we ought to learn from this record is the danger of giving an adventurous young man representing this Empire unlimited discretion in a savage country when he has not had experience and does not understand the responsibility that rests upon him. As it is, all the notice taken of his proceedings at head-quarters amounts to just this:—“It is very irregular, quite unauthorised, but it seems to pay on the whole, so you can do it again.” This and no more the telegrams from the Colonial Office amount to. Now, this underling of whom I speak was manager in a particular district of Sierra Leone, Sulymah district, and his name is Mr. Copland Crawford. On February 13th I asked a question of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to this officer, who, in the previous July, was convicted of manslaughter at Freetown, he having caused a native to be flogged to death, his object being to extort a confession of crime. Mr. Crawford was convicted and condemned to 12 months’ imprisonment. His health not being good, he was brought to England, and subsequently, his health not improving, he was released altogether. I only wish the same consideration were applied to all prisoners; to some imprisoned in Ireland, for instance, who, if they had had similar consideration extended to them, would be alive to-day. It is to the proceedings of Mr. Crawford I wish to call the attention of the Committee. In September, 1888, he was placed in charge of the Sulymah district of Sierra Leone, a narrow strip of coast in the south east of the colony, bounded by the territories of a number of independent native chieftains, who have never yet been considered subject to the British Crown. Among these native chiefs was a certain Mackiah, whose head-quarters were at the town of Largo. I do not wish to make out this man as a saint; his character, probably, was as shady as his complexion. But I do not know that we can look among these natives for examples of the Christian virtues, considering the examples we have set them. To this chief Mr. Crawford paid a visit. He received no particular instructions to suppress or destroy Mackiah, but he was to enter into negotiations with a view to a peaceable settlement of disorders that had undoubtedly taken place on the frontier. On September 28th, 1888, Mr. Crawford paid a visit to Mackiah and was very hospitably entertained by the native chief. It is set out in Mr. Crawford’s Report to the Governor how Mackiah gave the party quarters for the night, presented sheep and rice to the men, and two white cloths for the Government. What recognition did he, Mr. Crawford, make of this hospitality? In this same Report to the Governor he wrote—

“As your Excellency is well aware, the only way to renew trade, not 5 per cent., but 100 per cent., which means good for the Revenue as well as good for the merchants and traders, is to smash once and for all Mackiah, on one side, and Gumbo Saido, Bocarry Governor’s brother, on the other.”

This view, thus expressed by Mr. Crawford, did not meet with the approval of the Governor of Sierra Leone, Sir James Hay. The Governor, having a longer experience and taking a sensible view of the position, wrote a letter to guide and instruct Mr. Crawford, in which he said—

“While I am pleased to note that your journey has not been attended by any untoward accident, I cannot but remark that it is one which should not have been undertaken without specific instructions from the officer administering the Government, the more so as, at present, the relations between Maackiah and this Government are such that the future policy in dealing with him is one which requires much consideration."

Therefore, the proceedings of Mr. Copland Crawford were by no means approved by his superior officer. But what was the effect of this warning and rebuke? Within a short time we find Mr. Copland Crawford goes voluntarily to arrest two independent chiefs, whose names sound strangely on our ears, but they must be given in order to identify them, Fahwoondoo and Fangh Patch. These chiefs were presumably friends of the Government, but they were suspected, and as it turned out without justification, of treachery. Mr. Copland Crawford sent a party of men to Fahwoondoo's town to summon the attendance of the two chiefs. And why? Because he heard that a meeting of chiefs was to be held in the town, and this official seems to have been as much afraid of a meeting as ever the Irish Secretary is of National League meetings in Ireland. He straightway insisted that the meeting must be suppressed, and he sent Mr. Davies and a party of 12 men to arrest Fahwoondoo and Fangh Patch. Mr. Davies and his party of police were hospitably received in Fahwoondoo's town, and Mr. Davies asked the chief why he did not come when summoned. Fahwoondoo answered, not without dignity, that he fully intended to come when he felt at leisure. He was not called upon to obey the instructions of a man not representing his Sovereign. The words used, if rightly translated, were to the effect that he would come when at leisure. Thereupon Mr. Davies produced the warrant from Mr. Copland Crawford for the arrest, and laid hands on the two chiefs. Of course, a fight followed; 10 natives were killed and wounded, and three of the constables were wounded. The Committee will find the circumstances detailed on pages 12 and 13 of the Blue Book. The chiefs were conveyed prisoners to Sulymah, and were there handcuffed and gagged, and remained in that condition for a considerable time. But what did Governor Hay say to this? He regarded the whole proceeding as altogether unauthorised, and expressed his regret that this action should have been taken without his approval having been first expressed. He said—

"Apart from the fact that your action may create complications, it is at all times, and more so at present, unadvisable to arouse the hostility of the people with whom the police come in constant contact, as it may have a tendency to render their services as messengers, as heretofore, of little or no use to us when once distrust has been created."

"I remark," concludes Governor Hay—

"that you say in your Report that you issued a warrant to make this arrest; this, I need hardly inform you, was invalid, and should not again be resorted to."

In fact, Mr. Copland Crawford had no more right to issue such a warrant than I have, or any commercial agent trading on the coast. And yet we expect the natives to observe what we call law and order, although our agents behave in this lawless way! Governor Hay found these proceedings unjustifiable as well as unlawful, for, in a despatch to Lord Knutsford, on January 1, 1889, he says—

"There are hardly any grounds for believing that Fahwoondoo was one whit worse than the majority of chiefs in this part of the country, for whose shortcomings a great deal of allowance has often to be made, and from whom it is useless to expect that strict integrity and freedom from intrigue which Mr. Crawford undoubtedly seems to have expected, but apparently Fahwoondoo was the only chief whose acts were found out. In these circumstances I have thought it best to order the release of this chief from police surveillance, and I intend to send him back to his own country as soon as practicable. I feel, my Lord, that I shall be doing that which will conduce to the best interests of this portion of the Krim district in re-instating Fahwoondoo, who is the most influential, and, notwithstanding all his faults, the best of his compeers, as at present the people of the district are like sheep without a shepherd."

These are significant words. Mr. Crawford previously spoke of this chief as "a wolf in sheep's clothing," and yet, in two or three months, we find the Governor referring to the man as the shepherd of his people. It is remarkable, too, that in the earlier Blue Book, in reference to this district, Sir Francis De Winton, when he sent Lieutenant Phillips to try and settle matters, recommended the appointment of an approved chief, using a similar phrase that the unsettled state of the country was owing to the people being "as sheep having no shepherd." I think we should reflect on these observations made by the authoritative Representatives of this country in those regions. We are continually destroying, banishing, or endeavouring to humiliate native chiefs who, by natural force of character, have gained eminence and influence among their fellows. The names of Cetewayo, Langalibalele, Dinizulu, Ja-Ja, occur as illustrations of this policy of ours, and many other instances might be recalled, men whose influence might have been availed of for the interests of civilisation, but whose influence we have destroyed, with the independence of their people, and then we complain of want of law and order ! Well, Mr. Crawford proceeded still in his violent policy, and Governor Hay, in despair, began to beseech for instructions from home. But Mr. Crawford would not wait for instructions. On December 12, 1888, Lord Knutsford telegraphed to Governor Hay—

"In answer to your telegram of December 5, you should warn Mackiah he will render himself liable to severe punishment if he enters territory under British protection. Am communicating with War Office: Chief object is defence of territory under British protection, and not to punish past offences."

Mr. Crawford would not wait for the grave consideration Lord Knutsford deemed these matters should receive. On the very next day to that on which Lord Knutsford sent this telegram Governor Hay telegraphed again to Lord Knutsford—

"Referring to your telegram of 12th December, Crawford reports that on 2nd December he captured Jehomah; 131 Mackiah's war-boys killed in action, one policeman severely wounded. Crawford recovered possession of 522 women and children, who had been captured by war-boys. I am asking what urged him to take the town."

It is clear that Governor Hay knew nothing about the recovery of these prisoners.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Will the hon. Member read the later despatch?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: What despatch?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not know the numbers of them by heart.

*MR. PICTON: The despatch goes on to state that 522 captives, mainly women and children, were found in Jehomah. It does not affect my point that Mr. Crawford acted entirely without authority and contrary to orders received from Governor Hay, and my point is in no way invalidated by a later despatch founded on ex post facto knowledge. It is clear that the recovery of the 522 women and children was not Mr. Crawford's object; the town was captured in pursuance of his policy of "smashing Mackiah." Let me say here that if it is considered legal and part of our recognised policy to send an armed force to assault native towns to deliver domestic slaves we ought to know it. I have as much sympathy with such a mission as any hon. Member in the House, but let us understand if that is so, it has never been understood, and there is nothing to show that this was Mr. Crawford's object in capturing the town of Jehomah; he was pursuing his policy he had expressed as that of smashing Mackiah. I should like the Committee to know what was the effect of the telegram sent to Lord Knutsford. Six days afterwards Lord Knutsford telegraphed to Governor Hay—

"In reply to your telegram of 17th December, if you are quite satisfied that Crawford is not running undue risk, and can carry on energetic action with advantage, it seems undesirable to restrain him, but he should be warned to act with caution and report fully what steps he proposes before taking action."

This Mr. Crawford never did, and seemed incapable of doing. Nevertheless, this despatch of Lord Knutsford put new heart into Governor Hay, and, as will be seen, after this communication from the Colonial Secretary, he gave up all attempts to restrain Crawford. He had, indeed, just previously to the receipt of this telegram tried again to curb the violence of his insubordinate underling, and on December 17th, and after we had received the Report of the storming of Jehomah, but before receiving Lord Knutsford's telegram, he wrote to Mr. Crawford, and, after acknowledging receipt of a letter, in which Mr. Crawford announced his intention of making an attack on another town, he said—

"I have once more to point out that in so doing you have exceeded your instructions; you have no authority from this Government to assume the offensive by attacking towns, and, as stated in my confidential letter of the 11th instant, you must, on no account, adopt such a course of procedure. Your duty, as conveyed by the instructions which you have, from time to time, received, is to protect the integrity of the jurisdiction, and no hostile advance against the forces either of Mendingrate or Mackiah must be made without obtaining express permission so to do."

This is the third grave rebuke from Governor Hay to his irrepressible underling, yet Mr. Copland Crawford took no notice. On the 18th he received the telegram I have read, suggesting it was undesirable to restrain this young man; and so the storming, capturing, and burning of the towns went on until at last the Governor himself began almost to rejoice in these peculiar doings. I find on reference to page 61 of the Blue Books that Governor Hay, in a letter to Lord Knutsford, says—

"No one is more averse to resorting to arms than I am, but the present case was one of urgent necessity. Mackiah was threatening to overrun the Bum and Kittam districts. Had he been permitted to do so, the result would have been disastrous to British interests, and untold misery on the many hundreds who would have been led into captivity."

But surely there was no need to burn down towns and slaughter hundreds of natives simply because Mackiah was threatening to overrun certain districts. Surely the Government are strong enough to prevent this doing that. I protest against this wanton slaughter of poor black people simply because their chief threatens to overrun a British district. Now, in a letter from Governor Hay to Lord Knutsford, printed on page 71 of this Blue Book, I find these remarkable words—

"I trust in the course of the next two days to have completed my business here, when I will burn down the remaining towns and remove to Bandajuma, where Captain Mackay and myself settled on the site for the block house which I ordered Chief Momoh Keikei to clear at once."

"I will burn down the remaining towns!" Just as he might speak of an ordinary bit of business, to be polished off before he packed up and moved on. Surely if such frightful things as these have to be done they might be spoken of in terms other than these, and ought not to be referred to as mere matters of business. I think that, so far as I have stated my case at present, I have shown that Mr. Crawford has acted with gross insubordination, and that he ought to have been restrained: yet, instead of dealing with him firmly, Governor Hay hesitated; he appealed to the Home Government for advice, and while he was hesitating six or eight towns were burnt down and 700 or 800 people were slaughtered. There is one case of individual cruelty to which I feel bound to call attention, and that is the case of Gbannah Gombo, an ally of the Governor. On January 9 he was thanked by Governor Hay for his valuable assistance, but subsequently led astray by the evil example set him he looted and burned Bandajuma on his own account, and thus excited the indignation of the Governor, who consequently caused him to be arrested. He was taken to Freetown prison.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: May I ask on what authority these statements are made?

*MR. PICTON: Page 84 of the Blue Book contains particulars of the arrest. The third paragraph says that "Gbannah, for whom no excuse can be made," was arrested about January 17. On page 92 I find the following, signed by Mr. D. Palmer Ross, M.D., Edin., Colonel-surgeon:—

"Gbannah Gombo was admitted in the gaol hospital, Freetown, on the 24th July last, and died on the 1st inst. from the effects of blood poisoning. Previous to his arrival at the gaol he had been secured with a rope, and the loop around his right arm caused ulceration of the fore arm and induced the blood poisoning above mentioned.

"Gbannah Gombo was a man of weak constitution, and was badly nourished.

"It is, therefore, very likely that this condition of things, together with the marauding life he had led, accelerated his death."

Surgeon Ross, in his evidence at the inquest, said—

"The prominent parts of his body, such as his shoulders, his elbows, and his hips, were bruised, evidently from lying in a hard place, such as a boat. His right forearm was in a state of mortification or sloughing, caused by the tightness of the rope that had encircled both his arms. He died of blood poisoning, the result of the mortified arm, caused as I have above stated. I produce the written record of his case for the inspection of the Coroner and the Jury."

The Coroner's Jury returned a verdict to the effect that the said Gbannah Gombo came to his death on the 1st day of February by blood poisoning, caused by ill-usage. I do not think a matter of this kind can be passed over in silence. In the Stanley Exhibition there is a model showing the mortification of the hands of a slave produced by the narrowness of the fetters he had worn, and people who look upon this horrible sight little think that anything of the kind can be done under the protection of the British Crown. It is not sufficient for the Colonial Secretary merely to express a hope that such accidents will be avoided in the future. At any rate, we must secure that such things shall be avoided in the future, and I do contend that those who have been responsible for such occurrences should be subjected to the severe displeasure of the Government. Again, I should like to draw attention to the nature of the bribes we give to these poor people. On page 50 I find that Mr. Copland Crawford, in his letter to the Administrator-in-Chief, dated December 11th, referring to a visit made to him by certain chiefs, says—

“On their departure I gave them 14 cases of gin and 14 pounds of tobacco, for which I would ask your Excellency's approval.”

This, be it remembered, was given to 13 chiefs. He might as well have given them 14 bottles of prussic acid. I am informed that only the worst kinds of spirits are sent out to Africa, and that the stuff used for bribes is sheer poison. The effect on the men who consume it is, first, mad drunkenness, then ill-health, demoralisation, and idleness. When forced by starvation they begin again collecting nuts, or other produce, with a view to obtaining more gin and more rum. On page after page you find instances in which demijohns of rum and cases of gin are given to these people by way of bribes. I think this practice should be most sternly prohibited; poison of this kind ought not to be used by the Government as current coin. In order to get an expression of opinion on this subject, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £500 as a mark of the displeasure of the House at the gross insubordination of Mr. Crawford and the weakness of the authorities, as well as of our dissatisfaction with the abominable practice of bribing inland chiefs with these bad spirits.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Item J, £2,500, for Western Coast of Africa, be reduced by £500.”—(Mr. Picton.)

*(5.45.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I assure the Committee that I have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Leicester with considerable interest, not, however, untinged with regret that unfounded attacks should be made in the House of Commons upon the Governors of distant colonies that they indulge in fire and slaughter out of sheer brutality. This goes far beyond the licence that the House ought to be expected to allow.

*MR. PICTON: I never said anything of the kind. I never said or suggested that these things were done solely out of sheer brutality for a bad, selfish, and mercenary purpose; but I did say that all the proceedings were undoubtedly inconsistent with morality and Christianity.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman gave the Committee to understand that the expeditions were undertaken not for the purpose of liberating captives, but of burning towns and killing people. But the sole object of the attack by Mr. Crawford was for the purpose of rescuing women and children who had been carried off from British territory, and who were then in slavery. Does the hon. Gentleman realise what such slavery in the interior means? There were 525 persons rescued by Mr. Crawford, and I ask the hon. Gentleman whether that did not warrant the action which he took? Would the hon. Gentleman have preferred that these 525 persons should have remained in slavery, and that those who held them should have been allowed to go scot free? Would that, in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman, be in accordance with the principles of morality and Christianity? It is true that in rescuing the 522 persons many of those who held them in captivity were killed, but would the hon. Gentleman have preferred that they should remain in slavery? If those are the views of the hon. Member I can assure him they are not the views of the House, or of the world generally. The hon. Gentleman read such portions of the despatches as would lead the Committee to believe that Governor Hay condemned the action of Mr. Crawford, but when I challenged him to read other portions he did not do so. If he had read them it would be clear that the Governor did not condemn the action of Mr. Crawford which led to the release of the wretched captives, though he did condemn that for which Mr. Crawford was punished. The action of Mr. Crawford in rescuing women and children from slavery is one for which he has not been, and ought not to be, condemned. I think the statement made by the hon. Member was not a fair one. And now, as to the case of Gbannah Gombo. On the 8th of March, 1889, I answered a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler) with regard to the unfortunate case of this chief who died from the effects of mortification of his wound in consequence, as was alleged, of having been too tightly bound. On that day I said that the Governor reported that the chief's death was attributed to blood poisoning in consequence of the mortification of the wound, and that the conduct which led to such a result was greatly to be regretted. In that I expressed not only my own view, but the view of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The hon. Gentleman would have acted more fairly if he had stated that the question had been raised and had been fully answered on the 8th of March, 1889. I think the Committee will believe that, so far from these expeditions having been undertaken from the sheer spirit of wanton cruelty, as suggested by the hon. Member for Leicester, they were rendered necessary for the rescue of women and children, and nothing more was done than was absolutely needed for that object. I do not think I need weary the Committee with any further observations. I believe I have answered all the points raised by the hon. Member.

(552.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has given a very weak answer to an extremely grave charge. I object to the observation that we have no right to make attacks on the Governors of these distant colonies. If the right hon. Gentleman had said that observations upon the acts of these gentlemen should be made with discretion and reserve, I should have agreed with him. But he seems to have suggested that we have no right at all to criticise their acts. Has he seriously studied the Constitution of this country when he lays down such a monstrous proposition?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: What I said was that unfounded charges should not be made against men in responsible positions.

Baron H. de Worms

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman said nothing of the kind. Of course, unfounded charges should not be made against anybody, and I wish the right hon. Gentleman had always remembered that in the course of his political career. Now, there are several parts of the case which the right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to answer. He did not explain the strange change of front on the part of the Colonial Authorities at home and of Governor Hay, who for weeks and months condemned the conduct of Mr. Crawford. That change of purpose has been little short of a scandal. How does the right hon. Gentleman account for the Colonial Office backing Governor Hay in condemning those unauthorised expeditions? He seems to be surprised that we echo the complaints of Governor Hay. The right hon. Gentleman now justifies Mr. Crawford on the ground of the rescue of women and children. But Mr. Crawford does not demean himself by putting forth any such plea of justification. What he says is something very different. On page 9 it will be found he says, in a despatch to the Governor, that the only way to renew trade, not by 5 per cent., but 100 per cent., which means good for the revenue as well as for the merchants and traders, is to smash this chief, and that I think this alone is sufficient to show that these expeditions were undertaken solely for vulgar brutal greed. "One hundred per cent." was the real reason for the expedition against Mackiah, and not the humanitarian object suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, I should like to know what answer does the right hon. Gentleman give to the charge about the distribution of gin among the chiefs? Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of that course?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then the right hon. Gentleman might have occupied a portion of his time in expressing condemnation of it. He completed his speech without saying one word in condemnation of it; and in his position his silence might well have been misinterpreted into approval of such a course. I think, even with a Compensation Bill to push through the House, that he might have ventured on some condemnation of the demoralisation of these districts by the distribution of gin. The right hon. Gentleman never said anything on that subject. There is another subject—the treatment of the Chief Fahwoondo. On that subject the right hon. Gentleman said nothing whatever. All I can say is, Mr. Courtney, that I regard it as something very like an insult to the intelligence of this Committee that the right hon. Gentleman can get up and imagine that he can escape the grave indictment brought by my hon. Friend. As to the distribution of gin, I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether or not he approves of the conduct of Mr. Crawford? The right hon. Gentleman does not make a sign of assent or dissent. We shall extort from the right hon. Gentleman, if we continue this Debate, some more courteous and more proper treatment than he has hitherto given it. I come to the last point, and that is the treatment of this unfortunate man, Gbannah Gombo. I would like to call the attention of the Committee first to the despatch of Governor Hay—Despatch No. 86; from Governor Hay to Lord Knutsford—

“My Lord, with reference to my despatch of the 17th ultimo, in the third paragraph of which I stated that I was taking to Freetown, as prisoner, Gbannah Gombo, for plundering the town of Samah, in the Luhu country, I have the honour to report that that chief died in the gaol yesterday.”

This is a very terse description of this transaction. Who would imagine the horrors, some of which have already been detailed by my hon. Friend, from this description, “he died in the gaol yesterday.” This man died from cruelties which, if committed in Siberia by Russian officials, would have extorted from the right hon. Gentleman, who has distinguished himself in his career by strong denunciations of Russia, an expression of the fact that he was astounded and shocked that no word of reprobation had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. But because this transaction has been on British territory by British officials, the right hon. Gentleman thinks the justice of the case met by a mild expression of regret, which he has just read to the House. What happened? This man was so brutally ill-treated during his imprisonment that his arm mortified, and he died from blood-poisoning. It is a most horrible and shocking story. I will read the evidence of the surgeon—

“The deceased Gbannah Gombo was admitted into the gaol hospital on the evening of the 24th January last, and died this morning. He was admitted in a weak and exhausted condition, suffering from the effects of ill-usage previous to his admission into the gaol. He had the marks of rope round his neck, his thighs, above the knee, and his elbows. The prominent parts of his body, such as his shoulders, his elbows, and his hips, were bruised, evidently from lying in a hard place, such as a boat. His right forearm was in a state of mortification or sloughing, caused by the tightness of the rope that had encircled both his arms. He died of blood poisoning, the result of the mortified arm.”

Now, here is the evidence of John Henry Williams—

“I am a lance-corporal of police. The deceased, Gbannah Gombo, was handed over as a prisoner to the police stationed at Maffui, about the middle of the past month by the Governor. I was one of the police. He was then tied; his arms were bound behind his back. The Private Secretary ordered us to keep the man tied. We were ordered by Mr. Parkes to take Gbannah Gombo to Bonthe in a boat. We left Maffui with the deceased on the morning of the 17th January. His arms were now tied before him, there being no handcuffs. We placed him in the stern, where he could lie or sit as he pleased. We reached Bonthe on the 20th, when the ropes were taken off the deceased, and we left there, on the 23rd, in the Countess of Derby, with him. When the deceased was first delivered to us at Maffui, the upper part of his right arm was a little bruised. We reached Freetown on the evening of the 24th, when I was directed by Mr. Parkes, who handed me at the same time an official letter for the gaoler, to take Gbannah Gombo to the gaol. That is the body of Gbannah Gombo lying in the dead-house, and which was just now viewed by the coroner and jury.”

Then this witness says—“The deceased, made no complaint,” a statement on which I have my own opinion. Here is a transaction which, if got hold of by the Russian Press, would effectually put an end to any of these Pharisaical denunciations of cruelties under the Russian Government. I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. Courtney. I condemn as strongly as anybody those atrocities which are committed in Siberia, taking the accounts given of them as not exaggerated. At the same time, I very strongly condemn a Christian and Constitutional Government represented in this House passing over these atrocities with such a mild expression of regret as we have got from the right hon. Gentleman. I think that the Committee and the country have reason to be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester for the manner in which he has brought this question before the House, and I think, on the other hand, that we have every ground for dissatisfaction with the scant, flimsy, and incomplete answer made by the right hon. Gentleman.

\(6.12.)* MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Mr. Courtney, I think my hon. Friend has done signal service in bringing this matter before the Committee. I am perfectly prepared to make every allowance for one in the position of Governor Hay, who cannot refer home for authority, and is obliged to act on the spur of the moment, and who is liable to be made responsible for the acts of underlings and officials, who are not always men of the highest stamp. If the expedition had stopped at the original object of liberating a number of slaves, even though some persons had been unavoidably killed in the operation, I should not have been disposed to say anything, but the matter went a good deal further than that. The declaration of Mr. Crawford that his object was to increase trade 100 per cent. showed that his object was a very different one to that of simply liberating a number of slaves. As to the death of this unfortunate Gombo, no excuse whatever has been offered, and the case is practically undefended. But I confess I was disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman did not utter one word of regret or condemnation of the attempts which have been referred to, to bribe these chiefs with presents of rum and tobacco. I do hope, before the Debate closes, that the right hon. Gentleman will express his regret for this most objectionable practice.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The question raised by the hon. Member for Leicester was as to the action of Mr. Crawford in destroying villages and rescuing the captives, and not as to the distribution of rum. I answered that fully; and with regard to the presents of rum to the natives, I not only very strongly condemn any such action, but, as the Representative of the Colonial Office in this House, I, in the course of a recent Debate, expressed the strongest condemnation of the liquor traffic amongst the savages. It is the endeavour of Her Majesty's Government to do all in their power to limit and put down the traffic.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Mr. Courtney, I have again to complain that the right hon. Gentleman has not answered my statements with reference to the Chief Fahwoondoo, and I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to point out one word of condemnation in the despatches. I want the right hon. Gentleman to point out in this Blue Book one single despatch or one single sentence in which any condemnation of the demoralisation of the chiefs by liquor is expressed. And here I must express my astonishment at the want of courtesy displayed by the right hon. Gentleman in not having given an answer to this question when previously put by my hon. Friend. I would further say that his position in this House is not so great nor so high as to place him above the ordinary courtesies of Debate, one of which is that when the attention of a Minister is called to a particular subject, and a question is put upon it, he should give an answer to it. I now ask the right hon. Gentleman what answer he has to give to the case put forward with regard to the Chief Fahwoondoo, whose imprisonment and ill-treatment have been so much complained of?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has alleged that I have been guilty of discourtesy; but I think that if anyone has a right to complain of discourtesy it is for me to complain of discourtesy on the part of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leicester.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: How?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: In the first place, I had no notice that this subject was to be brought forward.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: It was on the Paper.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman had not the courtesy to inform me as to the subject he wished to draw attention to; and I think that the Committee will certainly acquit me of any discourtesy in not having, under the circumstances, been provided with all the papers relating to an incident which happened more than a year ago. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liverpool has asked for some information with regard to the case of the Chief Fahwoondoo, and the only answer I have to give is that at the time referred to the country in which that chief had authority was in an extremely critical and dangerous condition; and Fahwoondoo was suspected of secretly aiding those opposed to us; and, in the exercise of his discretion, Mr. Crawford thought it right to arrest Fahwoondoo and send him down to Freetown. That official was justified in what he did by the difficult position in which affairs were placed; but when Sir James Hay found there was not sufficient grounds for detaining him he was released.

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): It appears to me that the two chiefs who have been referred to were arrested in the most illegal manner, and that the illegality of those arrests has been fully established. But, notwithstanding this, the right hon. Gentleman appears to justify what was done. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question with regard to the unfortunate man Gbannah Gomb, who died from the treatment he received during his capture and subsequent confinement. I would remind him that this matter was the subject of a question addressed to him some months ago; and I would ask whether he has not received information as to the conduct of those who are responsible for what then took place. We have heard of the expression of dissatisfaction on the part of the Government with what was done by those persons; and I should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether any measure of punishment has been enjoined by the Governor or any other authority with regard to their action? If not, I think the right hon. Gentleman, as representing Her Majesty's Government, might fairly say he is prepared to express the dissatisfaction they feel with regard to the very cruel treatment to which that individual was subjected.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: During the time the hon. Gentleman has been speaking I have read the Report of the answer I made to the question he has referred to, and I find that I then said the Secretary of State had had under consideration the conduct of those who had so treated that unfortunate man, and had expressed his disapproval, at the same time warning them of what would be the consequence if there were any repetition of the offence.

*MR. PICTON: The right hon. Gentleman knows that when I ventured to allude to Mr. Crawford while another matter was before the Committee I was out of order, and I was rightly stopped by the Chairman. I then stated that I wished to bring this question before the Committee, and I should hardly have thought that a gentleman occupying the responsible position of the right hon. Gentleman could have been unprepared to have entered upon such a subject. I do not think I ever knew a case in which a story of wrong and misery and cruelty has been met in a more cold-hearted way than that in which this case has been met by the right hon. Gentleman. It is all very well for him to think that, because I am an insignificant Member of this House, he can afford to despise a question of this sort when brought forward by me; but the matter is one that does not rest with me; it rests with public opinion, and I am persuaded that public opinion will be on my side when I am found raising a question of justice and right, and can show that I have a fair claim to courteous treatment from the Ministerial Bench. I assert that the right hon. Gentleman has not treated me with due courtesy, and that if he thinks he can in the space of five minutes poohpoo a subject which it has necessarily taken considerable time to put forward in detail he is mistaken. He says the Government have condemned the employment of liquor to a demoralising extent among these people; but I ask for some evidence of this. Let the right hon. Gentleman produce a despatch in which the Government has taken this course. There is nothing of the kind in the Blue Book; while, on the other hand, the approval of the Governor is asked for and given, and the expenses are allowed. Can the right hon. Gentleman explain the unrighteous treatment of Fahwoondoo and his friends? The Governor said an illegal act had been perpetrated, which he condemned, and ordered not to be repeated. The question I have brought before the Committee is one of humanity, and I say that the Government dare not treat the people of Wales or Scotland as they treat these poor natives. I am afraid I cannot mention Ireland along with Wales and Scot land, because things which are done there are justified by the Chief Secretary, and do not arouse so much attention here as any wrong that might be inflicted on the people of Scotland or Wales, in regard to whom Her Majesty's Government would take a very different course of action. I am afraid that no good result will follow what is being done in Africa until we understand that the black man's life is as sacred as that of the white, and that if the black is slaughtered needlessly a full account will be demanded. Here, however, no such account has been demanded, and no punishment has been inflicted. There has been nothing but a weak expression of the hope that such things will not happen in the future. I earnestly trust that I shall have the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House in condemning this most unrighteous course.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I cannot but regret that the right hon. Gentleman, who is responsible for this Vote, has not taken a different course. He has been dealing with a matter involving acts of reckless cruelty of which he has given us no clear condemnation, nor is there any clear condemnation of those acts in the Blue Book. He has given us some very nice phrases about the desire of the Government and the Secretary of State to diminish the liquor traffic, but there is no distinct condemnation of that traffic in the despatches here produced. The Committee have a right to expect something more definite. The truth is that most of the officials in contact with these unfortunate people treat them as though they were not human beings on anything like the same level with ourselves, and that is the difficulty of dealing with the different native races—a difficulty which the Colonial Office should take care to diminish as much as possible by expressing disapproval of the use of violence such as Captain Crawford has exhibited. I trust that the hon. Member for Leicester will go a Division upon this question, and that the vote will not be a Party vote; but that those who are in the habit of saying something ought to be done in behalf of the aborigines by the European race will now come forward and give their votes in favour of the Amendment.

Mr. Pictou

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square: I should be exceedingly reluctant to find this House avowing that there is not the same feeling in regard to this question on both sides of the House. It would, indeed, be giving a wrong impression to our fellow-subjects in many parts of the world to say that the same feeling did not apply to every part of the House. My right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies is under the disadvantage that he has not been able to study the more recent despatches bearing on this matter during the past few days, and, therefore, it is impossible for him to answer with that precision on the subject than hon. Members below the Gangway, through having the subject in their minds, require. Under the circumstances of the case, however, I trust that hon. Members will not feel it necessary to divide. We shall, of course, vote against the Motion to reduce the Vote, and may give our fellow-subjects in distant parts of the world the impression that we approve of the proceedings which hon. Members have so strongly condemned in the course of the Debate; and it may be that after we have had time to thoroughly examine into them, we shall not approve of those proceedings. To force on a Division at this moment may be to give a wrong impression by inducing the outside world to believe that there is a difference of opinion amongst us. I need scarcely assure hon. Members that occurrences of this sort create the same impression on the Government as on other people. It certainly happens sometimes that there are unfortunate occurrences affecting other races than our own in which British officials are concerned; but, on the whole, the government of native peoples by Englishmen has been less marred by such occurrences than any other European administration of native affairs. In fact, our administration has been singularly free from these deplorable occurrences. With respect to the exceptional instance before the Committee, our view has now been expressed; and in these circumstances I trust that we shall not be compelled to divide, for the Division might, as I have explained, create a perfectly false impression.

(6.35.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought it necessary to supplement the very inadequate remarks of the Under Secretary for the Colonies with regard to these occurrences, and I endorse what he has said—that our agents in distant parts of the world have great difficulties to contend with, and that their administration is less marred by these deplorable occurrences than the administration of the officials of other European nationalities; but I do hold that the Government should always express strong reprobation when these deplorable incidents take place. I, myself, have a notice on the Paper bearing on this subject, namely—

“On Civil Service Estimates, Class V., Vote 3, Sub-head I., to move to reduce the Vote by £100 (part of the Salary of the Governor of Sierra Leone).”

The subject, however, has been so fully and adequately laid before the Committee by my hon. Friend below the Gangway that I do not desire to go over the ground again. I would say, generally, however, that the result of perusing the Blue Books has been to strengthen me in the suspicion I have always entertained that the object with which native races in all parts of the world are treated with cruelty and severity, especially on the West Coast of Africa, is not the humane one which is sometimes put forward as the pretext, but is to further the interests of local traders and monopolists. The object in the particular case to which the attention of the Committee has been called, seems to have been to raise the profit of British merchants from 5 per cent. to 100 per cent. Fourteen cases of gin were given to the native chiefs. It ought to be distinctly understood that such gifts ought not to be made by officials of the Government, and I think we are justified in asking for a distinct pledge from Her Majesty's Ministers that this practice will be discontinued in future. But Mr. Copland Crawford has been guilty in another case. Tried before the Colonial Court for flogging his servant to death, he was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. From Sierra Leone he was sent to England to undergo the sentence, as it was held that his health was not such as to enable him to endure the confinement in the severe climate of the colony; but on reaching these shores, he was examined by two medical men, who certified that his health was so bad that his life would be jeopardised by imprisonment. The result is, that Mr. Crawford goes scot free. It may be that there was sufficient ground for releasing him; that he had suffered so much from the ill effects of the climate that it was necessary to remit the punishment, but I would ask who were the medical men who signed the certificate, and what was the form of it? Did the certificate say that the man was so ill that it would be fatal to him to endure this 12 months' imprisonment?

*(6.40.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I suppose I am right in assuming that Mr. Crawford will not be employed any longer by the Colonial Office.

*(6.40.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I can give the right hon. Gentleman all the assurance he desires in that respect. I may explain that Mr. Crawford was sent to this country from Sierra Leone because it was found that his health was too bad to admit of his being detained there. It was believed that if imprisoned in that climate he would not live many months. On his arrival at Liverpool he was examined by Mr. Palmer Ross, colonial surgeon of Sierra Leone, at the instance of the Colonial Office, and by Dr. Beamish, the senior surgeon at Walton Prison, at the instance of the Home Office, and they certified as follows:—

“In accordance with the instructions of the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, we proceeded on board the S.S. Lagos immediately on her arrival at Liverpool (from Sierra Leone) at 8 p.m. of the 24th instant, and medically examined Captain Crawford. We found the following conditions to be present:—Absence of reflex action at left knee, slightly present in right knee; impaired sensibility of left foot and leg up to knee; inability to clench the hands tightly; unsteadiness of gait; oedema of both ankles and feet; enlargement of abdomen (evidently from fluid) with increased size of liver and spleen; excited action of heart; marked mental excitement; slight hesitancy in speech.”

I think that hon. Gentlemen will admit that such a state of health was amply sufficient to warrant the medical officers examining him in recommending that the remainder of the sentence should be remitted.

(6.42.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I think we should congratulate the hon. Member for Leicester on the Debate he has brought about this afternoon. He has taken a great deal of trouble and spent a large amount of time in looking up the case and in laying it before the House; and after hearing the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it seems to me that there is only one course to follow. The right hon. Gentleman wishes us not to arrive at a too hasty decision, and not to appear to give a one-sided vote; then, I would suggest that the proper way to obviate any appearance of the kind would be to postpone the Vote so as to give the Under Secretary for the Colonies the opportunity he desires of informing himself on the subject. If the right hon. Gentleman does not accept this suggestion, I would advise the hon. Member for Leicester to divide the Committee. The Under Secretary cannot justly complain of having been taken by surprise, for I see the following on the Notice Paper:—

“Mr. Picton.—On Civil Service Estimates, Class V., Vote 3, Sub-head J (Western Coast of Africa), to move to reduce the Vote by $500.”

In face of such a notice I should hold it to be the duty of the Minister responsible for the Vote to come down fully prepared for its discussion. It is his duty, I take it, to go through all the Blue Books relating to his Department from time to time. As he has failed to make a defence on this occasion, the only alternative is to postpone the Vote in order to enable him to make himself acquainted with the facts and to give us what explanation he can. The indictment of the hon. Member for Leicester had not yet been adequately replied to.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid. St. Austell): I think it only just to the Government to say that I know from private sources that Mr. Crawford's health was such as to render it quite impossible that he should undergo the sentence of imprisonment passed upon him. I admit that it is extremely difficult for the Colonial Office to control the action of its subordinates in all parts of the world. At the same time, questions of the sort under discussion ought not to be lightly passed over, as by so doing we may make a bad impression upon the native races if they have reason to think that an English subject, whether black or white, and whether at Sierra Leone or in Regent-street, does not have fair-play at the hands of the Government. We govern, I suppose, more coloured races than any nation in the world, and I believe the British Government is more popular amongst all coloured races than any other Government for the reason that these races believe they receive fair-play at our hands. It is of immense importance that that sentiment should be sustained. It is of enormous advantage to the trade of this country; therefore, I think that whenever instances occur where natives have been subjected to unjust treatment at the hands of our Agents, they should be thoroughly examined into and pronounced upon in this House. I trust it is not intended in the future to allow colonial matters to slide.

*(6.49.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I would appeal to the Government to postpone this Vote, as I agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer it would be a thing to be deplored to have a Division upon a subject upon which we ought to be all as one man. Wicked and abominable deeds have been committed in the name of this country, and the Minister who is called upon to reply for our Colonial Office, without having thoroughly informed his mind on the question, gets up and offers an apology which almost suggests some excuse for the person who is mainly responsible. We have a right to demand a more satisfactory reply than that, in the light of a more searching examination of the facts. We have a right also to be told not only that Mr. Crawford has been dismissed from the Service of the Crown, but that he has been dismissed under conditions which will debar him from receiving a pension. The Minister in charge of the Vote ought to have an opportunity of making such a speech as will prevent the necessity of a Division.

*(6.50.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen): The tone in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer addressed the Committee was so essentially different from that which had previously been adopted on the Government Bench that I should be glad if it were possible to avoid a Division. But I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in face of one case which has been referred to, it is possible to escape a Division? I speak of the case of Gombo. He was a chief held in high respect and exercising authority in his own country. His is, therefore, an instance from which we may form a judgment as to the way in which the poorer people are treated. It was considered necessary to arrest him. He was arrested, and he was subjected to torture which led directly to his death. His hands were tied behind his back tightly with ropes that cut through the flesh. It is impossible that this should not have been known to those who were responsible for the arrest. The chief was so seriously wounded by this operation that, after he was taken to prison, the hand mortified and he died in consequence. What did the Colonial Office do? Here was a man cruelly done to death, and treated as badly as prisoners in Siberia. Did the Colonial Office express any condemnation of the proceeding? Not by a single word. Did they take any steps to punish the persons who were wilfully guilty of such atrocious cruelty? They took no steps even to ascertain who was to blame, and they actually abstained from a single word of condemnation. Lord Knutsford's Despatch of the 4th of March, 1889, merely acknowledged the receipt of the Despatch informing him of the Chief's death, and his next Despatch conveys his approval of such orders as had been issued to the police for the avoidance of such accidents in the future. What is the Chancellor of the Exchequer's opinion of this mode of treating such a case? How does he think it is possible for us to hold up our heads before the world? Under the circumstances I have referred to, if the proposed reduction is pressed to a Division I shall vote for it.

*(6.57.) BARON H. DE WORMS: In justice to the Secretary of State, I cannot allow the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman to go unchallenged. Lord Knutsford did condemn the unfortunate occurrence to which reference has been made, and I have stated that the strictest orders were given to the police that handcuffs should be used, and that the greatest care should be taken that no injury or hardship should be committed. That which Lord Knutsford approved was not the unfortunate occurrence, but the immediate action taken by the Governor with the object of preventing a repetition of it. The man was violent in resisting his arrest, and his hands had to be secured. The police had no handcuffs with them, and the rope they used was extremely hard. It was in consequence of its hardness, rather than of the tightness with which it was tied, that his hand was lacerated. The man was in an extremely bad state of health.

(6.59.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes we will not take a Division, because it may produce a wrongful impression on the black races if they vote as he says they will have to do on the other side. But we have two matters to consider. In the first place, we have to insist that cruelties of this nature should be prevented in the future; and, in the next place, we have to consider the action of Her Majesty's Government. Most unquestionably the action of the Government has been most improper in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman explained that Mr. Crawford, when he came to England after having been sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for flogging his servant to death, was liberated because he was ill. But what are we to think of the administration of affairs in this place, when an officer who flogs his servant to death receives a punishment of only 12 months' imprisonment? I should have thought that Her Majesty's Government ought to have expressed the opinion that such a punishment was utterly inadequate. With regard to Gombo, the right hon. Gentleman has explained that what occurred was a mere accident. The police did not happen to have handcuffs with them, and the rope happened to be rather too stiff. But when the facts were represented to Her Majesty's Government did they make any protest? I say there is actually none on record. The right hon. Gentleman says Lord Knutsford approved of the instructions given to the police to be more careful in the future, but nobody was punished. We have another charge also to make against the Government. It is recorded in a Despatch printed in the Blue Book that Mr. Crawford gave 50 cases of gin to the native Chiefs. The Governor makes no sort of protest against this gift, but treats it as a matter of course, and we may presume, therefore, that this is the way in which these chiefs are habitually treated in this part of the world. I think, on the whole, that the Government have come exceedingly badly out of this discussion. They have not acted with any sort of energy or determination, and if we had not had this discussion, the things would have been passed over as if they were entirely normal. Under these circumstances, if we go to a Division, I shall certainly vote for the reduction.

(7.5.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I wish to know what foundation there is for the right hon. Gentleman's statement that Gombo behaved with great violence when he was arrested?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The statement is founded on information at the Colonial Office.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: There is a Despatch from the Governor to Lord Knutsford reporting the arrest, and it does not contain a word about resistance on the part of Gombo. There is not even a hint in the evidence of the Commissary of Police that Gombo, after his arrest, did not proceed to gaol with the greatest quietness. I give the right hon. Gentleman notice that we shall call on him to produce at a later date the information on which he founds his statement, that the course taken was justified by Gombo's violence. I am willing to concede that the intervention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the debate has given a considerably different complexion to that which it previously bore. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary had treated the indictment of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) with a levity which was very unbecoming, and which led to a strong feeling of resistance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has somewhat smoothed the situation by the very candid expression of his feeling of condemnation of the actions to which my hon. Friend alluded. But that is not enough. The right hon. Gentleman will see that we cannot allow it to go forth to the millions of the native races who are dependent on us that such transactions as are recorded in this Blue Book are treated with anything but the strongest condemnation by the Imperial Parliament. The Under Secretary for the Colonies excuses the inadequacy of his reply by the shortness of the notice. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consent to give the Under Secretary an opportunity of further discussing the case later we shall be willing to refrain from taking a Division on the present occasion. Unless this be done, I think we are bound to challenge the opinion of the House on the question.

(7.9.) CAPTAIN BETHELL: Hon. Members opposite have treated the case as if Mr. Crawford was guilty of an act of personal cruelty to Gombo. I think it is only just to point out that, although Mr. Crawford was rightly responsible for the binding of the man, of course, the actual work was carried out by the police. No doubt Mr. Crawford behaved extremely badly in another matter, and was properly punished, but, at the same time, I think it is fair to acquit him of the charge of personal cruelty in this particular matter.

(7.10.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): The complaint we make is that not the slightest punishment has ever been meted out, not to Mr. Crawford, but to the police. Now we come to the case of Crawford. It is said he is not responsible for what occurred. We say he is. He himself has told us that the acts of cruelty were done by himself. What we complain of is that when he deliberately drew the attention of his superior officer to what he had done, not one particle of reproof is meted out to him. In his letter dated December 11th, and which is given in the Blue Book, Mr. Crawford dealt with two or three different subjects. In the first place he told his superior officer that he was about to commence almost military operations against certain persons whose names he gave, and then he said he had seen certain Chiefs, and added—

"I have so far succeeded in effecting peace between them, and they have all left quite satisfied. On their departure I gave them 14 cases of gin and 14lbs. of tobacco, for which I would ask Your Excellency's approval."

What took place? A formal and categorical answer was returned by His Excellency. His Excellency pointed out that Mr. Crawford had exceeded his instructions with regard to the warlike operations—that his duty was limited to defensive operations—and there was not a word of reproof as to the matter which has been dwelt upon by various Members of the Committee. In his answer His Excellency never indicated in any sort of way that Mr. Crawford had done anything of which he ought to be ashamed. We complain that different treatment was meted out to the constable with his hard rope and to Mr. Crawford with his 14 cases of gin. It appears the Government have not come down to the House prepared to deal with the matter. In point of fact, the Under Secretary for the Colonies has been thrown over by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the ground that the Under Secretary has really not had time to read the matter up. We are to understand that if the right hon. Gentleman had had time to learn what is going on in his own office the thing would have been put in a nicer way. With an innocence which was very touching, the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested, "You had better not divide, because it will put us in an unfortunate position; we must vote against you whether you are right or wrong, and it will give a wrong impression." I do not see why they should vote against us. If we are right let the Government do violence to their feelings and vote right for once. If it is right this amount should be struck out of the Vote let the Government agree to strike it out. If they cannot do that they can at least postpone the Vote until such time as they are ready to deal properly with this atrocious matter. To enable the Government to consider the matter and make up their minds in regard to it I am prepared to move that you, Sir, should report Progress. I do not wish to press the Motion to a Division, but I will do so if the Government say they will not withdraw the Vote. I venture to suggest that there is something very unconstitutional in this matter. The Government say they have information which we are not possessed of. I ask them to lay that information on the Table. If they have not given us all the information, let them give it to us. Perhaps we are all in the wrong; let the Government give us all the information they possess, and we shall see how the matter stands. A very pertinent question which was put from the Front Opposition Bench has not yet received an answer. Is it, or is it not, a fact that this man is to receive a pension for his services? Are the Government prepared to say that Mr. Crawford shall not, when he recovers from his illness, as we all hope he will, and as we all believe he will, be re-employed in Her Majesty's Service? I ask for an answer to this question.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: He will not.

MR. WADDY: And he is not to have a pension.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: If the matter arises it will be considered.

MR. WADDY: Are we to be told that this man is to have a pension notwithstanding that he has committed these atrocities? If we are not to have an answer to the question I will move to report Progress.

(7.20.) MR. HANBURY: I should like to have a little more information on this point. Is this man going to have a pension, or is he not? It is really the gist of the whole thing. I doubt whether it is possible to give him a pension. I was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman say it has to be considered.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I never said anything of the sort. I said if the matter arose it would be considered.

*(7.21.) MR. GOSCHEN: As a matter of fact the question has not arisen. No application has been made to the Treasury for a pension. When the case comes before the Treasury with the certificates that will have to be given as to good conduct, of course it will be dealt with as it deserves. My right hon. Friend is unable to answer the question which has really not yet been put to him. It does not rest with the right hon. Gentleman or the Colonial Office to decide whether the man shall have a pension. The matter will come before the Treasury and will be dealt with on its merits.

(7.22.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is it not a fact that a man who is compelled to retire from the Service on account of a serious crime is not entitled to a pension?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have little hesitation in saying he will not be entitled to a pension. There have been cases, no doubt, where it has been proved that the person committing an offence had suffered from sunstroke, or had suffered from the climate to such a degree that his head was affected, and was not properly responsible for his actions. I do not suggest that that may have occurred in the present case; but I make the remark to show that it is difficult on the spur of the moment to give a final and definite answer. I should say, speaking off-hand, that the circumstances of the case are such that it would be impossible to give such an officer a pension.

(7.23.) MR. PICTON: I fully appreciate the intervention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I ask him whether the case has been answered this evening, and whether he will not, under the circumstances, consent to postpone the Vote. The Under Secretary for the Colonies says he does not know anything about the matter, which practically amounts to him saying he does not understand his business.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is impossible, after the long Debate which has taken place, to postpone the Vote. The case was stated at considerable length by the hon. Member for Leicester, and I think the Committee are in full possession of the facts and able to form a judgment upon them.

MR. WADDY: Will the Government lay on the Table the documents they have spoken of?

*(7.25.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): An important Constitutional point has been raised by the reply of the Under Secretary. Certain statements were made on this side, and the right hon. Gentleman got up and defended the cruel conduct of this man on the ground that certain information is in possession of the Colonial Office which has not been laid before the House. It is surely idle to print Blue Books and circulate them amongst Members of the House if a Minister can get up and defend action on the possession of information which is not in the possession of the Members of the House. We quite understand this kind of thing from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but it is new to have it from the Colonial Office. If there was no other reason why this Vote should be postponed a reason has been supplied by the Under Secretary.

(7.26.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): I was in hopes the Under Secretary would give some reply to what has been advanced. The Under Secretary has referred to something that is not in the Blue Book. Why is it we are not in possession of the additional information he has got?

MR. W. JAMES (Gateshead): I do not think anyone would be disposed to charge me with obstructing public business; but unless the right hon. Gentleman will give us all the information he has I think I should be justified in moving to report Progress.

(7.27.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): We want to know on what evidence other than that contained in the Blue Book the Colonial Office have acted. I appreciate the force of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's objection to report Progress, and I am not prepared to vote for that Motion if it is made. But we have had sprung upon us by the Under Secretary the fact that there is information which has not been laid on the Table of the House. I think the House is entitled to ask for the despatch.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I said information.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The information must have come in one or two ways: it must have come either in a telegram or a despatch.

(7.29.) MR. WADDY: At all events, I move to report Progress.

(7.30.) Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Waddy.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 121.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

Question again proposed, "That Item J, £2,500, for Western Coast of Africa, be reduced by £500."

(7.38.) MR. PICTON: I hope now we may come to a Division, but with the understanding that upon the Report stage the Under Secretary for the Colonies will be able to give us more ample information, more especially as to the despatch to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred as giving the information upon which he has based a statement he has made. If the right hon. Gentleman is not in a position to give us that information now, I do not wish to occupy time, but certainly many of us will expect the information upon the Report stage.

(7.39.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend, and it is not my intention to stand between the Committee and a Division. I only wish to say, by way of personal explanation, that when the Under Secretary explained that Gbannah Gombo violently resisted arrest, I asked in what despatch such resistance was referred to, and the right hon. Gentleman said he made the statement upon information in the possession of the Foreign Office. It was not until half an hour after that that the right hon. Gentleman charged me with having misquoted him; he did not do so immediately after I had spoken.

(7.40.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 64; Noes 114.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

Original Question again proposed.

(7.50.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Amendment I have to move is the reduction of Sub-head P by £200.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Before that, I desire to move a reduction under the present item by £150, and I do this for the purpose of eliciting some information from the Government as to their policy and the present position of affairs in reference to the unfortunate King Ja-Ja. From the consternation among Members of the Government on the mention of this name, it would seem they have forgotten all about Ja-Ja, but I think it will be found the matter is pertinent to this Vote. It will be desirable to explain the circumstances under which Ja Ja was two or three years ago kidnapped by a British officer.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is referring to a matter which does not appear to be included in the Vote. This is not the Vote for the Colonial Office.

MR. CONYBEARE: This is a Vote, I understand, for the Governors on the West Coast of Africa.

THE CHAIRMAN: Only one Governor, that of Sierra Leone, and the matter does not refer to that colony.

MR. CONYBEARE: On what part of the Votes shall I be in order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will not be in order upon this Vote.

(7.52.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have to move a reduction in Item P, the salary of the High Commissioner in the Western Pacific. I desire to move the reduction not on account of any general disposition to find fault with the conduct of Her Majesty's Representative in the Western Pacific, on the contrary, speaking generally, the High Commissioner deserves the praise of the country for having done his best in the interests of all parties. But there are circumstances in which it is impossible for the best of High Commissioners or Deputy Commissioners to withstand the influence of a long-continued and bad policy. In the Debate which has just taken place the Representative of the Government has disclaimed the idea that the expeditions were designed for wholesale slaughter and bombardment; the expeditions on the West Coast were primarily made, he said, with a definite object, the release of prisoners, and so on, but this description does not apply to naval action in the Pacific generally. In a succession of Blue Books we have stories of the cruise of H.M.S. Diamond and H.M.S. Opal, and these narrations are nothing else than a series of bombardments of native villages, of slaughtering, and of destruction of native settlements and canoes. It is not necessary that I should go back upon these official accounts of two or three years ago, but I refer to the latest incidents of the kind which, though they have not yet found their place in a Blue Book, and only appear in a newspaper paragraph, bear all the traces of a continuance of that policy with which we have long been familiar. The paragraph to which I draw attention appeared on December 17th last, and described how H.M.S. Royalist had completed a seven months' cruise in the Pacific Seas, during which time many villages were burned, islands bombarded, and canoes and plantations destroyed for several murders which had been committed. I admit that those bombardments were caused by acts of violence committed by the natives, but our policy in this respect seems to be that if we cannot catch the actual murderers we execute vengeance upon the whole people. This seems to me to be a barbarous state of things. We, in fact, do exactly as the natives. They look upon Europeans as a hostile tribe, and when natives are ill-used by certain Europeans they revenge themselves upon the next European they catch, and very likely kill him. We do exactly the same thing, for when Europeans are ill-used we make reprisals, subjecting natives generally to bombardment, the destruction of their property, and all the harm we can inflict. It is a barbarous proceeding, and we cannot be surprised if the natives continue it. If the first offence had been committed by the natives these hostile operations might be, to some extent, palliated. But we have it on the highest authority—that of Her Majesty's Commissioner, according to the recent Blue Book on New Guinea—that the natives are the persons first sinned against. They defend themselves or make reprisals for injustice suffered, and then, because the actual offenders cannot be discovered, we execute vengeance upon the whole tribe, men, women, and children being killed, and whole villages being destroyed. The High Commissioner has told us that in many of these cases the natives had what they might consider reasonable excuse for what they did. Sir Peter Scratchley has given us the result of investigations he made, and in many cases the killing of Europeans has been caused by crimes committed by the latter against native law, unfair dealing, and the demand for vengeance aroused by the evils of the labour traffic. It is the opinion of Sir Peter Scratchley that on nearly every occasion the natives had received direct or indirect provocation, and in many cases the fate that befel Europeans was the result of reckless disregard of warnings given. The account of the cruise of the Royalist is but a parallel to many such cruises by Her Majesty's ships. It is a lamentable state of things, and surely it is incumbent upon us to try to put a stop to it. I might quote other evidence from the Blue Books. Mr. Musgrave, the Deputy Commissioner, says that the recruits from New Guinea were irregularly obtained in the first instance—meaning that the natives were kidnapped. Mr. Forbes also, our Resident in Samarang, says natives were kidnapped or entrapped by false statements, and the crimes of a few Europeans in this way are enough to inflame the natives of the Archipelago against white men for a whole generation. In fact, the authoritative evidence of our own officers shows that outrages on whites are the result of aggression; in the first instance, of whites against natives, either on the part of individuals or by those engaged in prosecuting the labour traffic, and whose crimes are avenged upon their successors. In our Blue Books we have accounts of barbarities committed by natives; but we have no statement from the blacks of their wrongs, which might excuse their barbarous vengeance. No one who reads the information put before us can doubt the grave evils of the labour traffic. I ask, Do the Government mean to maintain the system of which this cruise of the Royalist offers an example? Is it the only system we can resort to? I hope we may be told that there is no intention to continue this policy of simply barbarous vengeance, this system of merciless bombardment and slaughter, which is a discredit to the British name, and condemned on high authority. I move the reduction of the Vote by £250.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has not observed that there is no salary for the High Commissioner included in the Vote. There is for the Deputy Commissioner.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I move the reduction in respect to the salary of the Deputy Commissioner.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item P 1, £1,890, for salaries of the Western Pacific High Commission, be reduced by £250, part of the salaries of the Deputy Commissioners."—(Sir George Campbell.)

(8.10.) COLONEL NOLAN: I do not agree with all the hon. Member has said; but I think he deserves the thanks of the public for bringing this question before the Committee. The Committee is not largely attended at this moment, but this is a question which ought to receive European attention, and our discussion here may serve to draw that attention to it. I do not agree with the hon. Member that these proceedings are particularly discreditable to the British name. I remember a speech delivered about a month ago by the hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin (Sir T. Esmonde) on his return from the Pacific, wherein he said that the British were more tolerant towards the natives than the Germans were. Outside the sphere of American influence the English and Germans are best known among the natives, and it is acknowledged that, of the two, the English are the more tolerant, so that it is the conduct of Europeans towards the natives that is in question, and the action of England is not to be singled out for condemnation. To a certain extent I agree with the hon. Member, and I think that bombardment of towns is about the worst remedy that can be resorted to to check the violence of natives, but I cannot go so far as to say when Europeans are murdered, even if other Europeans have been aggressors, that, therefore, the murderers are to escape. It may be impossible to find any evidence to convict the actual murderers, it may be that the natives on an island may kill and eat a whole boat's crew, and some punishment must be inflicted upon the inhabitants of that island. I should not object to the landing of a force, and the shooting of a certain number of men, but a bombardment kills, probably, only the old people, the women, and children, because all who are able to do so seek shelter when the first shell falls. I look upon bombardments of towns as cruel and unnecessary, and I really think it ought to be ruled out of all warfare, civilised or uncivilised. Of course, if, in the shelling of a fortified place, a shell falls among the civil population that is but one of the chances of war. It would be quite possible to land a larger force to capture a certain number of men who, in all probability, if not the actual murderers, must have connived at the murder of Europeans, and execute them. Though I do not go so far as the hon. Member, I support his protest, for I think the policy of bombardment ridiculous, and it inflicts punishment upon those who are least guilty among the people. An arrangement should be arrived at by the American and European Governments for police measures for the punishment of outrages upon Europeans. Punishment there must be, or there will be no chance for any shipwrecked crew; and the punishment should be severe and systematic. I do not blame the officers of the Royalist, for they were only obeying orders and following the old custom; but in future I should like to see the shelling of villages discontinued, unless resistance is offered.

*(8.14.) BARON H. DE WORMS: No specific allegations have been made by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and it is rather difficult to answer the vague and general accusations which the hon.

Gentleman has made against those who have to administer affairs in the Pacific. The hon. Member quoted from a Blue Book, dated some years back, the opinion of Sir Peter Scratchley—

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I referred to the cruise of the Royalist, and that vessel has only just returned.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member dwelt upon the opinion of Sir Peter Scratchley, who has been dead for more than three years. I can assure the hon. Member that when extreme measures are resorted to Her Majesty's naval officers act with as much humanity as is possible, considering the object in view. The statement that the whites are always the aggressors cannot be substantiated. Within the last few months a crew of Europeans were engaged in fishing when they were all murdered, and most of them eaten by the natives.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Were they in their boats?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: They had landed on the coast with no intention but fishing.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Landing was regarded as an act of aggression.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: There have been many cases where Europeans have been murdered without any provocation. It is only in such extreme cases that it is necessary for us to assert our authority, and to show the natives that these horrible massacres cannot take place with impunity. The only way of punishing tribes who commit outrages on passing vessels, or on individual traders, is by what may be called an act of war. The High Commissioner has no jurisdiction over the inhabitants of the islands. Those responsible for carrying out such an act of war are the officers of Her Majesty's ships; the action can only be carried out by means with which the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken is familiar. I am not in a position to say if bombardment or another method should be adopted; that does not come within the scope of my duties. The only assurance I can give the Committee is that these extreme measures are only taken in extreme cases, and that they are always carried out with the greatest humanity, considering the object in view. No more force is used than is absolutely necessary. No brutality is used, and it is with the greatest regret that Her Majesty's ships are sometimes obliged to be employed in this service.

(8.20.) COLONEL NOLAN: It is an important admission we have had from the right hon. Gentleman; he disclaims the onus of these proceedings, and throws all the responsibility upon naval officers. Now, I do not believe that when this statement becomes known—of course, the right hon. Gentleman can correct or amplify or explain his statement in Hansard—but I do not believe that after this statement naval commanders will resort to the practice of shelling native settlements on their own initiative, unless, of course, they consider themselves justified by the armed resistance of the natives. Now that entire responsibility is thus officially cast upon the naval officers in the Pacific I do not believe they will do it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The entire control of the operations; and, therefore, the responsibility must be with the commander of the ship.

COLONEL NOLAN: It comes to very much the same thing. I do not believe that any captain of a ship will incur the responsibility of bombarding a village if all the odium of the act is to rest upon him, an odium which the Under Secretary is so anxious to disclaim.

(8.25.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: I think we are all ready to protest against the doctrine that we are justified in shelling a native village because some of the inhabitants of the village may have had a quarrel with Europeans, which ended fatally for the latter. It may be that those engaged in the quarrel are not in the village at the time of bombardment, and the innocent only suffer from our reprisals. I sometimes doubt our claim to be considered pioneers of civilisation when I read of such incidents, and I am not surprised that savage peoples do not always accept our ideas of civilisation, thus enforced by shot and shell. The right hon. Gentleman has made a Ministerial speech from a Ministerial point of view, but it is not a complete answer to the criticisms offered.

(8.27.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Baron H. de Worms

(8.30.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: In regard to colonial matters I would advise no man, no matter what his political views, to be party to a count out. These matters cannot be treated lightly, and the House cannot be counted on the first night after re-assembling when colonial matters are being discussed. It is not a matter which directly affects the country I come from. Still I would ask, What would have been the effect in the colonies had they read in the papers tomorrow that the House had been counted out on colonial questions? I would venture to address the word of warning to hon. Gentlemen that it is not well that colonial matters should be treated in this way. I am aware that others are prepared to address the House on the subject, and I, therefore, resume my seat with great comfort and convenience to myself. (8.32.)

(9.4.) MR. CONYBEARE: I think it will be difficult to find a more important subject affecting this Empire than that which has been raised in connection with this Vote. The proceedings which are under consideration in connection with this Vote illustrate in a very forcible manner the nature of our policy in dealing with what I suppose I must call heathen or barbarous tribes in different portions of our dominions.

(9.5.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(9.7.) MR. CONYBEARE: The fact that two counts have taken place within the last half hour or so adds point to the observations I was about to make. It shows the deplorable absence of interest on the part of Members on both sides of the House in the proceedings on colonial matters at a distance from home, but which yet go to the root of our dominions throughout the world, and until Members feel bound by a sense of duty to take a greater interest in these matters, and to listen to the facts we are able, by industrious investigation of the Blue Books, to bring before the country, I am afraid that the nefarious atrocities that disgrace our character in the eyes of the people we profess to try to civilise will never cease. When the count was moved I was about to say that it has been a frequent matter of comment that, with all our boasted Christianity, the results of our operations amongst native races have been miserable to a degree, and that it is not surprising that we are not more successful in gaining over to Christianity heathen tribes in the Western Pacific, as well as elsewhere, when we consider the methods adopted to impress upon them what we regard as the fundamental principles of morality. It is also a matter of comment that, even where we do partially succeed in converting the heathen, the good that we may do is almost as speedily undone by the mischief produced by the amount of spirituous liquor we introduce amongst the natives in the name of British trade. I am not, however, on this occasion going to comment on that aspect of the case, though I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that it is one of sufficient importance to require the constant attention of Members of this House. But in connection with the particular matters which we have under our consideration to-night, I want to insist on the peremptory duty which rests upon us as Members of the House of Commons to control far more than we do at present the action of Her Majesty's Representatives in the form of the officers of ships of war and Consuls who seem to exercise an absolutely autocratic power of life and death, and to exercise, in the most ruthless manner, the power which is placed in their hands for the purpose of destroying whole villages and districts and great numbers of the lives of natives. I have here a newspaper report of "A Cruise of Revenge" in the South Pacific, and I want the Committee to observe what the facts are. The report says—

"Her Majesty's ship Royalist completed, on the 15th ultimo"

—that is somewhere at the end of last year—

"A seven months' cruise in the Pacific seas, during which many villages were burned down, islands bombarded, and canoes and plantations destroyed. The Royalist paid the most attention to the Solomon Group, where several murders had been committed. After investigating the case of the massacre of the crew of the vessel Savo and the murder of Messrs. Dabelle, the Royalist fired on the villages of the murderers. The natives, however, had fled on the approach of the war vessel, and none of them were killed. Their villages, canoes, and plantations were, however, destroyed by the war ship's guns. Manoba was shelled by the Royalist and the place destroyed. This was the chastisement for the murder of Mr. Armstrong, the Government Agent. Dinner Island was also bombarded by the Royalist. The natives at this place had murdered two prospectors who had visited the place. The natives here also had fled, fearing the destruction of their villages, and witnessed the bombardment from the tops of the mountains. When the Royalist visited Rendon, Lopko Kongo, she received news of the massacre of a boat's crew of the Enterprise. After killing the crew, the natives cut up the bodies in a shocking manner, and ate most of them. The place was shelled by the Royalist, after an unsuccessful attempt had been made to capture some of the murderers. Some of the Royalist's crew suffered considerably from fever, but no deaths occurred."

I am not desirous at all of inveighing in general or unmeasured terms against the actions of our Representatives in these distant and barbarious latitudes. I am perfectly well aware that the duty which our Representatives have to carry out, under such conditions, and in such places, is onerous and difficult, and highly responsible. No doubt great crimes are committed by the natives, and I do not say they should not be visited by some sort of retribution; but it does appear to me that in many of these cases our Representatives do not act with as much judgment, clemency, and regard for the principles of Christianity which they are supposed to be trying to spread as they should do. If we have regard to the instructions contained in the Blue Books, which lay down distinctly that a policy of revenge is not to be followed, it appears to me that in a case like this those principles have been, to a very great extent, departed from. And if we find that the crimes of which the natives are guilty are in some instances induced by the ill-treatment they (the natives) receive from our own countrymen, I think we shall have made out a very strong case why we should exercise much more stringent control over those to whom are committed such terrible powers over life and death than has hitherto been exercised. In order to illustrate the principles I have laid down I will quote from the Blue Book of this year. I find that in the appointment of John Douglas, Esq., to be Her Majesty's Special High Commissioner to protect the territory of New Guinea, he is required "to promote to the utmost of his power religion and civilisation amongst the natives of the Protectorate," and to prevent and restrain all violence and injustice that may be practised against the natives. I would ask the Committee whether we can find in the narrative I have just read out to the House anything to show that these principles are practised—principles which, I suppose, the occupants of the Government Bench are most ready to preach? I say that even if we do find barbarous savages killing and eating their neighbours and taking the usual methods of revenge upon foreigners who come to interfere with their institutions, and to commit all manner of misdeeds amongst them, it is not the right way to promote religion and civilisation to go in a harum-scarum fashion to the islands bombarding the towns, burning the villages, and destroying the canoes and plantations. If we have got no farther in our notions of Christianity and civilisation than that, I think the less we talk about either our civilisation or our Christianity the more honest it will be for all of us. I find in the Blue Book a good deal of information of a similar kind as to the principle on which our officers are supposed to act in dealing with these natives. What I want to know is why we find such wholesale destruction and massacre by our own agents as are illustrated by the facts which I have placed before the House? I suppose the Government case is that whatever measures are taken they are justified by the necessity of preventing further outrages on the part of the natives. I say we must look a little further back and see what were the causes of the outrages. I will quote a passage I find on page 26 as an illustration of the argument I am endeavouring to place before the Committee. It is a Report of Sir Peter Scratchley.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the question now before the Committee refers to the action of the Western Pacific Commission. New Guinea, to which the Blue Book from which he wishes to quote refers, cannot now be dealt with.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am quite aware that there is very often a difficulty in obtaining particulars of matters under particular Votes, and I shall be very sorry if I am introducing a question in its wrong place. I have been trying to discover whether there is any other Vote under which New Guinea can be brought.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question of New Guinea was brought under the notice of the Committee in reference to the former items which are now passed.

MR. CONYBEARE: Well, I am not referring solely to the question of New Guinea. I think, Sir, if you will permit me to read the extract you will see that it does not apply to New Guinea alone.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member will address his remarks to the Committee in any order, we can get on; but he must address himself to some particular item of the Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE: That is precisely what I wish to do. The passage on page 26 says that the most important complaint made by natives against white men was a charge brought against two men named Jeyes and Currie; that they were in the habit of systematically violating the young women of a tribe, and—what appeared to be the chief cause of his complaint—of violating the married women also. I read this statement in order to illustrate my case. I say we ought to understand what is the kind of conduct that leads to these outrages, for which native villages are bombarded. Grave charges of the most abominable ill-treatment by Englishmen of native women have been brought under the notice of the authorities by the natives. It surely is not necessary for me to labour the point that the minds of the natives, even at a considerable distance, would be affected by such conduct, and they would be filled not only with distrust, but with hatred against our fellow-countrymen. I will not refer to the next paragraph, which relates to the New Guinea Coast. Of course, our Representatives have to face grave difficulties in maintaining the Empire of the Queen in foreign waters, and I should be very sorry indeed to press too hardly upon men who perhaps may err from an excess of zeal as well as a want of discretion, and who judge it necessary to do everything in their power to maintain the honour of their country; but, unfortunately in some cases, they go the wrong way about it. Some of the methods which are adopted seem to me to involve not only the safety of individuals, but even the safety of the Empire itself, as far as our dominion in these lands is concerned. I hope I may be permitted to quote a single line from another portion of the Report to illustrate from another point of view the grievances from which these natives suffer. I find it stated here that all the recruits from New Guinea were understood to have been irregularly taken in the first instance. I find that a very striking method of taking revenge or punishing outrages is apparently resorted to by the missionaries themselves.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is taxing the tolerance of the Committee very much. He is continually adverting to a volume which does not affect this Vote in order to illustrate his points.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have no wish to argue with the Chair, but the cases I was referring to had reference to other parts of the Western Pacific besides New Guinea. I would ask Her Majesty's Government to give us some more information as to what they have to say in explanation of the conduct of H.M.S. Royalist, and also to say whether, if they think there is any justification for such action, they do not consider it would be more in keeping with the Christianity of this country to adopt some other method of punishing natives where it can be clearly shown that they deserve punishment? It appears to me that if there is any basis of truth whatever in the facts we have been able to place before the Committee, these officers have strangely departed from the principles which have been laid down for their guidance. It is monstrous, and a discreditable thing to this country, that such wholesale outrages should take place in the way of destruction, not only of property, but also of life, without any real attempt being made, in many cases, at all events, to ascertain whether the crimes committed by the natives were not the result of ill-treatment on our side, and whether a less barbarous method of punishment could not be adopted. If I could lay before the Committee other specimens of the literature of the Blue Books, I should be able to show that the Government have laid down certain principles on this point, and also what they have done to enforce them. I call upon the Government to say whether, if that is the policy which has been sanctioned by previous Governments, they are prepared to uphold such a condition of things as the Reports show to be existing at present; whether they will not at once take some proper steps to prevent any recurrence of such outrages as I feel sure every Englishman must in his heart abhor?

(9.42.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: As I was the first to quote from the Blue Book, I should like to explain how matters stand. Early in the present Session we pressed the Government for information on the subject, and we were told by the Under Secretary, "Oh, a Blue Book will be laid before you, which will give you the fullest information." When I attempted to quote from the Blue Book in regard to New Guinea, I was told the information refers to a period before New Guinea was annexed. Again, when we referred to the case of the Royalist, the Under Secretary said, "Oh, we know nothing about the Royalist." If we cannot quote Blue Books of recent date, it is entirely because the Government fail to give us information. They presented us a few weeks ago with a Blue Book; and when we quote anything from it they tell us it is ancient history, and has nothing to do with the question at all. What I quoted from the Blue Book went to show that these islands were under the jurisdiction of the Western Pacific Commission. As regards the general question, officer after officer has declared in the strongest terms that the war of races which is going on was, in the first instance, promoted by the whites. We are told that these bloodthirsty attacks are made in revenge for the crimes of whites. To me it is a regrettable state of things that we should be obliged to carry on this barbarous warfare. The Under Secretary said we have carried it on with all possible humanity, but what possible humanity can there be in this cruise of the Royalist? The Under Secretary seems to think that blame attaches to the naval officers. I have paid attention to this subject for many years. I have carefully studied the Blue Books, and I wish to acquit the naval officers of any bloodthirstiness in the matter. I find that very frequently, indeed, naval officers have expressed most clearly their disgust and dislike at having to execute a policy of revenge. My firm view is that the naval officers are not responsible for these severities; they do nothing but carry out the orders given to them, and very often they show they carry out their orders most unwillingly. It is those who give the orders who are responsible. The reason why these acts of revenge are committed is that Her Majesty's Government have not the courage to check the demands of the traders in the Pacific. I am exceedingly sorry Her Majesty's Government have not seen their way to adopt a more humane policy, especially in the face of the declarations of their own officers that directly or indirectly they will not pursue a policy of indiscriminate vengeance.

(9.51.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I must protest against this Vote being passed without some proper explanation at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. We are aware of the great powers possessed by the Under Secretary for the Colonies, but this is not a purely saccharine matter. We had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have dealt with the subject in a serious spirit, because there can be no doubt that, notably in the case of the Solomon Islands, there has been a great deal of kidnapping of natives. There has been more cruelty in this matter than is shown on the surface, and I would not have risen to take part in the Debate were it not that a friend of mine had an opportunity not very long since of seeing what was being done in the Solomon Islands, and he has informed me on the point. What is this Vote? It is the Western District High Commission Vote for Expenses under the Pacific Islanders Protection Act. If this Vote is to be passed under the Pacific Islanders Protection Act, how comes it that such things have been done as we have heard of during the course of the Debate? I maintain that the right hon. Gentleman has skirted the question, because he has not referred to the causes of the present state of things. The treatment of the natives first attracted the attention of the Queensland Legislature, and then it was brought under the notice of the House of Commons, and though I do not wish to deal unduly with the subject, I maintain that if the Committee wish to promote peace and to act in a Christian and humanitarian spirit, they will bring pressure to bear upon the Under Secretary, in order that right may be done and wrong punished. If the Debate results in putting an end to the policy of exasperation disclosed by the story of the cruise of the Royalist it will really have been productive of benefit and good. On the other hand, if the right hon. Gentleman refuses to answer the arguments which have been addressed to him, if he fails to give the reasons why the cruelties which have been disclosed have been perpetrated, I think the people of this country will see in this matter only another portion of their system of cruelty and coercion; and that when the day arrives that the Government have to give an account of their stewardship at the poll, they will meet with that condemnation and reprobation which their action in this matter, as in everything else, justly deserves.

(10.0.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 113.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

Original Question again proposed.

(10.10.) COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to know why £200 is to be paid because we are giving up the territory of the Orange River? Where is this territory?

(10.11.) DR. TANNER: And I should like some explanation as to the sum put down for travelling expenses.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The item with regard to the Orange River is simply payment for services rendered.

(10.12.) DR. TANNER: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not understood the purport of my question. The item I desired to bring under his notice was Sub-head 3, for travelling and other expenses, including stationery and printing. Under this head we are asked for a sum of £600, whereas last year we were only asked for £400. What makes it all the more remarkable is this: that all the other items are exactly the same this year as last. How comes it to pass, then, that, everything else being symmetrical, the whole thing is spoiled by this unsymmetrical item? It appears to be rather ridiculous. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman is unable to answer this question, I am willing to defer the consideration of this subject.

*(10.15.) BARON H. DE WORMS: There is a sum of money included in the Vote for the expenses of the Deputy Commissioner to the New Hebrides.

DR. TANNER: And because that Deputy Commissioner did not do what was expected of him the country is to be called upon to pay. I must say I do not think we have had a satisfactory explanation of this matter, and I appeal to hon. Members opposite to say that they are not satisfied.

(10.16.) MR. CONYBEARE: I think we are still in a fog in this matter. I understood the Under Secretary to state that this extra charge was incurred because a certain official had chosen to reside outside his district. But why, if he chooses to reside in the wrong place, should we have to pay the expense? He ought not to be allowed these travelling expenses. The repairing of a house has nothing to do with travelling expenses.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: A temporary addition of £200 has been made to the item travelling expenses, in order to provide, amongst other things, for the necessary expenditure on the repairs to the house of the Deputy Commissioner at Tonga.

(10.18.) MR. CONYBEARE: He does not need to travel meanwhile. If the right hon. Gentleman cannot give a better explanation I shall have, on another occasion, to move to reduce his salary. The further we go the deeper we get in the mire. If the right hon. Gentleman intends to shuffle out of his responsibilities—and I do not say this in an offensive sense—if he declines to give us any explanation I will ask him upon which Department does the responsibility rest?

(10.19.) COLONEL NOLAN: I want to know about the Orange River Territory. Where is it? Has it anything to do with the Orange River State?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: It was called the Orange River Territory before it became the Orange Free State.

(10.20.) COLONEL NOLAN: Then where is this territory? There are two places on the map. Is it the boundary of the Orange Free State, or is it this place towards the mouth of the Orange River which flows into the Atlantic, and which constitutes the boundary between us and the Germans?

*(10.21.) BARON H. DE WORMS: Surely the hon. Gentleman knows where the Orange Free State is. The British sovereignty over the Orange River territory was proclaimed on the 3rd February, 1848, and revoked by an Order in Council in 1854. The only charges which now remain are charges due to those who served on that territory and to those to whom pensions are now payable.

COLONEL NOLAN: I quite understand. It is the Orange Free State.

(10.23.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I wish to move to reduce the Vote under Sub-head R (Salaries, &c., Transvaal) by £100. I do so in order to urge upon the Government the inadequacy of the salary at present allowed to our Agent at Pretoria. Assuming that the Agent receives £700 a year, and £300 a year for office charges—and, by-the-bye, I may point out that the figures are, I presume by mistake, reversed in the Votes—I would point out that the aggregate expenses attaching to the office amount to no less than £700 a year, practically leaving only £300 for salary. Her Majesty's Agent at Pretoria has to pay £30 a month for rent and £200 a year to his clerk and interpreter, his travelling expenses are not less than £40 a year, and other necessary expenses amount to £100 a year. The Committee must bear in mind that our Agent at Pretoria is not merely a Consul, but an official of diplomatic rank, and I maintain that the salary ought to be £1,500 or £2,000 a year. Our Agent at Zanzibar receives over £2,000 a year, and that post is not half so important as the one at Pretoria, especially in the present important state of South African politics. There are a large number of Englishmen in the Transvaal, we have millions of capital invested in South Africa, and it is desirable above all things that at the present juncture we should have a really able, capable, and experienced Minister at Pretoria. It is ridiculous to suppose that such a man can be obtained for the small salary now given, and I understand, in fact, that the Government recently had some difficulty in filling the post. I repeat that our agency in Pretoria is the most important diplomatic post in South Africa at the present time, and I hope, for the reasons I have stated, that the Under Secretary for the Colonies will recommend the Treasury to appreciably augment the salary and allowances of Her Majesty's Agent.

*(10.28.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I may point out that the salary of the office has been already increased from £400 to £700, and £200 more has been granted for office expenses. In those circumstances I do not think the Treasury would be disposed to grant a further increase.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I wish to call the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to the constant misprints which occur in the Estimates. Surely they ought to be avoided.

(10.30.) MR. CONYBEARE: Before we go to another subject, I propose to say one word on this question. I have on more than one occasion been entertained in the Transvaal, and I can endorse what fell from the hon. Member opposite as to the cost of living in that country. The state of affairs there has arisen to a great extent from the protective policy inflicted upon the country by the Boer Government. I mention that to show that our Resident is in no way responsible for the high cost of living. What I particularly want information about is as to who is the new Agent who has been appointed. I understand that the Agent has recently returned to this country and is not going back to the Transvaal. I understand from the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman that the salary has already been increased, and that he does not propose any further increase. I entirely agree with the hon. Member opposite, in whose objection there is a great deal of force. Things are in a very desperate condition at the present moment in South Africa, and I think what you want is a man of position who is willing to take the office. There is another reason which was adduced by the hon. Member opposite. In the disturbance which took place at Johannesburg some little time ago an insult was offered to the President of the Transvaal Republic by some British subjects, who, I believe, are in prison at the present moment. No one can deplore more than I do that such an incident has occurred. We must all admit that we hold the most friendly relations with the Boer Government, and I am not introducing this matter for the purpose of making any difficulty. It only illustrates the delicacy of the situation at the present time, and the necessity there is of having able men to look after the affairs of Great Britain in Africa. I should like to know who is the new Agent, whether any British subjects are in prison, and any other general information with regard to South Africa which the right hon. Gentleman may have to give.

(10.35.) MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): Mr. Courtney, if in order, I would like to ask the

Sir G. Campbell

Under Secretary for the Colonies whether he can report to the House any improvement in the condition of the mining interests of the Transvaal. The mining interests, as is perfectly well known, are entirely British, but they are sorely handicapped by the taxation exacted by the Boer Government. Horned cattle are taxed at the rate of £2 per head; flour at the rate of 15s. per 100 lbs; pork and bacon, and suchlike, at the rate of 1s. per lb.; and coals at the rate of 15s. per cwt. All these items the House will see are necessities of life. They are enormously oppressive to the mining interest, and these are the items which are produced by Boers, who are almost entirely farmers. Then, again, the Import Duties on goods from over sea represent 33½ per cent. of the invoice price. In addition to that, the taxation for licensing mines amounts to £1 a month for mining an area of 125 feet by 400 feet. I hear that the Licence Duty is altogether preposterous, and beyond comparison with anything to be heard of in Australia or in America. Therefore, I should like to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether there is any probability in the near future of the Boer Government meeting the defined wishes of the English population settled in the Transvaal, in order to ameliorate their condition. Further, can the right hon. Gentleman report any definite news as to a forward policy with regard to railways, which are equally important to the mining interest as matters of taxation.

*(10.38.) SIR R. N. FOWLER (London): I wish to support the opinion of the hon. Member for Peckham with regard to the salary of our Representative at Pretoria. It is obvious that a gentleman in that position has most important diplomatic duties to discharge. Further, I have been in South Africa myself, and, in common with others who have been in that country, I know the high cost of provisions, and it certainly seems to me that the salary of our Representative is perfectly inadequate to enable anyone competently to discharge the duties of the position. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman perfectly agrees with the hon. Member for Peckham, but I suspect the difficulty lies with the Treasury. I hope the Government will deal with this matter in a liberal spirit.

(10.40.) SIR JOSEPH BAILEY (Hereford): I raise my voice in support of those who have already spoken in favour of increasing the salary of our Representative at the Transvaal. I do not think it is thoroughly understood that the cost of living in that part of the country is altogether different from what it is in England. In the Transvaal they pay as much for the commonest vegetable as we do here for forced strawberries sold out of season. Again, any person who undertakes the management of our affairs in the Transvaal is expected to entertain every English visitor of anything like station, because he is the Representative of England. He has expenses forced upon him which in another position he would not incur; and I think England ought to support her Representatives, whose difficulties are so great, in a liberal and becoming manner.

(10.42.) DR. TANNER: Are we to understand that the salaries of certain Colonial Representatives are to be raised in order that they may entertain their friends? The idea is ridiculous. I think Her Majesty's Government have done right in cutting down the salary, but still I want to know how it has been reduced from £700 to £200, for £500 is a very large sum. I should like to express my disapprobation of the way in which the figures are given. It is put, salary £200, expenses £700; making £1,000. That is very ridiculous, and these mistakes ought to be remedied. While you cut down the salary by £500, you immediately raise the allowance for rent and contingent expenses to £700. You cut down here, and raise there, as though you desired to obtain a sort of uniformity. I want to know why the reduction has been made in one instance and the increase in the other?

(10.43.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): What has really occurred is this: There has been a slip in the type, and the error was not discovered when the Estimates were revised. I do not think too much blame should be put upon the printers, who have to get the Estimates printed within a very limited time. It is almost impossible to avoid mistakes; and though I am extremely sorry that this mistake should have occurred, still if, as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy says, there is a great number, I have not been made aware of them. There has really been no change in this expenditure either in one amount or the other.

DR. TANNER: These Estimates were circulated eight weeks ago. Surely there has been time to remedy these mistakes. I am not blaming the printers; I am blaming the Government.

MR. JACKSON: I might explain to the hon. Gentleman that the cost of printing the Estimates anew in order to correct some errors would be very great. I am not aware that there is a great number of errors, though the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy says there are many.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes, there are.

MR. JACKSON: I am extremely sorry if that is the fact. It has not been brought to my knowledge, and I do not think the hon. Gentleman should say that there is a great number of mistakes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes, Sir; there are a great number of mistakes; in fact, the Estimates are full of printers' errors, and, although the Secretary to the Treasury has said the printers are not to blame, I think they are very much to blame, because the printers employed by this House get an enormous sum for the work they do, and ought to employ a sufficient staff to do the same duty as is done by every newspaper office in the country in setting up and printing documents that are urgently needed and must be brought out within a reasonable time.

MR. CONYBEARE: May I ask, Sir, as a point of order, where we are at the present moment?

THE CHAIRMAN: We are at present on Vote 3, Class V., Sub-head R; but no Amendment has yet been moved.

MR. CONYBEARE: If no Amendment is before the Committee, I shall have the pleasure of moving one, in order that I may be able to elicit some answer from the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies to the questions that have been put to him. I will, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item R 1, £1,000, Salaries, &c., Transvaal, be reduced by £100."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in that Motion after I have answered, as I was about to do, the questions to which he refers. The first question put to me was who is the gentleman holding the ad interim appointment of Resident of the Transvaal. He is Sir Jacobus Albertus De Wet, and belongs to a South African family, which is well-known and of high standing. He is a gentleman in every way well qualified for the post, and has already distinguished himself by his conduct of affairs in regard to the relations between Cape Colony and Pondoland after the death of the late chief of the latter territory. I was also asked whether there was any one at present detained in prison at Pretoria for having taken part in disturbances connected with an insult offered to the South African flag. I am informed that there is only one man so detained, and he has been committed for trial, which he is now awaiting. Then my hon. Friend the Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool has asked a question with regard to the mining interests of the Transvaal. I am afraid that that is a matter on which I am hardly able to enter into any detail, inasmuch as we have no control over the Transvaal Government, but I may say that I believe that British subjects who have acquired concessions from the Transvaal Government are treated in a fair spirit by the Government of the Transvaal, and I hope that spirit will continue to be evinced.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the information he has given; but he has described the appointment of the Resident in the Transvaal as an ad interim appointment, whereas I should hope the Government will see their way to make it a permanent one. With regard to the other matter, the imprisonment of an Englishman for insulting the President of the Transvaal Republic, the complaint is that the man is kept in prison and not brought to trial, that is to say, he is being detained there without any attempt being made to bring him to trial. It is on that point I should have been glad to have heard some statement from the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): An hon. Member has put questions to the Under Secretary which, I think, should have drawn from him a fuller statement than he has made of the position of those British subjects who have settled in the Transvaal. When asked to vote money to the British Agency in the Transvaal, I think we are entitled to know more about the position of our fellow-subjects there. This is about the only opportunity we have in the course of the year of raising such a question, and I think the Minister responsible for our policy in that part of the world ought not to treat in a cursory or cavalier manner such a question as that put by the hon. Member for Liverpool. I wish to repeat, the future of the British residents in the Transvaal is an urgent and important matter, inasmuch as it largely affects the future of Swaziland, and many other questions that may press upon us. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether our Representative in the Transvaal is instructed to adopt a policy or to make representations to the Transvaal Government which will lead to a strengthening of the position of the British residents there, and giving them greater power in deciding questions regarding British rights in connection with a future policy of that part of Africa. I think that is a question upon which the Committee will think we ought to have some further statement from the right hon. Gentleman.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: If the hon. Member is alluding to the franchise being granted to British residents in the Transvaal, representations have been made to the Transvaal Government on the subject.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to an item in this Vote of £3,074 for pensions to wounded volunteers and the widows of volunteers killed in the war of 1880-81, and for compensation for the abolition of offices, and I desire to ask whether sufficient care is taken to see that the persons to whom these pensions and compensations are being paid are still alive. Also, how many persons are receiving these allowances.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: There are now five persons to whom these pensions are payable, seven persons who are in receipt of compensation as wounded volunteers and widows of persons killed in the war of 1880-81, and seven who are being compensated for abolition of office.

COLONEL NOLAN: I trust that the Government take the greatest precaution in seeing that sufficient proof is given that the persons to whom these allowances are payable are still living. The most stringent precautions are taken in this respect in India.

MR. JACKSON: I think I can assure the Committee that this question has been most carefully examined within the last 18 months, and that none of these pensions or compensations are paid except on absolute proof that the persons to whom they are payable are still living.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CONYBEARE: I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would furnish some information with regard to the Delagoa Bay question.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I rise now to move, as an Amendment on this Vote under Sub-head S, to reduce the amount by £500, part of the salary of the High Commissioner of South Africa. I see that we are asked to pay £1,000 for the personal expenses of the High Commissioner. I want to know what is the meaning of the allowance so paid to that officer. What I find is that these personal allowances go on from one High Commissioner to another, and what is called a personal allowance is merely an allowance given as part of the salary of the High Commissioner, in order to retain his services for the British Government. Now, I want to know what is the position of the High Commissioner; is he paid by the Cape Government, or is he paid by the Imperial Government—whose servant is he? This, I think, is a most important matter.

*(11.3.) MR. GOSCHEN: The extra £1,000 a year is a personal allowance, given because the High Commissioner in a most public spirited manner gave up a most valuable appointment which he held in Australia.

(11.4.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: But who pays this money? Is it the Cape Government or the Imperial Government?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The salary of the High Commissioner is paid by the British Government, and that of the Governor by the Cape Government.

(11.5.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Well, I should much prefer the High Commissioner to be entirely in the pay of the British Government, as he holds in his hands the keys of our whole policy in South Africa. What has occurred there is really the outcome of the policy of our High Commissioner. I admit that there is a great deal of sense in the view which Sir Hercules Robinson takes on these matters, but I think that Sir Hercules ought to have resigned his position rather than have expressed his views on this subject to the people at the Cape. Sir Hercules is, no doubt, a very able man, and one of the highest honour. But I have brought home from India some very strong ideas with regard to a public official having anything to do with regard to speculative affairs arising within his own jurisdiction. I hope there is no truth in the rumour that Sir Hercules Robinson has made large sums of money by speculations in his own territories, in which he was associated with Mr. Rhodes. I know we have been told that the affairs in which he was concerned represented very much the holding of shares in the London and North Western Railway Company. I hope that is so, but I confess that I feel that speculations in diamond syndicates are not quite of the same character. I had some experience of these things in Bengal, and if, for instance, I had had anything to do with the Assam Tea Company, or with the granting of additional territories to a great syndicate, I should not have felt very comfortable. At the same time I am bound to say I do not see any trace of personal influence in his conduct; he has expressed his views freely, fairly, and logically. He is, no doubt, quite honest in what he says. I quite admit that there is a good deal in the argument in favour of putting an end to the scramble among concessionaires in South Africa, by giving over the whole of South Africa to the one great company which is associated with the name of Mr. Rhodes; but, at the same time, I hold that it is a dangerous thing to grant charters to companies, giving them the control of an enormous trade in South Africa. Her Majesty's Government have promoted this South Africa Company, and have given it all the official assistance in their power. They have written official letters to Lobengula, and have sent out officers of Her Majesty's Horse Guards—the biggest men who could be found—to assist in this company promoting. The roving commission given to those companies, will, in all probability, involve us in war, and I am afraid that the ultimate burden will have to be borne by the British taxpayer. It is a repetition of the old story "Heads I win, tails you lose." If there are any profits they will go to the company, if there is any loss the British taxpayer will have to pay it. This is the real Jingo policy. We are told that these companies cannot be expected to carry on their operations unless they have the full and active support of the British Government, and Mr. Stanley said, only the other night, that unless the British Government gave adequate support he should advise the African companies to give up their work. This raises a very serious question, as to the policy of our pushing further and further into the interior of Africa, and I cannot but recall the wise words of Lord Salisbury, in which he warned the country against the adoption of such a policy, and in which he pointed out the difficulty of sending arms into a country thousands of miles from the coast. I find from a Memorandum of the East Africa Company that that company has agreed to support the African Lakes Company by an annual grant. As to that, I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the East Africa Company are to be allowed to go beyond the Zambesi and absorb the African Lakes Company, for that is what I suppose is meant. I saw in Saturday's Times an article by a German writer classing Lord Salisbury as an ally of the German Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is going outside the Vote, which refers to the salary of the High Commissioner.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Well, with regard to these questions I will only say that I hope the Government will decide each point upon its merits, and will not allow their hand to be forced by the Jingo element in the country, whether they trot out the old story of the missionaries being in danger or not. My belief is that the jealousy that exists is not between the English and the Foreign missionaries, but is between the Protestant and the Catholic missionaries. Our missionaries are not jealous of the Germans, but they are jealous of the Portuguese. It has been said that great interest is taken in Scotland in these matters, as a number of the missionaries come from Scotland. But, as a Scotch Member, I venture to say there is a great deal of delusion about the fury which is said to have spread from one end of Scotland to another on this subject. No doubt in Edinburgh and in Glasgow there is a fair and legitimate amount of interest; but it is a delusion to suppose that the missionaries altogether support the Trading Companies. I am glad to think that in the recent Assemblies of the Churches of Scotland not much attention was devoted to this matter. Indeed, Professor Lindsay was the only speaker who referred to the subject, and he, no doubt, uttered some very brave words—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has again gone outside the range of this Vote.

(11.30.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should like to allude, on this question of South Africa—and in this I am not trespassing beyond the fair limits of the question before the Committee—to the Liberal wire-puller Mr. Schnadhorst. I have alluded on previous occasions to the way in which Jingoism has developed in the Liberal ranks; but I now find that the Liberal wire-puller himself has come back from South Africa a very pronounced Jingo indeed. The colonists, as a rule, are not people who are concerned for the British Treasury, and can afford to be Jingo, seeing that the British Treasury has to pay the piper; and at the Cape Mr. Schnadhorst has been associating with these colonists—with, for instance, the gentlemen who contributed some thousands of pounds to the Irish Parliamentary Fund. I am not one of those who pin my faith altogether to the Party wire-puller. I, therefore, do not attach much importance to Mr. Schnadhorst's extreme advocacy of the interests of the South African Company. That gentleman seems to be more for the Chartered Company than the Chartered Company itself; and when he says we should give Home Rule to these people in South Africa as we should give it to Ireland, he should remember that what he asks would be like giving Home Rule not to Ireland, but to the narrowest section of Orangemen in that country. I must say I hope that Lord Salisbury will not give way to pressure, but will hold the balance evenly, remembering that it is the bounden duty of the British Government, in any arrangements that may be made, to have regard primarily to the interests of the natives. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

Sir. G. Campbell

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Item 81, £1,620, Cape of Good Hope, High Commissioner, Salaries, be reduced by £500, part of the Salary of the High Commissioner, South Africa."—(Sir George Campbell.)

(11.34.) MR. BAUMANN: I wish to make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government. This Vote raises important questions with regard to Swaziland and Bechuanaland, and other important matters in relation to the South African Company which will require considerable time for their discussion, and under these circumstances I would ask whether Her Majesty's Government will not assent to now reporting Progress.

*(11.35.) BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government cannot possibly consent to this. This is the second day of the discussion, and we have now had seven and a half hours' discussion on it.

(11.35.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote attaches sufficient importance to the questions which it involves. I know it has been the custom in this House to relegate colonial subjects to the back-ground. We have had no adequate opportunity of discussing them since 1886. Last Session the leader of the House gave us a promise, in consideration of our refraining from pressing on the subject at that time, that this Session we should have full opportunity for debate; and it therefore does seem to me extraordinary that the Under Secretary for the Colonies should say that we should go on with the discussion and pass the Vote at this hour for the reason that we have discussed it two days. I would draw his attention to the fact that while 100 nights are not deemed too much to devote to Irish affairs, two nights are deemed enough to devote to the affairs of all our colonies—affairs so closely touching the interests of our fellow-countrymen in every part of the world. I trust that Englishmen in all our colonial possessions will appreciate the manner in which the Government treat these subjects. So far as I am concerned, deeply interested as I am in colonial subjects, no Government can charge me with unduly pressing them on the attention of the House. I withdrew from the discussion last year in order to enable the House to rise at a reasonable time, relying on the promise of the leader of the House that we should have ample opportunity for debate this Session, and I say that if this Vote is taken now that promise will have been distinctly violated.

*(11.40.) SIR R. N. FOWLER: I appeal to hon. Gentlemen who were in the 1880 Parliament whether the present Government have not done more than their predecessors to bring forward colonial questions early in the Session, and to afford opportunities for their discussion.

(11.41.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I object to a comparison between the present and previous Governments. When I am discussing colonial questions I do not care a straw what Government is in power; but I would point out that this Parliament has sat four years, and that we have only discussed colonial matters fully this Session.

*(11.42.) MR. GOSCHEN: The Government have endeavoured to give effect to their pledge by bringing forward this Colonial Vote early this year, and I may remind the Committee that this is the second night on which this one Vote has been discussed. The Government, persuaded of the fact that most important questions are involved, have not tried to hurry hon. Members; but I regret the time which has been spent upon some minor details connected with the Vote. I will not, however, say more than that if a due sense of proportion had been observed by hon. Members in their speeches we should have arrived earlier at the questions which remain to be debated. I would suggest that hon. Members should now allow the Vote to be taken, and I will undertake that the Report of this Vote shall be put down for a comparatively early hour, so that the part of the Vote which still remains undebated may be fully discussed. With regard to Swaziland, I may mention that negotiations are still pending with the Transvaal Republic. They are of a delicate and important character, and are being conducted with very good feeling on both sides; but the Government can scarcely approach the discussion with a free hand in the circumstances, although they have no desire to unduly cut short any expression of opinions which hon. Members may wish to give utterance to. I trust that the proposal I now make will be accepted as a fair compromise.

(11.46.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): While appreciating what the right hon. Gentleman has said as to the conduct of the Government this evening, I must say I do not think that those Members who are interested in colonial questions can accept the proposal just made. This Vote raises most important questions, which we have not had an opportunity of discussing this Session. They were scarcely touched on last Session, and it must be remembered that private Members are now deprived of their right to raise questions by Motion on Tuesdays and Fridays, and that it is only on Votes of this kind that they can express their minds. We desire to have an opportunity of raising important questions concerning Swaziland, Bechuanaland, and the South Africa Company. From experience we know that Government promises of Debates on Report are not satisfactory, and, however reluctantly, I must ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to press the Vote further this evening.

*(11.48.) MR. GOSCHEN: I must admit that it would be difficult to press the Vote much further this evening, and that I do not think I should be justified in suggesting the Closure, even if the Chairman should be disposed to assent to it. If, however, my suggestion is accepted, the Government will put down the Report for half-past 10 o'clock, and as the discussion need not then be stopped at midnight there will be time to have a real and substantial Debate. That, I think, is a very reasonable suggestion. The Government have shown their readiness to give the House an opportunity of discussing these questions.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(11.50.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am sure the House appreciates the very conciliatory manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt with the case. I may say, however, that my hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce) has been present during the greater part of the discussion. I should like to point out that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) made a very serious impeachment of the Government respecting the South Africa Company. When the hon. Member sat down the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary did not rise to reply, and it was from the Government side of the House that the suggestion came that business should be suspended. I myself saw no reason why the time remaining up to midnight should not be occupied; and I think the Under Secretary would have been wise if he had availed himself of the opportunity of replying to the charges which had been made against the Government. The Report stage does not give that freedom of discussion which is desired in a matter of this importance. I quite acknowledge that all sides of the House should help the Government where they legitimately can with regard to business; and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will admit that at all events during three hours of this Debate it was the other side of the House that was responsible for the difficulties that arose. I think we must now urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consent to report Progress.

(11.54.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The attitude taken up by the Government amounts to this, that under present arrangements they are not able to furnish the House with full and adequate opportunity of discussing the subject-matter of the Estimates in Committee of Supply, and it is necessary that that which ought to be taken in Committee shall be taken on Report. I submit that this is an entire departure from the intention and scope of Committee of Supply. It is intended that all questions arising on the Estimates should be discussed fully, and, if necessary, in great detail, under circumstances which admit of conveniences of reply and rejoinder, such as are not open to us when the Speaker is in the Chair. It is perfectly true that two Sittings have been consumed in Committee of Supply in discussing this Vote.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Oh, no.

MR. A. O'CONNOR, Well, I am not disposed to blame the Government for even an appearance of impatience in reference to the Vote. They have not hurried it at all, and have acted with perfect fairness. But the fact is that the Vote covers nearly the whole of the globe, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that it should give rise to much debate. I would submit to the Government and the Committee that the real source of the difficulty is to be found in the undue extension of scope of these Votes—an extension which is now being carried further by the consolidation of a number of Votes. The difficulty which has attended the discussion of this Vote will be experienced in the discussion of a large number of Votes, as at present consolidated; and I would invite the attention of the Government to the present situation, in order that they may reconsider the plan they have apparently adopted in making the Votes so large that it is almost impossible to cover the whole of the ground enclosed by them.

(11.58.) Question put, and agreed to.

Committee to sit again to-morrow.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT (1876)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 247.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT
(RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 290.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

*(12.11.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I believe that this Bill does not extend to Ireland. You give us so many bad Bills in Ireland that when you have a good one I think we ought not to be excluded from it. It is only on the undertaking that Ireland will be included in this measure that it is at all likely to pass with general assent.

*(12.12.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): So far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection whatever to extend the Bill to Ireland.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move, after the word "Wales," to insert the words "and Ireland."

*(12.13.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I see no reason at all why this Bill should not be extended to Ireland; but it is perfectly plain that a carefully-prepared clause will be necessary for the purpose. The Bill is framed upon the model of the English Public Health Act, which is different from that of Ireland. If I find the measure can be extended to Ireland I will bring up a clause later.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: Under these circumstances I think the best plan will be to report Progress, and put the Bill down for Monday.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Will the Attorney General for Ireland prepare his Amendment before the House goes into Committee again?

*(12.14.) MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir. I do not at this moment pledge myself to the statement that this Bill can be conveniently extended to Ireland; but, if so, I will put down my Amendment.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: This is a Bill which has been most carefully considered by a Select Committee. It is an entirely permissive Bill, and I hope the House may be able to press it during the present Session. There was a desire on the part of the Select Committee to extend the operation of the measure to Ireland, but it was feared there might be some objection on the part of the Irish Representatives to such extension. I hope the Attorney General for Ireland will see no difficulty in the proposed extension.

*MR. MADDEN: I shall raise no difficulty.

MR. SEXTON: I hold similar opinions with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, and I only wish to say that I do not gather from the remarks of the Attorney General that there is any objection in point of substance; that it is merely a question of drafting.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I have Amendments down which I hope will not be ruled out of order in consequence of the proposed Amendment coming a few words before them.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ANGLESEY ASSIZES AND QUARTER SESSIONS BILL.—(No. 248.)

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS (COMPULSORY POWERS REPEAL) BILL.— (No. 164.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: An arrangement has been made, and I have now the pleasure to move that the Order be discharged and Bill withdrawn.

Order for the Second Reading discharged, and the Bill withdrawn.

FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 53.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I hope the Lord Advocate will not consider me importunate in regard to this Bill. If he objects to refer the Bill to a Select Committee I would like him to give me some assurance as to the course the Government propose to take in regard to the Bill they intend to introduce. This is a Scotch subject, one on which I do not think there need be any Party feeling, and one on which I think the Government would do well to consider the desirability of satisfying the justifiable wishes of the Scotch fishermen.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I by no means think the right hon. Gentleman importunate, and I trust we all recognise the valuable services he rendered upon the recent Committee. At the same time, the Bill he has expressed some anxiety about is not in a position to be read a first time, and I hope he will still further exercise some reserve. It would be impossible to assent to the Second Reading of his Bill. I have heard objections taken in various quarters of the House.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

MOTION.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVANTS).

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I beg to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the alleged grievances of the Uncovenanted Civil Servants of India, arising from the depreciation of the rupee and their leave and pension rules:

That Mr. King, Mr. Howorth, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Bristowe, Viscount Baring, Sir William Plowden, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Alfred Pease, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Mac Neill, and Sir John Gorst be Members of the Committee:

That the Committee have power to send for persons, Papers, and Records:

That Five be the quorum."

DR. TANNER: I object.

SIR J. GORST: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persevere with his objection.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should be glad if the Resolution were agreed to. The Under Secretary of State has accepted a technical Amendment with regard to the description of the value of gold and silver. I thought it my duty to intervene between the taxpayers of India and the tribunal in this country, but I was appealed to in pathetic terms by gentlemen who have served under me in my youth and my mature age, and I was obliged to give in. I hope there will be a careful and full inquiry. There is a question which I have put down on the Paper for to-morrow, and which I hope the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) will consider before action is taken. I am told that, notwithstanding the presence in this country of a vast number of persons who are interested in the question, it is proposed to send home from India at full Indian salary a large number of gentlemen who wish to give evidence before the Committee. I hope that full consideration will take place before any such action is followed. As regards the constitution of the Committee, this is a judicial matter, and I think the Committee should be constituted on a purely judicial basis. I believe that at least one gentleman who has expressed the very strongest opinions on the subject has been nominated to serve on the Committee, and I do not think he is in a position to take an unprejudiced view of the question. I shall object to his name, and I hope that, at all events, the settlement of the names will be deferred till to-morrow.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I understand this is really to benefit a number of gentlemen in India who find the bargain they made has not turned out for them as satisfactorily as at first they expected. If it had turned out better they would have said nothing. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] They now propose to saddle the unfortunate taxpayers of India with a further charge, in consequence of the depreciation of silver as compared with gold. I shall object.

Motion deferred till to-morrow.

RULES PUBLICATION BILL.—(No. 299.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday, 16th June.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 3rd June, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

GWEEDORE.

SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, since the recommendations of the Allport Commission in favour of harbour works, fishing accommodation, and connecting railways for Gweedore, another Report of a somewhat different character has been made by the Board of Works; and if he will state what the nature of any such Report is, and lay the details upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am not aware that the Board of Works has made any Report in reference to harbour works and fishing accommodation at Gweedore. The hon. Baronet will be aware that there has, this year, been an inquiry into certain proposed lines of railways, but I am not aware that anything has yet been decided.

SIR E. WATKIN: May I ask whether a Report of the Inquiry will be communicated to the House?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; that is not intended.

CIVIL SERVANTS IN INDIA.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if it is true, as stated in the Indian newspapers, that, notwithstanding the presence in this country of so many of the claimants under the Indian Civil Service Rules, it is proposed to allow a number of the principal European Civil servants now in India to come home "on duty" at the public expense to give evidence before the proposed Committee, or to allow them to draw full Indian allowances beyond those to which they may be entitled under the ordinary leave rules, or in any other form to place a burden on the Indian taxpayer, to enable them to press the claims of their various Services in this country?

VOL. CCCXLIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; there is no foundation whatever for the statement contained in the question of the hon. Member. The Committee, if appointed, would itself determine what witnesses are necessary. The Secretary of State would, of course, give every reasonable facility for the attendance of such witnesses as the Committee might desire to examine.

GERMANS IN AFRICA.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the following passage in a speech made by Mr. Stanley at the dinner to which he was entertained by the London Chamber of Commerce on the 21st of May—

"The Germans had recently captured 10,000 bullocks from the Natives in British territory, and there was no one to say, Boh! (Loud cheers.) He could speak very forcibly, but he would restrain himself"; whether it is true that the Germans were allowed to capture 10,000 bullocks from natives in British territory without remonstrance; and whether the British Government have surrendered any territory to Germany; and, if so, what territory? I may add that a portion of the quotation from Mr. Stanley has been omitted, in which he said that the British Government have permitted the German Government to extend their influence beyond the line originally agreed upon.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): In answer to paragraphs 1 and 2 we have no information to that effect. I was about to answer to the third paragraph in the negative; but, upon the explanation now given, I will add that no arrangement has been come to in regard to the respective spheres of influence.

SION COLLEGE.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the annual compensation awarded by 6 and 7 William IV., c. 110, s. 3, to Sion College, in lieu of the privilege then abrogated of receiving a copy of every printed book, is still paid? if so, what is the amount, and where does it appear in official accounts; and whether any Report is, as required by the above-cited Statute, sent to the Treasury of the use made of the annual grant; and, if so, are such Reports for the last ten years accessible to Members of this House?

MR. JACKSON: The amount of the annual grant awarded by 6 and 7 William IV., c. 110, to Sion College is £363 15s. 2d., and will be found recorded in the Finance Accounts under the heading "Compensation under the Copyright Act," p. 62. In claiming payment in each year detailed information is given, as required by Section 3 of the Act, of the applications of the money last issued; and on this the Treasury directs the amount for the year to be issued. The annual statements are retained in the Treasury, and have no general interest.

MR. PICTON: Are the Reports accessible to Members of this House?

MR. JACKSON: The Reports are obtainable at the Treasury, but they are not presented to Parliament. I shall be happy to let the hon. Member see them.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Is this one of the permanent payments as to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been making inquiries this year, with a view to their determination?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I believe this is included in those payments.

OVERCROWDING OF TRAINS.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the excessive and dangerous overcrowding of the morning and evening suburban trains running on the Great Eastern Railway to and from the Liverpool Street Station, and to the insufficient and inconvenient exits provided for the passengers at many of the local stations; whether he will obtain a Return of the average excess number of 1st, 2nd, and 3rd class passengers respectively conveyed by such trains; and whether he can take steps in future to remedy the inconvenience and danger complained of?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No, Sir; my attention has not been specially directed to overcrowding in the morning and evening trains on the Great Eastern Railway, and the General Railway Acts do not give me any power of dealing with it. I have, however, communicated with the Company, from whom I have received a letter, of which, if he wishes it, I shall be happy to send the hon. Member a copy. In this letter the Company say that they have spent, or are spending, sums amounting to over £1,750,000 in the accommodation of their suburban traffic, and add that, if the hon. Member will specify the local stations of which he considers the exits inconvenient, they will communicate with him.

STAINLAND-WITH-OLD-LINDLEY LOCAL BOARD.

MR. WAYMAN (York, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, having regard to the fact that a Local Government inquiry was held in February, 1889, as to the Stainland-with-Old-Lindley Local Board's application for power to borrow £10,000, for the purpose of constructing water works at Coldacre, in Stainland, and that the Local Government Board, 12 months later, sanctioned the said scheme, subject to certain conditions, which have been complied with, whether repeated applications for the documents necessary for the carrying out of the scheme have been made by the clerk to the Local Board without avail; and, if so, why it is that the Local Government Board continue to withhold from the Stainland-with-Old-Lindley Local Board the necessary authority to borrow the said sum of £10,000, thus depriving the inhabitants of the township of the water which has become to them an absolute necessity?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board caused an inquiry to be held in February, 1889, as to an application of the Stainland Local Board for sanction to borrow for the purpose of a scheme of water supply. As the Local Board are aware, objections have been strongly urged to their proposals, and questions have been raised as to their right to obtain water from the sources proposed by them, and the question has been one of much difficulty. The Local Board, however, after obtaining the opinion of counsel, informed the Local Government Board that they were prepared to undertake all the responsibility of proceeding with the scheme, and the Board then expressed their willingness to sanction the loan upon certain conditions, one of the conditions being certain proofs with regard to the consent of an authority within whose limits of water supply part of the Local Board district is situate. The Board are now awaiting a reply to a communication which they have addressed to the Local Board on the subject of such consent. I have no reason to doubt that the matter will be settled speedily.

ENGINEER STUDENTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is now aware of any facts as to engineer students tending to show that an insufficient number of candidates have been found qualified for the vacancies advertised this year by the Admiralty; whether he can state the engineer officer vacancies advertised and number of candidates competing; and how many found qualified in 1889 and 1890 respectively?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Ninety-three candidates presented themselves for 40 vacancies at the recent examination for engineer studentships, of whom a sufficient number were found to be qualified for appointment to the Service. No specific number of vacancies for engineer officers was advertised, but the number laid down in the Regulations is about 10. For these vacancies there are five candidates. The examination for these appointments, which is the first that has taken place, is still proceeding. The number of candidates for appointment as engineer students who competed in 1889 was 177, of which number 85 qualified for appointment. There were 32 entries.

THE HYDE PARK DEMONSTRATION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.), for MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what authority, statutory or otherwise, the Commissioner of Police in the Metropolis acts in forbidding the passage of public processions through the streets of the Metropolis; whether, in so doing, he is acting by the express instructions of the Home Secretary, or on his own responsibility; and whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken as to the legal power of the police to prohibit the passage of organised and peaceful processions?

The following questions on the same subject were also on the Paper:—

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is with his sanction that the Chief Commissioner has informed the Demonstration Committee that "the Metropolitan Police will not afford protection to processions to the Embankment;" and whether he is aware that the Committee have received from the City Police the promise of such protection to processions while passing through the City?

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can explain why the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police has prohibited the promoters of the demonstration on Saturday next from taking the same route which was followed in 1888 by a similar gathering; and whether the demonstration in 1888 was of the most orderly and peaceable character?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): To ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the action taken by the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police with regard to the Hyde Park demonstration on Saturday next, when the Chief Commissioner declines to allow the procession to take the route which was taken in 1888, has his sanction and authority; and whether he endorses the statement of the Commissioner in his letter to the Executive Committee organising the demonstration that—

"It is also clearly to be understood that the police will not protect or keep open a route for processions to the Embankment?"

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): To ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the letter of the Chief Commissioner of Police, altering the route of the proposed procession to Hyde Park on Saturday next, was written with his knowledge and authority; and whether representations have reached him that such interference will be provocative of confusion, by divergence of routes and by dividing the responsibility and control of those who have undertaken the duty of organising the procession?

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask why the Temperance Associations are to be prevented from assembling on the Thames Embankment on Saturday next, and marching from thence to Hyde Park in one organised procession, to hold their proposed demonstration in the Park on that day?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I propose to answer the various questions which appear upon the Paper at the same time. I am advised by the Law Officers that the Commissioner of Police is authorised by Statute to regulate the route to be observed by public processions, with a view to prevent obstruction in the streets. He has my sanction for so doing; and I consulted the Solicitor General before giving the Commissioner specific instructions with reference to the proposed procession of Saturday next. These organised processions, now so frequent, largely interfere with the convenience and rights of the public. If the processionists were left to their strict legal rights they would have to take their chance of being interrupted and divided, like all other traffic, and would soon cease to be a procession at all. When the police undertake to keep open a route for a procession they can only do so by hampering the right of free passage of other persons. It is wholly unreasonable to expect that this privilege should be conceded to processionists simultaneously taking a number of different routes in several directions across the Metropolis. The Temperance Associations will not be prevented from assembling on the Embankment on Saturday; their route thither has been regulated as public safety required, and they must make their way thither subject to the conditions under which all persons have to use crowded streets, and without a monopoly of the thoroughfares. The procession of 1888 was orderly and peaceable; but it only got to its destination by practically taking possession of the streets and stopping public traffic. The object of the Commissioner in the regulations he has made has been to minimise the recurrence of similar public inconvenience. I have no information as to the course taken by the City Police, and no representations have reached me to the effect suggested by the hon. Member for North-East Bethnal Green.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: The right hon. Gentleman in his reply mentioned Temperance Associations. Does he draw any distinction between those Associations and other bodies, and does he not think that the orderly conduct of the Eight Hours' procession on the 4th of May may be taken to afford some indication of the orderly character of the proposed demonstration on Saturday next?

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I should like to ask whether it is not the fact that the orders of the Chief Commissioner contemplate the fullest protection to all these processions which is compatible with protection to the trade of London from serious dislocation, and protection to the peaceable citizens of London from intolerable annoyance and inconvenience?

MR. MATTHEWS: In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. C. Graham) I have only to say that I mentioned the Temperance Associations because they were referred to in the question of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton). Of course, there is no difference between one body of processionists and another. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge), I entirely concur with him. It seems to me that the orders of the Chief Commissioner of Police do contemplate such protection to the proposed processions as is compatible with protection to the rights of the citizens of London.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as he has gone out of his way to answer the question put by the hon. Member behind him, there is any chance of dislocating the trade of London either on a Sunday or on a Saturday afternoon?

MR. MATTHEWS: Judging from my experience, Sunday in London is a quieter day than Saturday. But there are many thoroughfares in which there is an enormous traffic on Saturday, and, sometimes, in order to enable a large procession to pass, the traffic has been stopped for three-quarters of an hour, or more, and enormous inconvenience has resulted.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to understand from the Home Secretary what it was in the experience of 1888 that prompted the Chief Commissioner of Police to make the Order?

MR. MATTHEWS: It was the extreme inconvenience suffered by the public through such a thoroughfare as Oxford Street being monopolised for several hours by the passing of a procession.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Were any statements made at the time with respect to the inconvenience that had been suffered?

MR. MATTHEWS: Information was received on the subject from various quarters.

MR. J. MORLEY: If I am not mistaken there were two processions in 1888, and I should like to know whether the same representations were made in each case as to the inconvenience which the processions had occasioned?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot give an answer in reference to these details with accuracy without notice, but I will make inquiries with regard to them.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman has acknowledged the right of the temperance and other associations to assemble on the Embankment on Saturday, will he afford facilities to the members of those associations to proceed to the place of assembly?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid that I can offer to the members of these associations no greater facilities than the general public are entitled to.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): Will the Government not give to Englishmen in their own capital the same facilities as—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it not the fact that the executive organising the demonstration submitted an alternative route which would have avoided Oxford Street and Regent Street?

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Is it not the duty of the police to provide for any increased traffic which may be expected to occur in any part of the Metropolis?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not conceive that it is any part of the duties of the police to prevent persons from using thoroughfares in the Metropolis in order to enable other persons to go in procession. Of course, people going to the Embankment with banners or otherwise will receive the same protection from the police as other persons.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Then am I to understand that if a body of 50, 60, or 100 people march towards the Embankment with banners they will not be interfered with?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now arguing the point.

MR. BLANE: Will the Government give the same facilities on Saturday as were afforded on the occasion of the visit of the Shah of Persia?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question is quite out of order.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is a rule in the Metropolitan Police Force that all complaints shall be made individually; and, if so, whether he will alter the rule so as to permit the police collectively to represent their grievances in the form of Petitions and Memorials?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir, there is such a rule, and I concur with the Commissioner in thinking that there would be grave objections to any alteration of the rule in the manner suggested.

YEOMANRY SWORDS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office when and by whom the swords of the East Kent Yeomanry were last tested; whether during the mounted sports recently held at Dover one of the troopers struck at a lemon and his sword thereupon broke in half; and what is the pattern and date of manufacture of the swords in the hands of that regiment?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The occurrence to which the hon. Gentleman alludes has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State, and he has already called for a Report. As soon as the Report reaches the War Office I shall be glad to reply to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the question.

Mr. BRODRICK: I am not in possession of the information.

THE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to be in a position to give the names of the persons to be appointed under the First Schedule of the Savings Banks Bill; whether the members of the Committee are to be remunerated; what is the amount of the proposed remuneration to each; and what is their proposed number?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I hope to be able to give the names at an early date, but my idea is that the first Committee, which should consist of either five or seven persons, should not be remunerated. The members of the subsequent Committee may possibly be remunerated by fees. But as the question of remuneration might preclude Members of the House from serving on the Committee, and it may be desirable to appoint some hon. Members on the Committee, I do not wish, at present, to come to a definite decision on the point.

POST OFFICE SERVANTS.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether an official reporter was present at the annual conference of the Postal Telegraph Clerks' Association held last week; and, if so, was he present by his order, and in spite of the protest of the members of the Association?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Yes, Sir.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether servants of the Post Office have been officially called upon to explain why they attended meetings of the Postman's Union; and, if so, has this action been sanctioned by the Postmaster General?

*Mr. RAIKES: What the Postmen have been called upon to explain is how they came to attend the meeting held on Clerkenwell Green, on the 16th ultimo, in spite of the warning which I had given them only a day or two before. These explanations were called for by my direction.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: Am I to understand that the Postmaster General claims the right to forbid the Post Office servants from attending meetings, whether out of uniform or not?

*Mr. RAIKES: In my opinion, servants of the Department in their relations to the Department are properly subject to official regulations.

*Mr. C. GRAHAM: Can the Post Office servants attend such meetings out of uniform?

Mr. CREMER: Does the same rule apply to all servants of the Crown?

*Mr. RAIKES: I am not responsible for any Department except my own. With respect to the question of uniform, the hon. Member is perhaps aware that it is competent for the servants of the Post Office to hold meetings, provided such meetings are held in accordance with the conditions laid down by the Department.

Mr. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): May not Post Office servants attend political meetings out of uniform; and, if not, where does the rule begin, and where does it end? Does it begin with the Postmaster General, and how far down does it extend?

*Mr. RAIKES: I have already stated that it is competent for the servants of the Post Office to attend public meetings in accordance with the regulations. Those regulations apply, not to political meetings, but to meetings at which official questions are discussed. There are no regulations requiring them to attend such meetings in uniform or otherwise.

THE LICENSING QUESTION.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether a letter, dated 14th May, addressed by him to one of his constituents, Rev. Peter Thompson, on the subject of the licensing proposals of the Government, has been printed in official form and sent, at the public expense, to the clerks of the Local Authorities throughout the country; and if this is in accordance with precedents?

*Mr. RITCHIE: It is not the fact that the letter to which the hon. Member refers has been sent to the clerks of the Local Authorities throughout the country.

I have received a very large number of communications with reference to the Local Taxation Bill, which were evidently based upon information supplied from two or three common sources, since in many cases they manifested similar misconceptions as to the nature and effect of the Government proposals. These misconceptions I endeavoured to remove in the letter to the Rev. Peter Thompson, and the transmission of a printed copy of that letter to my correspondents afforded, in my opinion, a satisfactory reply to their communications, and resulted in an economy both of labour and expense.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Is it not the fact that this communication has been sent to the Town Clerks?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir, it is not the fact. It has not been sent to any Local Body to my knowledge. No doubt, if a Town Clerk wrote to the Board upon the matter in an individual capacity, a copy of the letter may have been sent to him, but no communication, either official or unofficial, has been sent to any Local Authority by the direction of the Local Government Board.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I really must press the right hon. Gentleman upon this point, because I hold in my hand a copy of this letter which has been sent to a Town Clerk. Is it possible that it may have been posted to a Town Clerk without the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman?

*MR. RITCHIE: Of course I cannot tell what may have been done without my knowledge, but I cannot see how any official communication could have been made without my knowledge. Of course, if a Town Clerk wrote to make inquiries, it is quite possible that a copy of the letter may have been sent.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in his speech at Acton on the 20th May, he, as reported in the West Middlesex Standard of 24th May, said that he would briefly summarise the proposals which the Government had this year brought forward for improving the Licensing Laws, and, in doing so, stated that the Government "Proposed that the County Councils shall have control over all licences, and that to them the appeal and jurisdiction now in the hands of the Magistrates shall be transferred;"

and whether, in the event of his having been correctly reported, he has any objection to state in what measure introduced by the Government these proposals or provisions can be found?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The statement in question is an incorrect version of the words actually used by me on the occasion.

NAVIGATION OF THE THAMES.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the frequent cases in which smacks are run down by steam colliers in the estuary of the Thames, as in the case of the Osprey, of Burnham, on 18th May; and whether the Public Prosecutor can be instructed to take proceedings when loss of life has resulted from the neglect of those in charge of the steamer?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The case referred to by the hon. and gallant Member was reported in due course to the Board of Trade. On the information in my possession, such cases do not appear to be frequent, as the number of smacks run down by steamers of all kinds in the estuary of the Thames during the last six years has been 10, and the number of lives lost in consequence 14. With regard to the last paragraph of the question, when loss of life results from the personal culpable negligence of any person in charge of the steamer, the Public Prosecutor may take proceedings.

SCHOOL FEES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer from what date the grant in relief of payment of school fees in Scotland, proposed in the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise Duties) Bill, will commence to run?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The first thing is to secure the passage of the Bill. When that is done, and the time comes for the actual distribution of the moneys, the Scotch Education Department will issue a Minute setting forth the conditions on which the sum shall be applied in relief of the payment of school fees.

THE CORPORATION OF HANLEY.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Mayor, Corporation, and Burgesses of Hanley (Staffordshire) purchased the Queen's Hotel in Hanley out of the public funds and converted it into a town hall and borough buildings; whether they sold the licence for £800; and whether the Local Government Board gave its sanction to this transaction?

*MR. RITCHIE: I find that application was made to the Treasury by the Town Council of Hanley in 1883 for sanction to a loan under the Municipal Corporations Act for the purchase of premises, including the Queen's Hotel, with a view to its adaptation for a town hall and municipal buildings. The Local Government Board, by desire of the Treasury, directed an inquiry as regards the application by one of their Inspectors, and the necessary loan was sanctioned in December, 1883. I have no information as to whether the licence was sold for £800; but assuming that it was, no sanction on the part of the Board was necessary.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what vessels of the British Navy are stationed on the East Coast of Africa and in the Red Sea respectively for the suppression of the Slave Trade; what number of boats, if any, specially fitted for that duty, such as large steam launches, are supplied to such vessels; and whether the boats at present usually supplied are not almost useless for intercepting dhows, and at the same time are so small as to be detrimental to the health and lives of the men employed in them?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: In addition to the performance of other duties the following vessels are engaged at the present time in the suppression of the Slave Trade:—Dolphin, in the Red Sea, in the neighbourhood of Suakin; Ranger, at Aden; Turquoise, Conquest, Brisk, Kingfisher, and Reindeer, on the East Coast of Africa, with headquarters at Zanzibar. There are two 37 feet steam pinnaces, specially fitted for cruising against slavers, which are manned from the ships at Zanzibar, and are employed with other boats belonging to the ships of the squadron. The boats of the vessels on the station have been employed on this service for a long time past, and have been instrumental in the capture of a large number of slave dhows, while the health of the men manning the boats has been quite as good as that of the crew of the ships from which they were drafted.

THE COASTGUARD.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty is it a fact that no matter how efficient, or how many lives may be saved, the Chief Officer in the Coastguard has the same rate of pay on the first day he is promoted as after 20 or more years' service, which is contrary to the usage of all other Naval servants of the Crown, and especially of those who have risen from the ranks, and that although these officers may be appointed to the command of Coastguard divisions they continue to receive 6s. per diem; would he explain why these officers are only given 20s. per annum for their seamen's time, while those who have served with them under precisely the same circumstances get 30s.; and what difference is made in the pensions of those officers who command divisions to those who remain chief officers of stations?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Chief officers of Coastguard do not receive an increase of pay after promotion to that rank, nor when appointed to the command of a division, but these officers in certain cases receive a considerable addition to their substantive pay in the form of allowances for duties connected with the Royal Naval Reserve. Chief officers of Coastguard are still pensioned upon the scale applied to Warrant officers prior to 1870, as it was not considered necessary to extend to them the higher rate of 30s. now allowed to Warrant officers serving afloat. No difference is made between the pensions of chief officers in command of divisions and those of officers in charge of stations.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the interest felt in and importance of the provisions of the Savings Banks Bill, he will arrange for its Second Reading at a time when reasonable discussion can take place?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I attach great importance to the Bill; but I am not authorised by my right hon. Friend the leader of the House to state the nature of the arrangements which may be made for taking the Second Reading.

THE TITHES BILL.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is authorised to announce what business will be taken on Thursday?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Government intend to proceed with the Tithes Bill on Thursday.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Bill be taken day by day?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not in a position to make any further statement upon the matter.

THE WEST AUSTRALIA BILL.

MR. J. MORLEY: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer cause information to be conveyed to the First Lord of the Treasury as to the great inconvenience which is being occasioned in consequence of the delay in the re-committal stage of the West Australia Bill? I hope that some understanding may be arrived at.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will convey the question of the right hon. Gentleman to my right hon. Friend; but the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Bill can only be proceeded with by the co-operation of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MOTIONS.

STREET PROCESSIONS—METROPOLIS.

(4.10.) Mr. PICKERSGILL, Member for the South West Division of Bethnal Green, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the threatened interference on Saturday next with the customary right of public demonstration in the Metropolis; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen,

(4.11.) MR. PICKERSGILL: This is the first occasion, Sir, on which I have ventured to take the somewhat extreme step of moving the adjournment of the House. I can assure the House that I should not have done so now if I had not been firmly convinced of the extreme importance of the action proposed to be taken by the Government, which action this Motion is intended to impugn. The action of the Government is most important from two points of view: in the first place, because, whatever its intention may be, it is calculated to cause public mischief and public disorder; and, secondly, because it seems to me to be really a consistent part of the policy which has characterised the present Administration, a policy that aims at destroying piecemeal all the great rights of public meeting in this Metropolis. When large bodies of men are brought together, if the public order is to be preserved, organisation is essential, and the best security for organisation is single control and undivided responsibility. In order to attain those great objects past experience has shown the propriety and wisdom of marshalling such processions as those which are proposed to take place on Saturday next upon the Thames Embankment, in order that they may proceed from thence in one continuous course to the place of meeting, namely, Hyde Park. The action of the Chief Commissioner of Police, which, as we have just heard, has the approval of Her Majesty's Government, is calculated to interfere very materially with that undivided control and responsibility, because we are told in the letter of the Chief Commissioner that those bodies of men who propose to go to Hyde Park from the north and west portions of the Metropolis, and also to some extent the processions which are to come from the south, are not to be allowed to go to the Embankment at all, but will be required to find their way to Hyde Park by various other routes. Now, I venture to assert that a proposal of that nature is likely to lead to confusion and disorder, owing to the divergence of route, and also to the division of responsibility. In 1884, and again in 1888, large demonstrations of the kind which it is proposed to hold on Saturday took place, and all that the organisers of the present demonstration require is that the course then pursued should be adopted now. The Chief Commissioner does not say that either in 1884 or 1888 there was any disorder. Is it true that in 1888 there was a monopoly, as he calls it, of Oxford Street? I was present at that demonstration, and I say with some confidence that there was nothing like a monopoly of Oxford Street, nor was there any material interference with the public passing along that street. And here I wish to point out that the Chief Commissioner has not been quite ingenuous or fair to the Organisation Committee in the statement contained in his letter, because he has made it appear that the Organisation Committee insisted on passing along Holborn and Oxford Street. The fact of the matter is, that the Committee were perfectly willing to make every reasonable concession in order to meet the views of the Chief Commissioner; and although the Committee first proposed to go along Holborn and Oxford Street, and would undoubtedly have preferred that route, yet, in order to meet the objection of the Chief Commissioner; they were willing to alter the route. There is, therefore, a little disingenuousness on the part of the Chief Commissioner in ignoring the concession they were willing to make. But there is something still more serious in the letter of the Chief Commissioner, having regard to the preservation of public order. He says—

“It is also clearly to be understood that the police will not protect or keep open a route for processions to the Embankment, but will be instructed to arrest the progress of or interrupt and divide such processions whenever and so long as may be necessary in order to allow the ordinary traffic to pass.

That course was not taken in 1884 or in 1888, but on both occasions the bodies of men who were passing to the Embankment had the protection of the Metropolitan Police; and upon the present occasion the City Police have promised the protection which the Metropolitan Police refuse. It seems to me that whatever the intentions of the framers of this Order may have been, its operation will be to hold out almost an invitation for the interference of those persons who, we know, look with dis-favour and hostility upon the processions of Saturday next. The intimation that the police will not afford protection to them is a distinct invitation to those who are opposed to them to bring out brewers' drays and other vehicles for the purpose of breaking up the order of procession and provoking the hostility of those who may take part in them. As to the grounds on which this rescript has been issued, the author of it lays great stress on what he calls the right of every individual member of the public to free and unrestricted passage along the public thoroughfares. To use language of that kind is to use the language of pedantry, seeing that the suggested right is interfered with every day and every hour in every day. Unless it were for the observance of mutual forbearance and the good-humoured exercise of the social virtue of give and take, the legitimate business of the Metropolis could not possibly be conducted. The Chief Commissioner himself recognises this, because in another place he says—

“I am not able to find in the incident of 1888 any valid grounds for asking the public, in the absence of any expressed wish on their part, to submit to such sacrifice of their rights in 1890.”

The words “in the absence of any expressed wish on the part of the public” are somewhat peculiar. They may suggest two questions. In the first place, what mode of expression of the public will does the Chief Commissioner require? If he will kindly indicate what will satisfy him, there may possibly be a mode of supplying the deficiency. But this further question is also suggested—has the public ever expressed a burning desire to sacrifice its convenience in order to enable persons to attend Drawing Rooms and Court ceremonials? The other day an allusion was made to the Lord Mayor's Show, and the right hon. Gentleman based the case for permitting it upon custom. It is upon custom that I mainly rely now. There has been, until the present Administration came into power, for many generations an absolutely uninterrupted custom of holding public demonstrations in the Metropolis; and if the right hon. Gentleman is to set up a custom on behalf of the Lord Mayor's Show, and to say that custom is to have no force and validity where political demonstrations are concerned, then I say that the Government are playing against the popular liberties with loaded dice. A short time ago the right hon. Gentleman referred to the statutory powers which the Chief Commissioner possesses. I do not propose to enter into any legal argument, but I will simply state what I believe to be the fact that, properly and fairly construed, these enactments were designed not to suppress, but to protect, processions. They give power to organise a demonstration, but they give no power to the Chief Commissioner to suppress, practically, the right of demonstration in London. I am not anxious, as I said, to discuss the matter from a purely legal point of view, because I know that, if popular liberties are to be taken away, there is seldom any difficulty in finding a more or less plausible pretext. I know, also, it has frequently happened that popular liberties have been destroyed in the very name of law. Another point of view from which I regard the question is, that it is a step in the progress of encroachment. It is obvious, from the very terms of the Chief Commissioner's letter, that it is not the last step, because I find this passage—

"I wish it to be distinctly understood that these arrangements have only been sanctioned as a special case."

In conclusion, let me recapitulate the steps of progress through which the present administration have passed. In the first place, they laid an embargo upon Trafalgar Square; in the second place, they blocked up the approaches to Trafalgar Square; and now they prohibit the right of the exercise of the old custom of public demonstration through the main thoroughfares of the Metropolis. The next step, I have no doubt, will be, as is indicated by the threat in the Chief Commissioner's letter, to forbid processions altogether. And then, Sir, may come the last stage of all, which is already realized by our fellow citizens across St. George's Channel, whose happy privilege it is to be at this moment in the full enjoyment of the ultimate stage of the Government régime; the last stage of all will be to proclaim the meeting itself, and to bludgeon or even to shoot down those citizens who have the impudence to take part in it. For these reasons I think it is imperative that a protest as effective as we can make it should be entered against this gradual process of encroachment upon liberties, and I beg to move the motion of the House.

Motion made, and Question "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Pickersgill.)

(4.25.) MR. CREMER (Haggerston): I have no fact that a great demonstration be held in Hyde Park on next is a most inconvenient the Government to contemplate have, during their term of office, ably displayed a terrible democracy. [Cries of "Oh Ministerial Benches."] Oh, I understand that; but I do not you call a Tory democracy, have for the time being manufactured for your own party purposes. I am speaking of democracy, the people themselves honest expression of opinion part which you have always you dread to-day; but upon the efforts which you are stifle the expression of public Saturday next, the voice will be lifted up, and the Chief Commissioner, ending Home Secretary, will on effect of increasing the volume. You have already, in fact, ranks by sending over to were at first scarcely we could have desired brethren, who were some between two opinions managed to brace the strengthen them, and the your interference and at this honest expression of part of the people will sin increased volume and demonstration. During office the Government has displayed a great dread opinion, except when it itself in the endorser they have pursued, and very seldom indeed. Then on Saturday next is people out of doors are to with very great intention mean the publicans and are dreading the result stration, but I mean to ourselves, who are anxious the proposals of the Government to endow the publicans and to give them a permanent interest in their licences. I am very glad to say that up to the present time we have always avoided any collision between the police and the people when we have been met in a spirit of fair-play by the Government. In fact, when you have left us alone, we have managed to preserve the peace, but when you have attempted to divert our processions into back streets where no one can see them, the peace has not always been preserved. The object of the Government on the present occasion is to send the people through back streets where nobody can see them. When left alone we have always conducted our proceedings in an orderly manner. No communications were addressed to the Times, the Standard, or the other reactionary journals, complaining that the public convenience suffered in consequence of the demonstration of 1888. That demonstration having passed off in such an orderly and peaceable manner, we selected the same route for the demonstration of next Saturday. Now, for the first time, the Chief Commissioner of Police is setting himself up as the authority to select the routes through which processions shall pass. The police never attempted, except in regard to two or three very recent instances of very small demonstrations, to interfere with the routes of processions, but left them to be arranged by the promoters themselves. One would have thought that out of courtesy the Chief Commissioner would have sent his letter first to those to whom it was addressed, and invited them to sit down with him to discuss the desirability of changing the route, so that an amicable understanding might be arrived at. Nothing of the kind. This high and mighty Police Commissioner issues this ukase and sends it to the Press before he sends a copy to the Demonstration Committee. This is an extraordinary proceeding, and we should be wanting in our duty to our constituents if we allowed the action of the First Commissioner to pass unchallenged. To my mind it is clear that this is part of the policy which the Government have for a long time pursued. They are trying to transplant into this country the arbitrary rules which have been set up in the sister isle. First of all they struck a blow at the right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square on the plea that it was an interference with the traffic of the Metropolis. There were a great many people who were caught by that cry, and I myself have admitted that Trafalgar Square is not the best possible place in the Metropolis in which to hold a demonstration. The action of the Government, however, is not animated by a desire on their part to consult the public convenience. It was a blow struck against the rights and liberties of the people. I baited a little trap for the Home Secretary on the last occasion, and the right hon. Gentleman fell into it. I asked whether the people would be allowed to make a public demonstration on the Horse Guards' Parade, and after six months' serious consideration of the question the right hon. Gentleman announced that the Government had resolved that they could not allow public meetings to be held there. It is clear, therefore, that their intention was on that occasion to strike a blow against the right of the people to meet in order to discuss their grievances. Now another effort has been made, and it is obvious that the Government will be able to have their own way. They have had it for three or four years. In a few months, however, the turn of the Opposition will come, and we shall then restore to the people not only the right to marshal their own processions, but the right of meeting in open spaces. Without indulging in a threat I tell the Home Secretary that all his efforts and those of the Chief Commissioner of Police will be simply futile, because they can not prevent the tide of public opinion from rising. The democracy is now omnipotent. The fact that you are going to interfere with the demonstration proves that you dread an honest expression of opinion on the part of the people. I presume you fear that such an expression of opinion will somewhat endanger the passing of a Bill which you hope will help you at the next General Election.

*(4.43.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): The two hon. Members who have just addressed the House have claimed to speak on behalf of the people of London. On a famous historical or quasi-historical occasion I think there were three gentlemen who claimed to speak on behalf of the people of England, and I hope the two hon. Members opposite will allow me, as I, too, am a Metropolitan Member, to say a few words on this subject on behalf of the people of London. I speak for those peaceable and law-abiding citizens who desire to be allowed to go about their own business and to use the thoroughfares just as much as other people, and with no greater monopoly. It seems to me that only two points demanding any serious reply have been submitted to the House. The first was brought forward by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill). The hon. Member pointed out that the City Police Authorities had given facilities for processions that had, according to the hon. Gentleman, been denied by the Chief Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. I am doubtful whether that is quite accurate. The hon. Gentleman forgot, however, that in the City the streets are comparatively deserted on Saturday afternoon. In this respect they are much on the same footing as the Embankment and Birdcage Walk, which are opened by the Chief Commissioner to the hon. Gentleman and his friends. Then there is the point raised by the hon. Member for Shoreditch, that the rights of individual citizens to the free use of the thoroughfares of the Metropolis are frequently interfered with. The hon. Member mentioned such occasions as the visit of the Shah of Persia, the Lord Mayor's Show, and Drawing Rooms or Levées of the Sovereign. I would point out to the hon. Member that such occasions stand on an altogether different footing from a demonstration like that which is to take place on Saturday. Of the merits of that demonstration I will say nothing, but it is confessedly a partisan demonstration, confined to one party and to one section of the people of the Metropolis. I venture to say that the hon. Gentleman would be very much surprised if he were to find the humble individual who is addressing the House or any hon. Member on this side taking part in the demonstration. I would point out to the hon. Member that I claim no more for those for whom I speak than I allow to others. I have the honour to be a member of the Primrose League. Would not hon. Members opposite think the League was claiming too much if it demanded the sole monopoly of the busy streets of London for the purpose of marching through them in procession? I think we should be asking too much, and I should never dream of putting forward such a claim on behalf of the Primrose League, or any other organisation. I apply the same rule to the proposed procession on Saturday. Moreover, it should be remembered that when special facilities are given for the occupation of the streets on such occasions as the visit of the Shah we are acting in a national and Imperial spirit. I am bold enough to say that even with regard to the Lord Mayor's Show, that function is, at any rate, a non-contentious one. It is a demonstration of a strictly Municipal and Metropolitan non-partisan character, and in regard to which all parties are to a certain extent agreed. Therefore, I say, hon. Members opposite are not justified in demanding for Saturday's procession an undue and unjust monopoly of the streets of London, although they may have the right to ask for such facilities as might be given without interfering with the rights of the other inhabitants of the Metropolis.

*(4.50.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I desire to join my hon. Friends on this side of the House in protesting against this unnecessary interference with the right of public meeting. It is rather remarkable that the Government should avail themselves of the opportunity, when an inconvenient demonstration is about to be held, to interfere with the Temperance Associations. I quite concede the legal right of the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner of Police to regulate, for the public convenience, the route which the procession should take, but they should exercise that right with discretion, and should, as far as possible, endeavour to meet the reasonable wishes of those who desire to take part in the procession. It must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman that one of the purposes for which this procession is to take place is to enable the Temperance Associations to demonstrate in an organised fashion. The idea was that the various societies should assemble on the Thames Embankment, and then march through some public thoroughfares to Hyde Park, there to hold a meeting. There may be objections to the processionists marching through Oxford Street, but I do not see what objection can be raised to their proceeding through Northumberland Avenue. The only point at which any difficulty might occur would be, I apprehend, Trafalgar Square. But if a large procession is to march from the Embankment the same difficulty will occur in crossing from the Embankment to the Bird Cage Walk. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman should have assented to the proposal of the Temperance Associations to march through Northumberland Avenue, and he would have met the requirements of the associations. He would thus have afforded them an opportunity of displaying their numbers. When I put the question to the right hon. Gentleman earlier in the evening I was led to believe that he had prohibited the assemblage of the processionists on the Embankment, but I find that is not so. But if the people are to assemble facilities should be afforded to enable them to get to the place of assemblage. Unless the right hon. Gentleman will enable them to come in forties, fifties, and hundreds, with their bands, banners, regalia, and other paraphernalia for display, they will not be able to avail themselves of the privilege of assembling and marshalling themselves in processional order on the Embankment. It is essential that the Home Secretary should give them the opportunity of getting from their various neighbourhoods to the Embankment. The suggestion that the people should form themselves into a number of processions might be a convenient suggestion if the right hon. Gentleman anticipated the demonstration on the Embankment would be so enormous that it could not conveniently be organised in one procession there and march to Hyde Park. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman has not quite realised that the duty of the police is to afford accommodation to the public, and to provide for all the public, and not merely a few individuals who are casually using a street. If half-a-dozen individuals are to have facilities to walk up and down a street, surely 10,000 people who want to use a street have far greater claims to the protection and assistance of the police in exercising their increased requirements in connection with a public thoroughfare. I must confess I am surprised at the line adopted in Mr. Monro's letter, or, I take it, as it has not been inappropriately called by a preceding speaker, and for a subordinate officer of the Government to talk about his "duty as far as possible to prevent large bodies of men marching in procession through the crowded thoroughfares" makes it appear that he entirely misunderstands his duty. If large bodies of people march through public thoroughfares of this city it is his business to afford them facilities, and not to interfere with them and create a disturbance by attempting to break up their procession. If the people were likely to be disorderly or seditious I could understand the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety and fear, but the right hon. Gentleman will hardly suggest that the Bands of Hope, Good Templars, and other organisations of the Temperance Party are dangerous or seditious in their character. A great many of the people who will join in the procession desire the assistance of the police in getting from the Embankment to Hyde Park, and they are the very people whom the Chief Commissioner and the right hon. Gentleman ought to afford facilities to. There is a great deal in this letter of the Chief Commissioner of Police which grates very much on English notions of the right of public meeting. The tone of the letter is certainly very objectionable. There is a reference to a statement made in Parliament by the right hon. Gentleman himself. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will disavow that statement. To say that a body of 600 persons marching in procession with bands and banners through a crowded thoroughfare is a public nuisance is to use very strong language indeed. If a thoroughfare is crowded it is the duty of the police to facilitate the traffic. Towards the end of this remarkable letter of Mr. Monro there is what I submit is really an invitation to disturbance.

"It is, of course," he says, "to be understood that the police are not prepared to keep open the route for the processionists to the Embankment; they will be instructed to arrest, break up, and divide such processions whenever and so long as it may be necessary to allow the ordinary traffic to pass."

But I say that if there is an extraordinary addition to the traffic, and the police have notice of this addition to the ordinary traffic in a particular district or place, then I say the police should have regard to the larger number of persons wanting to use the streets, and use every effort to afford them free passage. By refusing to discharge that duty, the police are actually inviting disturbance, and suggesting interference with processions by those who hold views adverse to those who take part in them. If the Home Secretary would give an assurance that every facility shall be offered by the police for people to proceed to the Embankment on Saturday next, that would satisfy most reasonably minded people, but while the right hon. Gentleman admits the propriety and reasonableness of the proposal to assemble on the Thames Embankment, and yet refuses to afford facilities to persons to proceed to the place of assembly, he acts inconsistently, and invites disorder and trouble in this city. I am not here for the purpose of making an attack on the reasonable exercise of discretion by the police and the Home Office in regulating the passage of processions, but I say it is the duty of the Commissioner of Police, and his superior here, to afford reasonable protection and assistance to any number of the public who desire to have the opportunity of making a peaceable demonstration on any public question. On this occasion it happens to be an unfortunate question for the Government. The Government do not want to see a large demonstration, and possibly they might be glad to have obstacles in the way of any large procession or any great meeting. It may not be so, but the very suspicion of such a thing should have induced the Home Office to use the greater forbearance and consideration. If the demonstration should happen to be small and insignificant, then the Government would serve their own purpose by assisting the demonstration. If it is large and important, then it has the more claim to appear before the public in its true proportions. Certainly the Government should be more particularly careful to display fairness towards political opponents. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider his arrangements, and allow of police assistance to facilitate the assembling of the various contingents of Temperance Societies from different parts of London, allowing these to march along selected routes to the place of assembling for the general procession. An hon. Member opposite has suggested the possibility of a Primrose League demonstration; and all I can say is that if the hon. Member and his friends desire to organise such a procession and demonstration, and the police throw difficulties in the way we will join in protest against such interference. Indeed, we would willingly do this, for we should like to see the numbers of the Primrose League, and we would heartily join in endeavouring to secure all facilities for a Primrose League procession, with all its paraphernalia, insignia, and decorations. I protest against unnecessary interference with a peaceable procession, and I protest against Government interference indirectly with public meeting. I am not prepared to say the interference is with the desire to embarrass political opponents, but it certainly wears that aspect, and is likely to encourage such a suspicion.

*(5.10.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I regret that the hon. Member who has just sat down should have departed from the reasonable temper and rational concessions of his opening observations. Of the opening part of his speech I should not have had a word to complain, but when he imputes to the Government a political motive—some dislike of the opinions and views of those who want to organise the procession next Saturday—I can only assure him that he is entirely mistaken; and if his mischievous advice be followed by my hon. Friend, and the Primrose League should inconvenience the Metropolis in the same way as is proposed next Saturday, the same measures precisely will be taken. I do not wish to treat the subject with acrimony, and I hope hon. Members will excuse me if I do not follow them into many heated comments as to popular rights and so on. Really it seems to me that they have no bearing on this question, but I ask leave to offer a few common-sense suggestions upon the question of processions. I think hon. Members must feel that, in the condition to which the streets of this Metropolis are rapidly coming, the frequent passage of such organised bodies of men is, to say the least, a highly inconvenient thing, and I venture to say that it is not consistent with the public rights to the thoroughfare. If half-a-dozen men choose to walk down Bond Street arm-in-arm, sweeping everything before them from the foot pavement, and preventing others from going on that foot pavement, they would be clearly exceeding their rights, and I think it would be the duty of the police to interfere. These processions consist not only of one rank of half a dozen men, but of hundreds of such ranks of men, linked together, and not giving and taking—as I think the hon. Member for Shoreditch said—which is the rule of the thoroughfare, giving others just as much opportunity of using the thoroughfare as they take themselves, but sweeping before them carriages and foot passengers alike, and preventing all use of the thoroughfare so long as the procession is taking place. Let us get rid of the idea of processions entirely. If an owner of carts were to take half a dozen of them, and tie them together, and insist upon their passing in an uninterrupted line down Bond Street, that would be in excess of his rights, and his string of carts might be broken up in order to allow other vehicles and foot passengers to cross the line occupied by his carts so connected. Do not let it be forgotten that this organised occupation of large portions of the highway, to the prevention of all other use of the highway, is an abuse of the right which we all have equally in the streets. It is a departure from that principle of give and take by which alone the use of our thoroughfares can be maintained; it is a monopoly claimed for processions, but the good nature of the public is such that on most occasions they wink at this sort of usurpation, when persons, having no mischievous intention in their minds, make a demonstration of their views by means of a procession. But do let the House observe that the matter has now become one of serious consequence. On inquiry I find that there is an increasing mania for these demonstrations, for it really is so. The recorded figures which I have before me show that in 1887 there were 200 of these processions, in 1888 there were 1,400, and in 1889 there were 1,200 altogether.

Mr. Matthews

An hon. MEMBER: Of what sort?

*MR. MATTHEWS: The large processions numbered 17 in 1887, 13 in 1888, and 60 in 1889. I leave the House to imagine what sort of labour that threw upon the police in keeping the route open for the passage of these processions. All traffic is stopped on both sides in order to enable them to pass, and enormous numbers of the police have to be employed on that duty. Indeed, the amount of extra work is so great that the increasing frequency of these processions may well suggest the consideration whether it is not expedient to make a large increase in the Police Force. Now, the hon. Member for North St. Pancras has stated the rights of the police with fair accuracy; they regulate the passage of processions so as to cause as little general inconvenience as possible. Can it be contended that a demonstration of public opinion cannot be made in Birdcage Walk or Grosvenor Place, and that it is absolutely necessary to obstruct Piccadilly and Oxford Street? The hon. Member opposite is somewhat mistaken in his facts. The processionists desired to take, not the shortest, but the most circuitous route they could, and through the most crowded thoroughfares, to Hyde Park. What they wanted to do was to cause the maximum of inconvenience to the public and the maximum of trouble to the police. The difficulty and trouble that the police have in keeping a route for a procession of this sort are enormous. What the Commissioner says is this:—

“If you want to go to Hyde Park, where you can have your speeches and your expressions of opinion and your demonstration, the nearest way is, by Birdcage Walk and Grosvenor Place.”

But do not let it be supposed that even then inconvenience is not inflicted upon the public. An hon. Member told me that the last Sunday when a procession was protected by the police the necessary interruption of traffic caused no less than 81 omnibuses to be stopped in the Knightsbridge Road, while it was passing Hyde Park Corner. Can it be said that processionists have a right to obstruct the traffic like that? If they were kept to their strict rights, the police would break up the procession and allow the other traffic to pass, as they do with all other traffic. But if that course is danger in accepting this proposition which is put forward by the Commissioner, and I think we ought to protest against the overstraining of this doctrine of public convenience. The fact is that a great mistake has been made in this case, and I hope that the Government will not insist upon a doctrine which would be extremely mischievous in its results.

(5.30.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): The whole question before us now is whether from this time processions shall cease in the Metropolis. I appealed to the right hon. Gentleman, who was so careful not to introduce any heated language in his speech, to give us a reason for the action the police have taken; and I venture to say that he has entirely failed to meet the charges which have been made from this side of the House with regard to the tenour of the language held by a subordinate of the right hon. Gentleman. I say that this document is couched in language totally unbecoming in a permanent official speaking of the people in whose employment he is. It contains almost an incentive to disorder. Those of us who have raised this discussion are most anxious that there should be nothing in the shape of disorder, and we want the Government to act in such a way as will do away with all friction between the public and the police. The defence of Mr. Monro has been based on a statement by the Home Secretary in 1889, in reference to a Salvation Army procession, which was making its way to Exeter Hall, and had proceeded more than two-thirds of the distance when it came into collision with the police. And what was the reason for that collision? According to the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary this procession of 600 persons became a public nuisance directly it entered the area controlled by the Metropolitan Police, although it had just passed, without difficulty, through the crowded streets of the City, where the arrangements were controlled by a police force managed by the citizens themselves. The citizens of London are face to face with a state of things which cannot be equalled in any other town in the country. We know that at the great Franchise Demonstration in 1884 the processions were allowed to pass from the Embankment, up

Mr. Childers

Whitehall, and through Trafalgar Square to Hyde Park, and the Heir Apparent and his family occupied a seat in Whitehall, from which they viewed the citizens expressing their opinion in a Constitutional manner. There was no danger felt then; why should there be now? Yet here we have an edict issued by a permanent official and couched in language which we are bound to resent. All that the promoters of Saturday's demonstration desire is that the same facilities should be accorded to them as have hitherto been enjoyed. They are not anxious that the methods of the Chief Secretary should have too strong an influence on the Cabinet, or that the right hon. Gentleman should try and induce his Colleagues to imitate in this country some of his characteristic acts. I protest most strongly against the action of the Chief Commissioner. I protest against the speech of the Home Secretary and against the ideas which underlie his views on the subject of public processions. The ukase of Mr. Monro practically prevents the people from assembling on the Embankment, for it directs that those who come from certain directions, as from Westminster Bridge, shall proceed direct to Hyde Park. The right of public meeting has been the safety valve of public opinion in this country in times gone by. Men have been allowed to meet and demonstrate in the past, and I say by all means do not prevent them doing so now. You ought not to rob them of a privilege they have so long enjoyed, and I submit it would be a most dangerous thing to do so. I think we are bound to press this matter to a division.

*(5.48.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I agree with the Home Secretary that these questions are of growing seriousness because of the huge population we now have in London. This population is increasing year by year, and consequently these public assemblies on important occasions also grow larger. The Home Secretary says that the duties thrown on the police are exceedingly heavy. That is so, and yet he is now putting upon them duties which they used not to be called upon to discharge. I have during the last 30 years had wide experience of the police in connection with public meetings. It has been my good fortune never to come into collision with them. But I have never gone to the police for assistance in connection with any of the great meetings I have held. I have not conceived it to be the duty of the police to interfere or to do anything except to keep order so far as their jurisdiction extends. It is not for me to criticise the action of the promoters of next Saturday's demonstration, but I am not sure that they have been wise in applying to the police authorities. Those who summon huge demonstrations of this kind should take reasonable precautions for maintaining order, and should not have recourse to the police, except as ordinary citizens. What has happened, especially during the last half a dozen years, has been a disposition on the part of the Police Authorities to interfere in political demonstrations. I recently put some questions to the Home Secretary as to some inquiries made by the police with reference to a Post Office employés' meeting, and I received a denial founded on information supplied to the police by we know not whom. I am afraid there is a growing feeling on the part of the police that it is their duty to act in the same way as the Continental police, and to interfere with the arrangements for holding political meetings. They used not to adopt this policy, and it ought to be no part of their duty so to act now. I think we ought, therefore, to enter a strong protest against their action. The Home Secretary tells us that there are more meetings now, and that it may be his duty, unless something is done, to ask for an increase of the Police Force.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I said that there were more processions, and that if the police are to be charged with these duties the number of the Force must be increased.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: But why do you not shut your eyes to these processions, as other Governments have done before you? Most of my demonstrations have been held without any police interference. The working of the Police Force is not a thing merely in the hands of the Home Secretary or of the Chief Commissioner. It is regulated by statute, and I deny that the Act gives the Chief Commissioner any sort of authority to break up processions or to hinder them. He has the duty cast upon him of making regulations for the preservation of the peace; but when he acts as he is now doing he brings himself into conflict with the people, and that is a very dangerous thing to do. It is absurd to say that the police can control the whole of the people of the Metropolis. The people are only controlled by their desire to be law-abiding, and unless they are law-abiding it is impossible to restrain them without the assistance of the military. I repeat that the Chief Commissioner had no right to issue from his room at Scotland Yard such a decree as Mr. Monro has sent out.

*(5.55.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): The hon. Member for North Kensington has rebuked two of my hon. Friends because they have come forward as the spokesmen of the London people.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I am sure he has no desire to misrepresent me. What I said was this. If the two hon. Members who have spoken claim to represent the people of London, they surely will not object to my also claiming to be a Metropolitan Member, and, like them, to represent the people of London.

*MR. CAUSTON: I accept the hon. Member's explanation, although I remember the hon. Member's verbal reference to the Tailors of Tooley Street; but I want to draw attention to the fact that it is the London Liberal Members who have risen to uphold the rights and privileges of the people, and that the only London Member on the Tory Benches who has spoken is the hon. Member, who has already avowed that it is not his intention again to seek the suffrages of his constituency. Now I do not wish to prolong this debate; but I want to emphasise the fact that it is a Tory Government which is trying to deprive the people of London of their rights and privileges, and unless the people through their Parliamentary Representatives make a strong protest, they will soon have no rights left at all. The Home Secretary has referred to the increasing number of these processions. But why are these demonstrations held? Simply because the policy of the Government is so distasteful to the people of the Metropolis; and the more educated the people become, the more frequent will be the protests of this character. I can assure the hon.

Member for North Kensington that, if he desires to have a Primrose League demonstration, nobody will be more willing than the London Liberals and Radicals to assist in keeping order. The fact is, that the Government have no confidence in the people; on the contrary, they have a terrible fear of the people. I believe, however, that the people of London are as orderly as any body of people to be found in any part of the world. We very much object to the fact that we have not the same rights and privileges as people resident in cities and towns such as Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and the City of London, where the police are under the control of the directly elected Representatives of the people, and not under the sole control of the Home Secretary or a Chief Commissioner. The Chief Commissioner has said that he is responsible for what is contained in his letter, and the Home Secretary has in this House taken the responsibility upon himself. Whom are we to rebuke? I hope it is not too late for the Government to say they will allow the different branches of the procession to go to the Embankment and assemble there without any restriction being placed in the way of their meeting, as they have hitherto been enabled to do.

*(6.1.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of answering the taunt that hon. Members on this side of the House have refrained from taking part in this Debate. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on the firm position he has taken in this matter, and I also congratulate the right hon. Gentleman's subordinate, Mr. Monro, upon his action. The reason for the action which has been taken in this matter is to be found in what has been going on in the Metropolis for many months past when processions of this kind have been taking place almost day by day to the great interruption of business and the extreme inconvenience of the inhabitants generally. I am the Representative of a large democratic constituency, and should be one of the last to attempt to restrict the legitimate rights of the people in regard to public meetings; but I assert unhesitatingly that the regulations and rules laid down by the Home Secretary are not intended to interfere with those rights, but merely to regulate the proper use of the thoroughfares, by diverting processions from the busy streets so as to prevent their interference with the regular traffic of the Metropolis. As the Civil Governor of the Metropolis, the right hon. Gentleman has a perfect right to prevent interference of the ordinary use of the thoroughfares by the public, and I think the boldness of the language he has used is fully justified by the fact that as these processions have been carried out of late they have become an intolerable nuisance. Although I support the legitimate exercise of the rights of the people, I think that those public demonstrations ought to be carried out in such a manner as not to interfere with the ordinary public business. There are undoubtedly many who sympathise with the object of those who wish to make the proposed demonstration; but, at the same time, due consideration ought to be given to the rights of that portion of the public who do not desire to take part in the contemplated procession. Although I am aware that what I have just said may not be popular in certain quarters, I think we have every right to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on the stand he has taken in this matter.

*(6.5.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I am not one of those who deny that any Government has a right to control and regulate, to some extent, public processions; but it seems to me that this matter, which has already occupied the attention of the House of Commons for an hour or two, is rather one that ought to be within the jurisdiction of the County Council, which is specially elected for the exercise of municipal functions, than that it should be allowed to take up the time of the great representative Council of the nation. For once I feel myself in agreement with the hon. Member for Northampton. I think that during the last year or two the police seem to have taken upon themselves the right of controlling the public meetings and breaking up public processions in a manner which creates some ground for alarm; but I ask the Government whether they think that in the future these processions are likely to be increased or diminished by the course they are now taking? Some observations have fallen from the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Causton) with which I do not altogether agree. He said the people of London were demonstrating in large processions because they do not agree with the policy of Her Majesty's Government, thereby inferring that if the Government were to be replaced by a Government composed of Members sitting on this side of the House the people of London will necessarily be in agreement with the policy of that Government. That I believe to be an absolute fallacy. I do not think that the policy propounded from either side of this House will ever in the slightest degree be accepted by the vast bulk of the population of London. I may, however, say that there is one matter which is not a cause of any astonishment to me, because I have become accustomed to it, and that is the attitude taken by the occupants of the Liberal Front Bench on this occasion. We have just had a halting little homily from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) of a kind to which we have become accustomed. But, apart from the right hon. Gentleman, we have seen to-day, as on many previous occasions when very serious matters are going on in the Metropolis, the occupants of the Front Bench have sat like so many stuffed figures at Madame Tussaud's, making no observations whatever, but occasionally running out to look at the telegraph tape to see what news was coming from Connemara or other parts of the world out of which they might be able to make political capital. Such conduct does not much astonish me; but I hope that the people of London, if they attach much importance to this question, will read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the silence of those right hon. Gentlemen; and I trust, also, that at some future time, when votes are to be caught and kudos is to be gained at a small expense, we may be enabled to hear a word or two from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, or from some other right hon. Gentleman now seated on the Front Opposition Bench in the undignified attitude of members for Madame Tussaud's.

ADJOURNMENT (DERBY DAY).

(6.24.) LORD ELCHO (Ipswich): In rising to move "That this House at its rising do adjourn until Thursday next," I feel that I do so under circumstances which are somewhat disadvantageous to myself. I will not allude to the fact that there was a time when such a Motion was made, as a matter of course, by the Government of the day, but those times have long passed away. Members on this side of the House are continually being told that their actions should be a reflection of the views of their constituents; that they should follow public opinion, not attempt to lead it. Well, I venture to say that if any hon. Gentleman opposite were to appeal to his constituents as to whether he should favour them with one of his speeches or go to the Derby, the answer would, in the large majority of cases, be an emphatic "Go to the Derby." Whether we approve or whether we deplore it, the fact remains that to-morrow the "flowing tide" will be towards Epsom. I venture to say that the prospects of the Session are by many less intelligently discussed than those of the racing season, that the withdrawal of a great Government measure would cause less excitement than the scratching of the favourite; and that, greatly as the country respects right hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench, the news that the whole of them were laid low by a severe attack of influenza would be received with a feeling mild in comparison with that which would be displayed if the horse which has been principally backed were to suffer from a mild attack of the same complaint. What makes hon. Members hang over the tape machine in the Telegraph Room, on which five pages out of six deals with racing matters? The present House of Commons is more popularly elected than any which has previously dealt with this question, and I do not think this House will be the first to break a time-honoured custom by refusing to adjourn for what is a national festival. Looking over the House I am at a loss to see where the opposition to my Motion is to come from. On the Front Government Bench, for instance, I see the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture. England expects that right hon.

Gentleman to be at the Derby, and in my own humble judgment it would be an act of inhuman cruelty to compel him to remain here answering questions as to the slaughter of foreign cattle at the port of embarkation at a moment when an heir of Hermit might be carrying off the racing honours of the year. Why, the dogs which he has muzzled would sympathise with him in his enforced absence from the Derby. I turn to the Front Opposition Bench, where the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) ought to be and is not. Perhaps he has anticipated the verdict and has already adjourned to Epsom, where he is as popular as in this House and in all the Law Courts of the Kingdom. I am quite sure the followers of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (Lord Hartington) will go to the Derby. I approach with greater diffidence that part of the House where the uncompromising champions of the rights of the people usually sit. I refer to those who follow the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). Surely it speaks volumes for the popularity of the great national racing event of the year when that hon. Member, who is always so jealous of the waste of public time, should, even when his own Party is in power, have moved the adjournment of the House over Derby Day. There is one other quarter, namely, that in which the Irish Members sit, by one of whom the adjournment of the House over Derby Day has before now been most ably moved. There is one Member to whom I look for support with much confidence, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). We have seen the phenomenal success of the Star placarded over the whole Metropolis. We have been taught to identify the success of the Star with the hon. Member. I do not wish to under-estimate the value of the picturesque-written leading articles in contributing to that success, nor yet his efforts to sweep out the "old gang" from power, nor yet his endeavours to raise the political, social, and moral tone of the working classes. But I would suggest that the success of the paper is due entirely to the excellence of its sporting information and to the racing prophecies of its turf correspondent, "Captain Coe."

Lord Elcho

I do not know whether "Captain Coe" is the name under which the hon. Member (Mr. O'Connor) goes racing; but I hope he will vote for the observance of a day, the phenomenal popularity of which has tended to his paper's "phenomenal success." If there had been any legislation of importance to come before the House to-morrow I should not have brought forward my Motion. There was a time, in 1882, when the House unanimously agreed not to bring forward that Motion, because the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was daily and hourly engaged in passing a measure for the preservation of peace and the maintenance of law and order in Ireland. But the right hon. Gentleman is not now engaged in the preservation of law and order in Ireland. Wednesday afternoon is the private Members' ewe lamb from which the rapacious hand of the First Lord of the Treasury has as yet been kept aloof, and if there were on the Paper one of those Motions which fill the House and the Lobbies and give so many gentlemen from the country an opportunity of seeing the Metropolis, I should not have moved my Motion. But there is not a single Member of the House—not even the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson)—who will maintain that if we sit to-morrow, one single Statute can by any possibility be added to our record at the end of the Session. It is true there is a Local Option Bill before the House to-morrow; but I think I am right in saying that its supporters are not in earnest about that Bill, but are looking forward to another fight on a different occasion. I think the hon. Member for Cockermouth himself wants rest. He has a heavy week before him, and he will have the demonstration in Hyde Park on Saturday. He surely will require a few days' rest to re-dress that old banner, and prepare that old speech for delivery. I move the Resolution because I believe that by granting it the House will be acting strictly in accordance with precedent, that in keeping a time-honoured custom they will not interfere with the course of any legislation, and that they will be giving an opportunity to many people of seeing the great race of the year. I know that hon. Members may go to the Derby or not as they like; but there are others who, though not Members of this House, have to remain in the House while it sits, and on their behalf I ask for the adjournment over the Derby Day on the grounds I have stated.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) rose to address the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member second the Motion?

SIR W. LAWSON resumed his seat.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday."—(Lord Elcho.)

(6.39.) SIR W. LAWSON: I believe this is the first opportunity the present Parliament has had of giving its decision on this question, and I am sure the Motion could not have been brought forward in a more able or agreeable manner. I do not see, however, that there was very much argument in the noble Lord's speech, and I am glad I looked back at the Debate which took place on the Motion for the Derby Day Adjournment in 1886. The Motion was then moved by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who said that anyone who opposed the Motion must be either a bad man, a crotchety man, or a Scotchman. I am not a Scotchman, but I may be a bad man, and I certainly am a crotchety man. The reason given by the Seconder of the Adjournment in 1886 was that it would give a holiday to the Irish Members, who were the most hardworking and deserving set of men that House. That was before they became criminal conspirators. The arguments generally used in favour of that Motion appear to be three—first, that horse racing is a noble sport; secondly, that it is a national sport; and, thirdly, that the Adjournment is a time-honoured custom. I do not think horse racing has anything very noble about it. I find it stated in a newspaper published a few years ago that a racecourse, or indeed a town where a meeting is being held, is a veritable Alsatia, where murderous ruffians break windows and wreck public houses, and which decent people cannot safely enter except armed and in bands. In fact, it is said it is positively dangerous for a well-dressed man to venture on a racecourse. That statement is made in Truth. That is the opinion of racing given by my leader. Now, I will give the opinion held by the late leader of the Tory Party. Lord Beaconsfield said in his last novel, speaking of a former time—

"The Turf at that period had not developed into the vast institution of national demoralisation which it now is."

That was some years ago; but no one who reads the newspapers can believe that the Turf has much improved between then and now. So much for the noble sport. Now, how about its being national? In one sense, no doubt, horse racing is a national sport—that is to say, it is very popular; but what is national is not always rational, and in my opinion, if the House takes a step of this kind, it ought to have the sanction of virtually the whole of the nation. I object to what I may call ecclesiastical adjournments for Saints' Days and so forth, simply because there are a large number of people who do not hold views in favour of them. On this question of racing, I think you would find that one-half of the nation would be against the proposal. Horse racing is most popular with the lowest and with the highest classes, with what Mr. Bright called the residuum and the aristocracy—with the dregs and with the scum of society. But notwithstanding that, I maintain that there are hundreds and thousands and millions of people, whose opinions are well worth considering, who strongly object to this sort of thing. Then it is said that the Derby is a time-honoured occasion. Well, the House of Commons, I believe, is about 700 years old; but this so-called time-honoured institution was only started about 43 years ago. From 1860 to 1879 the Adjournment for the Derby Day used regularly to be moved by the Minister of the day; but in the latter year, in the days of Sir S. Northcote—very much, I think, to his credit—this was given up, and after that the Motion fell into the hands of the small fry of the House of Commons, such as the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin), my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), and the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Sir H. Maxwell). I daily see in the newspapers and in the speeches of public men lamentations deep and solemn over the enormously increasing vice of gambling; but what is the use of it all if the House of Commons sets an example by giving its sanction to the greatest gambling day in the whole year? Let me read an extract which I obtained from the Manchester Guardian a little while ago:—

“Now one thing may be taken for granted. If all the Archbishops, Bishops, Incumbents, Curates, Ministers, Elders, Deacons, Missionaries, and District Visitors in existence were to devote their whole time to a combat with this evil they would effect nothing so long as the present facilities for gambling are afforded.”

It is in order to encourage one of these facilities that we are asked to adjourn to-morrow. The House is asked to give a sort of popular lesson and a national sanction to a system which is blighting and demoralising the body politic. Right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench have been stumping the country for the last fortnight like members of a Good Templar lodge, declaring that they are the greatest advocates and promoters and supporters of temperance the world has ever seen. I hope they are not going to make up for that zeal in the path of temperance by going a little astray in another direction. I remember a tale of a quaker gentleman, who was very much troubled on account of his coachman's free use of bad language, and who gave the man an old coat on his promising to try and reform. About a fortnight after the quaker said: “Well, John, and since I gave thee the coat hast thou altered thy bad manners.” The coachman replied, “Yes, Maister, I've given up swearing, but I've taken terribly to lying.” Do not let it be said that Ministers of the day having given up drinking, have taken to gambling. We have heard a great deal said about the congested state of business. There are eight most important Bills down for to-morrow. I will not read the titles of them all. I will only read the title of the one first on the list, and which will come on for discussion if the House meets. It is the Liquor Traffic Local Option Bill. I venture to say there are millions of people who are much more keen about that Bill than about what horse will win the Derby to-morrow. Let the noble Lord who has submitted the Motion go to the Derby. We can spare him. Let us do our duty in legislating for the masses of the people. We shall then be doing something far more creditable than taking this stupid, silly, vulgar step of adjourning the British House of Commons to go to a horse race.

(6.55.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I had intended to give a silent vote, but I wish to put my hon. Friend who has just sat down right in regard to my position on this question. It is true that I have made observations to the effect that there is considerable objection frequently to race meetings, but the objection which my hon. Friend cited ought really to dispose him to allow race meetings. I said I had observed that persons who went to race meetings were inclined to wreck public houses. I thought that the essence of the views of my hon. Friend was that in this matter he was a wrecker himself. The hon. Baronet seems to think there is a race meeting to-morrow at Epsom. There is simply a race meeting in name. There is an old-fashioned custom of going down at this season of the year to Epsom to welcome the summer solstice. The object is to enjoy the breezy air of the downs. It is true there is a race, amongst other amusements, but the race is a mere pretext. I speak from practical experience. I can assure my hon. Friend that the very last thing persons trouble about at Epsom is the Derby. I have been there frequently, and I really believe I never saw the Derby run in my life. This, Mr. Speaker, is a utilitarian age. We are always seeking to improve ourselves or somebody else. I regard this proposal to adjourn as a mere concession to the fact that people cannot go on improving themselves and others for ever, but must have some slight enjoyment. That is, I should say, the reason why this House has always adjourned on Derby Day. I can appeal to my hon. Friend for his vote on another ground. I support the Adjournment because I am in favour of temperance. The public houses and the downs are entirely antagonistic, and it seems to me most desirable to encourage the toiling thousands to go down to enjoy themselves on the downs at Epsom instead of soddening themselves in the public houses in London. My right hon. Friend may think there is a lot of drinking there. He is mistaken. I can assure him that there is not nearly so much drinking at Epsom as there is on Bank Holiday. People go down there not to drink but to amuse themselves. Let my hon. Friend go and look at any costermonger driving his family down. It is a glorious sight to witness, and when I see it I say to myself, "That man, instead of going into the public house, has been saving up his money in order to take himself, his wife, and the family down to the breezy downs; his example will encourage other persons to do likewise." Therefore, it is as an advocate of temperance, and as one desirous that temperance should prevail in this country, that I hope the House will by precedent and example encourage persons to go to the Derby.

(7.0.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): The hon. Member has informed us that, having been to the Derby several times, he has not seen it run. Under these circumstances I think the House will have very little faith in the temperance proclivities of the hon. Member. I must protest against the House of Commons adjourning for a race meeting. It is said that horse racing is a national sport, but if that be so, I deny that it is the chief national sport. Why should Parliament adjourn for a horse race any more than for a cricket match? There is now being played a very important international cricket match, and if the House adjourned for the Derby it ought to adjourn for an international cricket match. There is an important Bill down for to-morrow. The hon. Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) has recently interested a large number of Members in his support as temperance reformers, and I trust they will vote with him this evening for the rejection of the Motion. I earnestly hope that, for the dignity of this House, and in the interest of the business of the nation, we shall adopt a more dignified course than that of adjourning for the Derby.

(7.3.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I want to emphasise for the benefit of our constituents the contrast between the appearance of the House this afternoon and its appearance last night. We have had some excellent fooling this afternoon. I am not one of those who object to see hon. Members amuse themselves at the proper time and in the proper place, but this is not, in my opinion, a proper opportunity for spending time in jocular observations, or for passing a Motion of this kind with the connivance of the Government for the purpose of going fooling elsewhere. We are sent here for serious business; and yet, whilst last night we had to discuss the affairs of the Empire to empty Benches, to-night the House is crowded to listen to the jokes of the hon. Members for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson) and Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). We are about to enter on the discussion of one of the most important matters affecting the people of this country, namely, the Education Vote, and I shall be interested to see how many hon. Members on that side of the House will remain here to consider it. Gentlemen opposite have been proclaiming that they are the most zealous advocates of temperance, and I would remind them that to-morrow the first order on the Paper relates to a temperance measure, in which the constituencies take the most lively interest. Are we going to have any declaration from the Government for or against the Motion for Adjournment? If they are going to vote for it, I should like to know with what face they can continue their rampage throughout the country against us on the allegation that we are blocking business. If they vote for the Motion, they will deliberately place themselves in a position in which they can never again raise any cry of obstruction against us. If the Government refuse to give any sign as to what course they propose to take, I think the most decent thing they can do will be to walk out of the House.

(7.6.) MR. T. FRY (Darlington): I wish to move an Amendment, in order to test the sincerity of the Government in reference to the charge of waste of time. It is to leave out all the words after the word "that," in order to add "to-morrow Government business have precedence over all other orders of the day."

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to second that Amendment.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Amendment is out of order, as it is not relevant to the matter before the House.

(7.8.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I rise with great diffidence after listening to all the speeches which have been made, and I must express my sincere regret at the time which has been lost this afternoon, and the time which is proposed to be lost if this Resolution is adopted. What is proposed is that to-morrow, which ought to be placed at the disposal of private Members, should be given up to the study of horse racing. We have heard a great deal about horse racing this afternoon, but not a word has proceeded from the Members of Her Majesty's Government, who are now sitting on the Front Bench like a series of figures in the Chamber of Horrors at Madame Tussauds. The Government should certainly express some opinion on the Motion, and I think that some Member on the Front Opposition Bench might also express some opinion regarding it. I wish to ask Members opposite whether they prefer horse racing to doing the business of the country. Let the country judge between us. I certainly hope the Government and their supporters will be very properly condemned for their action in this matter, and for the general indifference they have displayed when matters of urgent public importance have come up for consideration in Committee of Supply. No doubt this evening we shall have an opportunity of seeing whether the supporters of the Government are in earnest, whether they care more for horse racing, for fooling, for amusement than for doing what they are sent to this House to do, namely, to attend to the business of the country.

(7.11.) The House divided:—Aye 160; Noes 133.—(Div. List, No. 115.) s

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—EDUCATION ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,182,224, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for Public Education in England and Wales, including Expenses of the Education Office in London."

Dr. Tanner

* (7.22.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am sure that I need scarcely ask for the attention of the Committee while I perform the three-fold task, first of moving the Educational Estimates for the current financial year; secondly, of giving some account of our stewardship at the Education Office in Whitehall, and reporting the progress we have made during the school year ending August 31, 1889; and thirdly, of giving in some detail an explanation of the New Code. In performing that task I do not propose to waste time in making any preliminary statement. Hon. Members are aware that increased attention has, during the last few years, been directed in this country to educational matters, and that that attention has been, as it were, focussed by the recent Report of the Royal Commission. It is perfectly true that although in the Estimates we shall be able to show that within the last few years there has been a gradual and a steady progress all along the line, yet both within and without the walls of this House there has been a growing dissatisfaction with the existing state of things. Now, what are our proposals, and what is the basis upon which we rest them? It is impossible for anyone to study the position of elementary education to-day, compared with what it was a few years ago, without coming to the conclusion that although we have attained a vast degree of efficiency in our national system of education, there is below the high-water mark of efficiency a vast number of schools which do not do us credit, and which, in fact, ought not to exist at all as they now are. What has been the chief basis upon which we have proposed to proceed in making the changes we have brought about? In what we have done, we have sought to raise the level of the weak schools, and thus to make our elementary schools more generally efficient. In dealing with this subject we were confronted with various difficulties, and one of the very first of them that met us was that of the qualification of our existing staff of teachers, and especially of our pupil teachers. That is a question of primary importance, and it is one of the first with which we had to deal in framing our New Code. Of course, in saying that, I must by no means be supposed to intend to cast a slur upon our present staff of teachers. I do not stand here as an advocate of the claims of the teachers. The teachers' record for the last 20 years is a great record. It is a record of continual improvement, not only as regards the general work they have done, but in the constant increase in the number of children in Standard IV. and upwards, and in the ratio that number bears to the number of children in the school. I should like to show by what means we propose to improve upon the existing Code, and what is the two-fold object we have in view. First, we deal with a fundamental part of the Code, the pupil teacher system. It has been advocated by many that the pupil teacher system should be abolished. We propose to strengthen the system as it exists. We propose to deal with pupil teachers by improving their training and, above all, by affording opportunities to leave their profession to all who are likely to fail as teachers. In this we are following the lines of the recommendation of the Royal Commission. Article 34 of the new Code lays down that

"The managers are bound to see that the pupil teacher is properly instructed during the engagement, and the Department if satisfied that this duty is neglected may decline to recognise any pupil teachers as members of the staff of a school under the same managers."

This throws upon managers the onus of giving efficient instruction to pupil teachers. In Article 41 we strengthen the successive tests to be applied to pupil teachers before the end of their term of engagement. It is laid down that the final examination of pupil teachers will be the Queen's scholarship examination, while they will have to produce the same certificates as under the old Code. Article 41 (g) is most important; it provides that "When a pupil teacher of the first, second, or third year is reported by the Inspector to have failed, the papers will be further revised in the Department before the result is communicated to the managers."

This will enable the Department to carry out the principle that these young people are not to continue to overburden the profession if they are unfit for it by allowing them to seek some other calling for which they are more fitted. Articles 47 and 48 improve the machinery of training, and Article 48 (d) lays down that "Candidates who fail twice to pass the Queen's scholarship examination may not be again examined."

Article 52 provides that pupil teachers who have obtained a place in the first class in the Queen's scholarship examination may be recognised as "provisionally certificated teachers," to whom, however, no certificate is issued. Here, again, we raise the standard of efficiency for provisionally certificated teachers, and put a much stronger test upon them. I call special attention to these details, because they are of the utmost importance. What we are anxious to do is gradually and surely to improve the standard of excellence in the teaching profession, beginning at the very foundation. We are anxious to secure that all aspiring to follow teaching as a profession shall be put through much more severe tests, and we further wish to prevent the profession from being overburdened by a number of teachers who are not likely to do credit to themselves or service to the State. On the same lines we propose to apply much more severe tests to certificated teachers. By Article 55—

"Candidates for certificates must be examined twice, and must undergo probation by actual service in school; " but teachers above 20 who are now employed will not be affected, and ample notice is given to all others. It may here be convenient to state that these changes are, one and all, prospective; we do not wish to give the least shadow of excuse for a grievance to any existing teacher or pupil teacher. In no sense are these changes intended to be retrospective in their operation. By Article 61 we again raise the standard of the test to be applied by providing that after the 1st of January, 1891, teachers will not be permitted to superintend pupil teachers unless they have in the examination in second year's papers been placed in the first or second division. By Article 62 we give another chance to teachers to be examined again for the qualification to superintend pupil teachers; and by Article 63 we require that, in order to obtain a parchment certificate, a teacher must, after passing the examination in second year's papers, obtain, while continuously engaged in one and the same school, two favourable Reports from an Inspector at two consecutive annual visits. One important change is that we do away altogether with written endorsements on certificates; we make no distinctions between them; we do not classify them; and the only distinction which will hereafter exist will be the right or otherwise to have the superintendence of pupil teachers. In dwelling upon these details my object is to show that, while we propose a vast change in our educational system, and ask Parliament to spend a much larger sum upon elementary education, so far as we are concerned, we are determined to begin our improvements at the very foundation of our system by raising the qualifications of teachers, and through them and by other means we give an increased impetus to our educational system. From this question of teachers I proceed to the most important and what I may call the vital change we make in the method of assessing grants. Here, again, we proceed upon lines which have been broadly and generally laid down by the Royal Commission. They recommended a fixed grant of 10s. We go further, and are more liberal. We propose to do away with the existing percentage grant, the old merit grant, and the old fixed grant, and to establish a fixed grant of 12s. 6d. or 14s. The principle on which the change will be worked will be this: that in future the grant will be paid only to an efficient school; and the conditions of efficiency are laid down in Articles 86, 98, and 101. If the conditions laid down are not fulfilled the Inspector must report that the school is inefficient, and the Department will issue a warning that, if improvement is not made, and if the school does not come up to the standard at the next examination, the school will be struck off the list. On the second adverse report 14 days will be allowed the managers to appeal: the matter will then be referred to the Chief Inspector; and then the school will be finally struck off the list, if the report is still adverse. The next question is, What are the steps to be taken to avoid this catastrophe? Here, I admit, lies the real gist of our scheme; if in this regard it breaks down, I admit that the catastrophe will be great, and also that an enormous responsibility will rest on those who advocate these reforms, and on those who are charged with the duty of carrying them out. We propose to enable these schools to attain to efficiency by a twofold process. We propose to improve the quality of the teaching staff, and at the same time to afford facilities to unfit teachers to withdraw from the profession. We also propose, by fixed grants and by freedom of classification, to tempt school managers to take a wider curriculum by introducing class subjects, and to add to and to improve the teaching staff for this purpose. There is one other fixed grant of 1s. or 1s. 6d. for discipline and organisation, and we put this fixed grant on precisely the same basis as the first grant. If any school should fail to obtain this grant it would be liable to be struck off the list. This grant will throw a further responsibility on managers, teachers, and all concerned. It will not be given to any extent, with reference to the teaching in elementary subjects; and as to discipline and organisation, the whole state of the school will come under the purview of the Inspector. There must be evidence of good moral teaching, and the school must be well found. How will the application of this grant affect schools in general? There are a large number of schools now obtaining 90 per cent. of passes which, under the new system, will not actually be monetary gainers by these changes. But there are other changes by which they will be gainers, and I think that under this new grant, and under the new method of assessing it, every school in England and Wales will be enabled to come up, at all events, to the maximum of the 17s. 6d. limit. Article 105 of the Code is of very great importance. It is the Article which deals with the small rural schools. As the Royal Commission pointed out, it is impossible for these schools to attain anything like efficiency in their present financial condition. We have taken the advice of the Royal Commission, and to all schools situated in a school district of which the population is below 500 we propose to give an extra grant of £10 per annum. This represents a very considerable sum, as our estimate of the number of such schools is 4,500. So that if each and all of these accept our challenge and come under the regulations under which we assess the grants we shall on this account ask for £45,000 per annum.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the average attendance in these schools?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have not the figures before me just now, but the right hon. Gentleman shall have them. Besides this lump sum which we propose to give, these schools will be able to earn a larger grant by becoming more efficient, and they will be able also to earn extra grants for efficiency in drawing and manual instruction. We are dealing in no niggardly spirit with these schools, and the question at once arises, "How are you going to secure their efficiency?" We hope that they will have an improved staff, and in Article 105 we press upon them the necessity of further staff enlargements. We incur a great responsibility in giving this money; but I think that we shall be able to bring such pressure to bear upon the managers and teachers as to make the schools quite efficient. As far as the Department is concerned, it is determined so to handle these schools as to bring them gradually and surely into line with the rest in the country. As to the question of the abolition of payment by results, there is much in the late system which has met with universal condemnation. It is, no doubt, true that the changes which we propose will give enormous relief to the teachers, and while they are not alone to be considered, yet education must advance with much longer and surer strides when we have a willing and contented profession. We are told that this new grant of 12s. 6d. is nothing but a merit grant in a new form; but I deny this. It will be worked by the Department as a fixed grant essentially. And if we have another grant of 14s., it is because we do not wish to reduce all schools to one dead level. In Article 92 (power to warn instead of withholding grants), the words "or a portion of the grant" occur. These words were not inserted in any sense to weaken the system under which this grant is to be assessed. They are merely to meet some emergency or some possible case where the managers have failed to comply with some minor requirement, and the Department does not feel justified in sweeping away the grant altogether.

But it will be the essence of the new principle that the schools will know what their financial means are exactly. We hope that the result of these changes in the administration of the assessment will be to bring relief all round. The managers and teachers will no longer feel bound by the old system of a monetary payment per head of the scholars. The Inspectors, we hope, will find that these reforms take away the drudgery of their work, and give them more time for chance inspections, enabling them to divide their time more in accordance with the requirements of the different schools. Then, as to freedom of classification, it is said that, according to the words of the Instruction, we propose to give a benefit with one hand and to take it away with the other. The words to which I refer are in paragraph 14 of Instructions to Inspectors. They have given a false impression abroad, and therefore we shall issue a Circular distinctly laying down the views of the Department. Under the present system the teacher may be induced to keep children in a particular standard longer than is desirable. This will be remedied under the new system. But we must take care that the privilege is not abused in its use, and we must therefore reserve to the Inspectors this right—that where the freedom of classification has been abused to the injury of schools they shall have the right to step in and stop it. There is another matter to which considerable reference has been made. We have resolved that recitation shall be retained, as from all the information we have been able to gather we find it would have a very adverse effect on the schools if you did away with the teaching of recitation. The Royal Commission strongly recommended that the children should have the advantage of learning by heart, and one of our Inspectors (Mr. Coward) speaks of recitation as a most valuable addition to the school curriculum.

"I was glad to see it made uniformly compulsory in the Code last year, because it affords the children an opportunity of storing up their minds with valuable information."

I come now to a very important part of our Code, namely, that relating to the school curriculum. It is true that we do not make much alteration in the curriculum as regards obligatory subjects, but we propose to make considerable changes with regard to class and extra subjects. In this matter, although I at one time held a different view, we have decided to adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and offer all elementary schools a large range of alternative courses in class subjects. I have already alluded to the extra time which will be afforded, and I trust one of the first advantages of that will be a large extension of the class and extra subjects as part of our elementary school system. We hope further, by means of this extended curriculum, to make school life more attractive and to abolish cram. We hope to popularise our schools and to make them more attractive places altogether than they are at present. We also hope by this extended curriculum to supply scholars with a special form of knowledge which will be useful to them in their own localities and at their own doors. We offer a complete syllabus for elementary science and another for history, while with regard to English we give five courses. In geography we give one original course and two alternative courses. In elementary science in Class "D" there are introduced into the curriculum important changes in regard to agricultural teaching. I consider that this question of agricultural teaching in our schools is one which has been far too long neglected in the rural districts, and that the changes we have made will tend to popularise this class of instruction. I have detailed to the Committee the generous and liberal manner in which Parliament is to be asked to consent to our dealing with this matter. I know that grave responsibility rests with the Department, but I fully accept it, and I hope we shall be able to find some means of inducing school managers to consent to teach these class subjects. I believe the new system we are promulgating will be found generally acceptable, and I trust that in time the effect will be seen of the liberal grants we offer. In regard to teaching cookery to girls, I may mention that in consequence of our exertions the girls who learned cookery in 1889 showed an increase of 36 per cent. in that year, and that being the case I see no reason why, with a more complete system, the increase another year should not be 50 per cent. We all know how desirable it is in the present state of agriculture that children should be taught matters relating to agriculture. They ought to learn many things about plant and insect life. I live in a fruit-growing district, where we have been subject to the most fearful devastation by caterpillars. At one time growers put it all down to the influence of the East wind; but now they have discovered that it was due to the ravages of insects, and hon. Members who pass through a fruit plantation will notice a belt of glutinous substance around the trees, which insects cannot pass over. With regard to specific subjects, if hon. Members will turn to Article 15, they will find that considerable changes have been made. It will be found that the Government have met the demand which has been made on them by the Welsh Members, and have given facilities for bi-lingual teaching in Welsh schools for the special purpose of relieving them of disabilities which undoubtedly existed, and which deprived their scholars of the same chances of success as children in English schools. Then we have introduced for the first time the teaching of German and shorthand, which may be said to apply to commercial education. Bookkeeping and physical training are also introduced for the first time, and navigation has also been introduced. With regard to cookery, it has been arranged that an Inspectress shall be appointed for this subject. In the evening schools a shorter number of hours will be allowed for teaching cookery, and for the first time, again, the teaching of laundry work will be introduced into the elementary schools. I have no doubt that those subjects of cookery and laundry work will prove very popular; they are most important matters, and will most beneficially affect the comfort of the whole of the working population of the country. Another matter of importance is that of the compulsory teaching of drawing and manual instruction. Many fears have been expressed with reference to this point, but it is not intended to make drawing compulsory at once; it can scarcely be done, and the process must be gradual. During the last two years, and since the last change was made, great progress had been made with regard to the teaching of drawing. In the year ending March, 1889, drawing was taught in 3,700 schools to 845,000 children, while in the year ending 1890 it was taught in 4,466 schools to 1,019,000 children, which showed a considerable advance. During the last two months, also, 233 schools have been added to the list. As I have stated, it is not intended to make the teaching of drawing compulsory at once; but I can assure hon. Members that the Department are very earnest in the matter, and it is hoped that before many years have passed there will be very few schools in which drawing is not taught. Something like agreement has now been come to as to the opinion that drawing and manual instruction shall be combined. I think it would be wrong to introduce a compulsory system in regard to such a matter. In this connection I should like to quote the recommendations of the late Commission on Technical Education with regard to manual instruction and drawing. In the first place, it is recommended that manual instruction should be given as far as possible out of school hours. With regard to that we think it right to agree to this, I do not say in all cases, but in some at all events. The Commissioners then say:—

“Whenever more attention shall be given to drawing, and especially to mechanical drawing, in the ordinary and higher elementary schools, it will be proper and desirable that the manual work should be executed from drawings prepared by the children themselves.”

That system we propose to proceed upon on starting; we wish to test it. Some people scoff at this system of teaching; but it is one of great importance, and our object in making these new departures is to cultivate the general intelligence of the child. In regard to manual instruction, then, we propose to ally it with drawing as much as possible, and to give opportunities to our scholars to enable them to draw from the solid. We also now propose to give a grant for manual instruction. We think it important that a grant should be given for it, and I think we shall give it on some system which will nearly approach half the cost. That grant will be outside the 17s. 6d. limit, and on precisely the same system as the present grant from the Science and Art Department. Before I leave the proposals which I am now making to the Committee, I should like to remark that they practically carry us into smooth water with regard to technical education, for I venture to urge that, practically, these proposals, coupled with our Act of last Session, will develop until they cover the whole ground of technical education. In respect to evening schools, there, again, we propose to make a great change. Not only Bills that have been laid on the Table of the House, but also discussions that we have had, go to show that in this House there is complete unanimity with reference to evening continuation schools; and when I state that we propose practically to establish such schools, I presume that not a single hon. Member will vote against the proposal. There can be no question, then, that this proposal meets with universal approval. Some of the Inspectors have expressed their opinions on this matter. Mr. Coward, whom I have previously quoted on another important matter, says—

“I come now to the subject of evening schools. I regret that I have no statistics to offer for the division to indicate what progress (if any) is being made. Not much, I fancy, from the little information that has reached me. These schools are the continuation schools of the day, and any large development of such schools must, it seems to me, spring from the extension and organisation of the evening school system.”

Mr. Sharpe says—

“The recreative evening classes have been successful both in creating interest and higher instruction; but they can avail themselves only to a very limited extent of the benefits of inspection, owing to the necessity under the present Code of presenting all the scholars in the three R's before they can be presented in any other subject. The chief demand in these classes appears to be for bookkeeping, shorthand, and French, and for any subject that may be useful in the scholar's line of life.”

We propose to do away with the limitation which is here referred to. We propose, it is true, to put a certain test to every scholar, and there, I hope, I shall be upheld by the general opinion of hon. Members that it is absurd to establish continuation schools for scholars who are not grounded in elementary matters. I will not go at any length into this subject, but it is one which goes to the very heart of our social system; and, when we come to discuss the question in a practical way, it is surprising to see how sleepy and how backward we have been in this respect, in spending millions upon education minus these continuation schools. Worse than all, the lad who is injured most under the present system is very often the sharpest; the one who has passed the standards of education the quickest. A boy of this description in a large town has often a bad chance at home, and he is pitched into the streets, with all the dangers of contamination there, during the huge gap that exists between the time that he gets through the standards and obtains occupation. We do not wish in the future with our continuation schools to shut out voluntary efforts such as those of the Recreative Evening School Society and other societies, and we think that, with proper care and inspection, we shall be able to follow out a system by which voluntary bodies who wish to carry out a proper form of amusement shall be allowed to do so as long as it is supplemented by one hour of solid work. We feel strongly that we cannot bring compulsion to bear with regard to these evening schools, and, therefore, we must make them attractive. Now, with regard to the change as to the staff, I have no doubt that it will be urged that we have not done enough; but we make a new starting point. I know that there are scarcely any good schools which are not staffed up to the requirement; but we are raising the minimum requirement, and, therefore, we hope that this improvement, though it may not satisfy all our critics, will materially raise the condition of the staff in most of our schools. With regard to day training colleges, I know that I shall be told that the recognition of only 200 students as Queen's scholars is not enough; but we propose, at all events, to add another 200 next year. With regard to this matter, I would invite free and frank discussion. It is avowedly an experiment, and is capable of expansion. I have been much pressed by Members from Lancashire and Yorkshire with regard to our present system of half-time, and many teachers have asked for more lenient treatment in this direction. There is no doubt that our half-timers have done splendid work in our schools, and I think that, in dealing with the question of technical education, there is no better argument than the quickness and thoroughness with which half-timers do their work, and it is because they are receiving what is really technical education at the same time. If I am asked to deal with this question, I say that I shall be prepared to do nothing which will destroy this splendid record of work done by half-timers; but there are many points which I admit may be dealt with more leniently; and the Department propose to issue a circular which I believe will give general satisfaction to teachers, and will also give assistance to the half-timers. Though I do not suggest that the new Code is perfect or incapable of improvement, I submit with confidence to the Committee that if it is put to the test its main provisions will live for many years as a benefit to the education of the future. I should now like to give a short statement of our educational work during the last year. The sum granted for expenditure for the financial year ending March 31, 1890, amounted to £3,684,339, and the sum expended was £3,684,264, showing a saving on the year's expenses of £75. That is running it very close. The sum voted for annual grants for day and evening scholars was £3,323,903, and the expenditure £3,326,328, or an excess of £2,425. This excess represents the increased grant paid per scholar of 17s. 10d., or 1½d. per head. With regard to the estimates for the year 1890-91 the figures are based upon the existing Code; therefore, of course, if the new Code comes into operation there will no doubt be a supplementary estimate in connection with that Code. The sum required under the existing Code amounts to £3,782,224, being an increase of £97,885 over last estimates. The annual grants for day and evening scholars are estimated at £3,418,366, being an increase of £94,463. This increase is accounted for by an increase of 45,000 in the average attendance, and an increase of 3½d. in the rate of the grant per day scholar. Allowance is also made for an increase of 4,230 in the average attendance at evening schools, and of 5d. in the rate of grant per scholar. This comparison is, strictly speaking, one of estimates only, because in regard to actual results a considerable discrepancy is shown. In the day schools when I look to the liberality, not only of voluntary, but Board schools, I have hopes that under our new system we shall be able to make our school life more popular and attractive, and so to fill up the large gaps which now exist in the numbers who ought to be in regular attendance. I should like to give a few figures with reference to the cost of maintenance per scholar in average attendance. In the Board schools the cost was £2 4s. 6½d., as against £2 4s. 7½d. in the previous year, a decrease of 1d.; and in the voluntary schools £1 16s. 4d., as compared with £1 16s. 4½d. in the previous year, a decrease of ½d. In the Board schools outside London the cost was £1 19s. 7½d., as against £1 19s. 8d., a decrease of ½d., and in the voluntary schools £1 15s. 9½d., as compared with £1 15s. 8½d. in the previous year, an increase of 1d. In the Metropolitan Board schools the cost was £2 19s. 8½d., as against £3 0s. 6½d., and in the Metropolitan voluntary schools £2 3s. 7½d., as compared with £2 4s. 1½d. in the previous year. And now, in conclusion, I have only to plead for the proposals I have placed before the Committee that consideration which the importance of the subject deserves, and although when next Session arrives we may find ourselves in regard to this great question perhaps in troubled waters, for pity's sake let us, while we are in smooth water, endeavour to steer this ship safe into harbour! If hon. Members approach our proposals in a fair and candid spirit, and if they will for the present, at all events, thrust aside all Party and sectarian feeling, I believe we may be enabled to give effect to a scheme by which we shall secure a vast improvement in our educational system and raise the young lives committed to our keeping to be a God-fearing, industrious race, no unworthy citizens of a great Empire. (9.0.) *(9.26.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman in his remarks upon the Education Estimates for the year, the interest at the present time, both inside and outside the House, to whose attention is turned educational matters, centres upon the new Code. I am quite sure that on this side there is every desire to deal with the Code in an impartial spirit, with an absence of Party feeling, and any criticisms offered will be made in no unfriendly spirit. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon being fortunate enough to hold office at a time ripe for the introduction of this reform.

(9.27.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.30.) MR. BUXTON: I was congratulating the right hon. Gentleman upon his patience in having waited for the time when there was a fair opportunity of introducing a thorough reform in our educational system, instead of proceeding by small instalments on different recommendations of the Royal Commission. Everyone in the House must feel that the right hon. Gentleman has done what he could to carry out what is in some ways a revolutionary reform in the educational system. This Code, I am sure, has a happier prospect than the Code of last year, because the opposition to the Code of last year has been practically bought off by certain educational concessions. In the first place, the fact that the proposals in regard to accommodation are not to be retrospective is a concession to hon. Members on the other side. The remarks of the President of the Council in another place, and of the leader of this House, with reference to the question of the 17s. 6d. limit, and the rating of voluntary schools, has given heart to those interested in the voluntary system; and they believe that, in connection with the system of assisted education, which we expect will be introduced next Session, the 17s. 6d. limitation will be removed, and thus voluntary schools will be much benefited. I objected to the motives which actuated those who opposed the Code of last year, and deplored the effect of that opposition in the withdrawal of that Code, yet the delay has had its advantages, for this Code is, in many respects, a better one than the Draft Code of last Session. It is simpler in its nature; and it strikes a heavier blow at the payment by results system, inasmuch as it provides two fixed grants instead of three. It gives greater elasticity in the curriculum; it gives teachers more freedom in classification; and, in many respects, it adds greatly to the training and efficiency of teachers. The Code we are now discussing would, however, perhaps, be better compared with the state of things that has existed for the last 30 years than with the Code of last year, and, if that is done, it will be found that it effects what is practically a revolution in our educational system. In that portion of the Code which deals with children in infant schools, the change is not so great as some of us hoped for; it is far more a change in name than a change in nature. But in regard to the elder children, we have provision made for what, I hope, is the final abolition of the pernicious system of percentage payments, and of individual examination as the basis of the grant. Again, we understand that the pecuniary position of a school shall no longer depend on an examination upon one day. That is a very great reform indeed. The new system will give greater financial stability to the schools, and will take much worry from the teachers and all connected with schools. I cordially agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the teachers are not alone to be considered, and rejoice that while they are to receive a liberty in the school which they have not enjoyed before, the Inspectors are to recover the liberty they lost under the Code of Mr. Lowe. They are no longer to enter the schools as mere grant calculators, but are to exercise that individual judgment and responsibility of which they have so long been deprived. With the main provisions of the Code I think we shall all agree. I do not desire to criticise the Code in an unfriendly spirit, but merely in the desire to elicit information, and to see whether it cannot in some respects be improved. I think it would have been better if the right hon. Gentleman had seen his way to carry out the proposition which was practically accepted by the Government the other night, that there should be one fixed grant, to include not only elementary subjects, but class subjects as well. It would also, in my opinion, have been better if the one fixed grant had included what is called the "moral tone" of the school. I think we shall all rejoice that the right hon. Gentleman has accepted the proposition of the Commissioners that special care should be taken to direct the attention of Inspectors to the moral tone, discipline, obedience, cleanliness, truthfulness, and general character of the children, but I confess this proposal becomes a little ridiculous when we find that a grant of 1s. is to be given for a sort of minimum moral tone, and eighteenpence for a superior moral tone in the school. It would be better, I think, to have had this included in the one fixed grant, and to let the Inspector report upon it in his General Report. If the system of a fixed grant is to prevail, it can only be carried out properly and efficiently if it is clearly understood that in the future its assessment is not to depend on the examination of one day only, but that the casual visits of the Inspectors shall form an important item in the assessment of the grants. I think that what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the classification of children will be accepted with great pleasure and satisfaction. I understand that a supplementary Minute is to be issued, which will clear up the ambiguity of the Instructions, and provide that teachers and managers shall have a full and absolute power of classification in their schools, as they think best, according to the ability and attainments of the children and irrespective of age. This will be of great advantage, and will prevent much of the over-pressure arising from the bad system that has hitherto prevailed. We are glad to find from the Code that managers in the future are to have a full choice of the class subjects to be taken in individual schools. From both sides of the House there have over and over again been protests against the system, which has so long prevailed in the Department, of making grammar compulsory as a first subject, and not allowing full freedom of choice to managers and teachers. I think we shall find, now that history, geography, and science may be chosen equally with grammar that these subjects will be taken, in preference to the most objectionable class subject of grammar. Recently the London School Board published the results of their inquiries among 750 departments of boys' and girls' schools as to the preference of the teachers in the matter of class subjects. In three instances only did the teachers declare a preference for grammar; while no less than 421 declared grammar to be to them the least attractive and useful subject. Yet this is the subject the Department has been forcing down the throats of the children all these years. Again, as to the subject of manual instruction, I am glad to hear that it is proposed to give special grants to encourage that subject. The right hon. Gentleman has truly said that that will be a great step towards extending technical instruction. By far the most interesting question, however, in connection with the Code is, how will this new fixed grant work, and what will be the result of the introduction of these additional grants? I think we shall all agree that the abolition of the old system of percentages will do a great deal to humanise and improve the instruction given in our schools; and by making it more attractive, improve both the regularity and the age of attendance. But we want to be sure that while good results will follow from the reforms of the right hon. Gentleman the institution of the fixed grants, and the mode in which they are to be carried out, will not tend to lower the standard of education; that they will not be used to bolster up inefficient schools, or go to relieve the pockets of the subscribers to the voluntary schools. I have every confidence that the Department have a bond fide desire that the new Code should represent no retrograde step, but a step forward educationally all round. But I am sorry to say some words which fell from the President of the Council in another place the other day arouses a little suspicion of the real intention of some of those who are specially interested in educational matters. The noble Lord said he could not help thinking that the people of this country would, before long, begin to ask whether they were not paying too much for education when it was observed that a "very useful education" could be obtained for £1 16s. 6d. per head, which, in other cases, cost the country £3 10s. The noble Lord further hoped that this subject would engage the attention of both Houses of Parliament. This comparison reminds me of the wine merchant's advertisement, which offers for 36s. 6d. a dozen a champagne as sound and wholesome as that for which elsewhere we pay 70s.? But I quote these words as showing to a certain extent the tendency in the minds of those who specially represent the voluntary system. The right hon. Gentleman has omitted from his speech one important point affecting the whole matter. He has failed to state how these new grants will work in regard to the poorer schools; how much per head these schools will receive; and he has also omitted to give a general estimate of the amount that the new Code will probably add to our Educational Estimates. I am quite sure no Member of the House will grudge any addition to those Estimates if good educational results are obtained for the money; and I believe, after careful consideration, that the increase involved will be little short of £200,000 a year additional. If that money is voted we shall want some security that it is properly spent. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of what he called poorer schools; does he mean those schools which are in poor neighbourhoods and where the fees are low, where the inhabitants are poor and subscriptions difficult to obtain, or does he mean schools that are poor because they are badly supported by those who ought to subscribe to their maintenance; schools, in short, which, from the fact of their not being properly supported, show there is no bond fide demand for them? How is the right hon. Gentleman going to insist that for this additional grant of money, this additional bonus to the poorer schools, we shall receive proportionate results? How is he going to ensure that the whole of the additional money shall go to increase the efficiency of the schools, and not in substitution merely of present voluntary subscriptions? The original object of the State in aiding voluntary schools was to stimulate local effort, but, unfortunately, the result has been in an exactly opposite direction. The additional grants from the State have merely resulted to a large extent in a diminution of voluntary subscriptions. ["No, no."] I would point out to the hon. Member who disputes that assertion that the President of the Council, speaking on this very subject last year in another place, said that—

"Voluntary efforts had gone down since the 17s. 6d. limit was given, and, therefore, if funds were lavished without by means of hard and fast lines securing efficiency, the money would go to the relief of the pockets of the subscribers, and not to the efficiency of the schools."

Reference to the Blue Books will confirm the remarks of his Lordship, and will show that in the Church of England schools, while the grants have increased since the 17s. 6d. limit was introduced, the amount of voluntary subscriptions per head have at the same time greatly fallen off—the grants having increased by 4s. 10d. per head, and the fees by 9d., while the voluntary subscriptions have fallen by over 2s. per head—so that the practical result of the increased grants has been that about one-half only has gone to promote the efficiency of the schools, and the other half has gone to relieve the pockets of subscribers. We have been told that the 17s. 6d. limit is to be removed next year in connection with assisted education. The result of that state of things, in connection with this new Code, will be that, unless some stringent means are taken to prevent the new grants from going to relieve the voluntary subscriptions, those voluntary schools will in a vast number of cases become such only in name. I should not much deplore that result, because I believe that under such a system as that, the public would enter an irresistible demand for some voice in the management of the schools, if they are called upon to pay so much additional money to them. But what guarantee does the Code give that the schools will be brought up to a proper state of efficiency, and that the “vast number of schools that do not do us credit,” of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, will be made creditable or extinguished? I ventured to urge the other night, and I repeat, that in connection with any fixed grant, such as that proposed, it is necessary that the standards of suitability and efficiency of the schools should be raised. We ought to insist also that every school shall be under a proper body of managers. I am not speaking of representative managers, but of private managers. Too many voluntary schools are at present under no managers at all; they are practically farmed out to the teacher, and though the new Code states that a school shall not be farmed out, it does not insist that there shall be a proper body of managers, or that the teacher shall not practically manage the school and be responsible for what is done in it. Then the condition precedent to such proposals as are made, and to such a large extension of grants to schools, should be a provision upon an increased standard of suitability of building, sufficient efficiency of staff, and curriculum. It is time that a downward should be made with regard to the suitability of the buildings, as allotted to the children, and insisted on as necessary for them. It should be also insisted on for voluntary schools. As Schedule 7 in the Appendix it is stated, in reference to point, that “sanitary laws at a school as in a hospital,” the hon. Gentleman proposes to number of schools of a more character to continue over does not insist that they should be brought up to a proper state of affairs. No one wishes to insist on a certain square feet of space per child at the present limit, should be applied immediately, but I certainly think that a statement ought to be made in that direction in existing legislation. I congratulate the right hon. man on the fact that the result of his exertions will be an increase in the efficiency of individual schools. Unfortunately, the Code does little to increase the staff of teachers, and yet this was a point on which both the majority and the minority of the Royal Commission most strongly insisted. The Commission report on a considerable addition to the staff, but the right hon. Gentleman says little or nothing in his Code in connection with that recommendation. As to the question of curriculum, that, so far as optional subjects are concerned, the Code is an improvement on its predecessors. As to obligatory subjects, however, it falls far short of what is required. It includes only English, arithmetic, and drawing and needlework. Here, again, all that has been agreed that it is essential that the standards should be raised above the present level. The right hon. Gentleman says that a school should obtain the minimum of 13s. 6d., including the drawing and needlework, even if it only teaches English and drawing and needlework. It may be necessary in some rural schools, but to minimum examinations in our ordinary schools should at the very least include one class subject. With such a low standard of efficiency, much will depend on the administration by the Department, whether schools are kept up to the mark. I have grave doubts, whether, under present auspices the Department will have the strength of mind to extinguish schools not really efficient. It is essential that if a school does not come up to the low standard fixed by the right hon. Gentleman it should not receive the grant. [Sir W. HART DYKE: Hear, hear.]

The right hon. Gentleman says "Hear, hear;" but I am afraid he will find it is not quite so easy as he expects—at all events, as long as he sits on those Benches, and the same hon. Members sit behind him. It would be a different thing altogether if some right hon. Gentleman now on the Front Opposition Bench were sitting on that side. Appeals will be made to the right hon. Gentleman ad misericordiam; and it will be strongly urged upon him, that if particular schools are extinguished their places will be taken by the hated Board schools, and it will require great strength of mind on his part to resist these appeals. The right hon. Gentleman cannot do everything at once; but I think we may give him fair warning that, as far as we are concerned, we shall not be content to allow continued overcrowding, continued under-staffing, and a miserable and stunted curriculum. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the Code, which I believe will do much for education. Although I think it is in some respects inadequate, I desire to give the right hon. Gentleman full credit for having done more for our elementary education than any Minister, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Forster, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will continue in the course he has so well begun.

*(10.8.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcestershire, Evesham): I desire to join in the congratulations to the Vice President of the Council on the able and satisfactory statement which he has made. I am certainly about to offer a few criticisms upon the new Code. Indeed, it is hardly of any use for independent Members to be here unless they criticise. But still I shall imitate the example of the hon.

Mr. Buxton

Gentleman who has just sat down, in approaching the Code in the most friendly spirit. I cordially acknowledge that it has already attained great popularity in educational circles. I desire at the outset to acknowledge the popular improvements in regard to evening classes, manual and technical instruction, the relaxation of several conditions, which in the last Code alarmed the voluntary schools, the improvement in respect of pupil teachers, the division of schools into two classes, efficient and non-efficient, the comprehensive provision which is entrusted to the Inspectors under the head of discipline, the singular privileges granted to poor country schools—and to rural schools in constituencies such as that which I represent—and the benefits conferred by Articles 102 to 105 of the Code, which will long be considered as embodying the Magna Charta of those schools, the grant for practical science outside the 17s. 6d. limit, and the relief all round to pupils, teachers, and managers. Lastly, of course, I acknowledge the progress, I might almost say the giant strides, which have been made by my right hon. Friend for the attainment of those two objects which are nearest and dearest to the hearts of all educationalists, namely, the abolition of payment by results (by individual examination), and the entire freedom of classification. I admit my right hon. Friend has gone far in that direction, though I cannot say, as a practical man, that he has gone far enough or reached the goal which he apparently hopes he will attain. I have heard it said by some educationalists that under a strict system of administration the collar might be kept almost as tight on the neck of the schools with respect to payment by results by the new Code as by the old. That is certainly an exaggerated expression, but we who are engaged in the work and wear the shoe know where the pinch is. With respect to what the hon. Member for Poplar said as to there being danger lest the advantages conferred on voluntary schools should be made use of for the purpose of saving the pockets of subscribers, I should answer in general terms that all such abuse is guarded against by the functions entrusted to Her Majesty's Inspectors. Everything will depend upon the Inspector's Report. He is bound to see that the bounty of the State is properly used. If the Report is unfavourable it will carry grave consequences to the school. Undoubtedly the system which is now inaugurated by my right hon. Friend does impose responsibilities on Inspectors, but they are thoroughly well able to bear that burden. I now approach the two subjects I wish to criticise. First, as to payment by results. The schools will be by the new Code divided into grades according to merit. In infant schools there will be two such grades. Even with the discipline grant there will be two grades. So with the 12s. 6d. and 14s. grants, there are virtually two grades of day schools for elementary subjects. This tends to individual examination to determine the grades, and this tendency is strengthened by paragraph 12 of the Instructions to Inspectors. Then paragraph 23 of the Instructions regarding arithmetic amounts to individual examination. There are to be separate grants for class subjects, needle work, and singing, but all the various grades and such grants must necessitate a great deal of individual examination. I do not think they will necessitate such examination all round, but they will cause a great deal of it, and, to a considerable extent, keep up the system of examination which my right hon. Friend has very properly denounced this afternoon. I need not now labour this point, having recently (9th May) addressed the House fully on this subject. But, as regards examination, I desire it to be understood that there is no fear on the part of educationalists of examination as such. We quite understand that there must be examination occasionally and casually of scholars, according to circumstances. It is the individual examination all round, as a test for the grant, that we so strongly deprecate. We desire that the Inspector should see the teacher examine the scholars. We have no fear so long as they are examined in the subjects which they have been taught, and by a person who understands the teaching. Of course, any scholar is liable to be examined, and the knowledge of this liability has a wholesome effect. As regards this point, I need scarcely advert to Article 92, which says that a portion of the grant may be withheld. That has been admitted by my right hon. Friend to be open to objection. Why? It is open to this objection, that the grant may be withheld from the very school that needs it most, that an inefficient school will be rendered permanently inefficient by having its grant partially taken away. Such a school should receive the grant in full, so that it may have the financial means of rendering itself efficient; otherwise its inefficiency will be established. We wish to make schools efficient by giving them the means to render themselves so under the penalty of being extinguished if they fail. Secondly, I desire to offer a few remarks upon the question of freedom of classification. That is a subject upon which educationalists feel the gravest anxiety. I admit that very much has been done in this direction by the new Code, but not nearly enough. Article 101 of the new Code has two clauses, each one of which prescribes that every student must be advanced one standard per annum. That destroys all freedom of classification. There will be no such thing as freedom of classification so long as those two clauses remain in the Code. What is the cause of the commonly-observed phenomenon that in every class certain scholars are below the mark? It is because they were of necessity advanced into the standard. Children cannot earn the grant two years running in the same standard, and the consequence is, they are made to go on from standard to standard year by year. For the same reason every class has some scholars above the mark, who might have been pushed on had it not been for the one-standard-per-annum-system. This I submitted to the House in my speech of 9th May, showing that in every class one quarter is above and one quarter below the mark, leaving only the remaining half at the average level. The same tendency exists in the new Code. Such, also, is the effect of paragraph 5 of the Instructions. That paragraph relates to backward children being kept in the class where they are. If they are so kept grave reasons must be stated and recorded. That, of course, is a check upon the teacher. He has to show the reasons to the Inspectors, who may, or may not, approve, and the consequence is the teacher will hesitate to adopt the system. Again, paragraph 14 of the Instructions relates to separate classifications of scholars for examination in different subjects. It is stated that such cases must be very rare. That clearly indicates to the teachers that they are not to adopt this plan unreservedly. I understand my right hon. Friend will issue some Circular explaining the point. I suggest that the simplest and the shortest course would be to omit this objectionable paragraph. Whether my right hon. Friend is or is not able to modify the Code as regards the payment by results on examination, I earnestly entreat him to look favourably upon the suggestions we made with respect to the freedom of classification. If he will do something more in this Code in this respect he will earn additional gratitude. We hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to simplify the grants still further, to amalgamate the 12s. 6d. and the 14s. grants, and the disciplinary grant, and the grant for class subjects, needle work, and singing, all into one grant, and then entrust the rest to that most trustworthy class of men, Her Majesty's Inspectors. That is the goal at which we, who are engaged in educational work, aim, so that we shall not have individual examination all round in any subject except the specific subjects which are beyond the elementary subjects, beyond all class subjects, relating only, as they do, to special branches of literature, languages, science, and art. But if that cannot be done I entreat my right hon. Friend to do what little he can, even at this eleventh hour, to make the boon of freedom of classification absolute, unconditional, and complete, and so earn the gratitude of all men who are doing the work of education in this country. I need not dwell on the desirability of the School Accounts being subject to public audit without being published. But I ought to say a few words upon the question of trained and untrained teachers. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that Articles 31 and 73 in the Code recognise a difference between these two classes of teachers. In the first place, Article 31 speaks of two categories, trained and untrained, and Article 73 makes a trained teacher count for 70 scholars, and an untrained teacher for 60 scholars. This distinction is grievously felt by a very large and important and experienced class of teachers who are called untrained. Moreover, the retention of this nomenclature is felt to be most unfair to the untrained teachers. What does it really mean? One would suppose that there is some grave distinction between the two classes, but this is not the case. The distinction is of a very narrow and technical character. A trained teacher is one who has been through a training college, while an untrained teacher is one who has been trained outside the colleges. But the so-called untrained teacher has passed the same examinations and has obtained the same certificate, and perhaps has had larger and longer experience than the so-called trained teacher. The reason for there being untrained teachers is that we have not had training colleges for all the candidates. We still have not enough. I reckon that about 2,500 teachers are required every year to fill up the gaps in our national service of education, but the training colleges can only turn out 1,500 annually. That leaves a residue of 1,000. The difficulty was far greater in former years. Considering that our untrained teachers are often untrained through no fault of their own, considering that they have the same qualifications, the same examinations, and as long, if not longer, experience, I say it is not quite fair to them to perpetuate this invidious distinction, especially as it is marked by words which will carry an unfavourable impression outside. We ought to abolish the terms trained and untrained and substitute something else. But, at all events, it is very hard upon managers that a trained teacher, perhaps a young man fresh from college, should count for 70 scholars, while an untrained man, who perhaps has done yeoman educational work, should count for 60 only. I am extremely obliged to the Committee for having listened to the criticisms I have felt it my duty to make. There are some verbal Amendments standing in my name which would give full effect to the Resolution I had the honour to submit to the House the other day, and which, in general terms, my right hon. Friend accepted. Whether I really propose those Amendments depends upon whether I am able to obtain some concessions from my right hon. Friend. But as I resume my seat I ought to notice the allusions my right hon. Friend made to the school maintenance charges under the School Board for London. Of course, I, for one, quite admit that they are too high, and so I declared in my recent Financial Report to the Board. Nobody is better aware than I am of the great strides which have been made in educational progress, but when we recollect what Mr. Forster said as to the school rate I think we must consider the present expenditure as going beyond the limits which the ratepayers had a right to anticipate. How long this annual progress of educational taxation will be continued and tolerated I cannot say, for that is a question for those who elect the Board, but I must add that although the expenses are high the efficiency is high also. I can only express my admiration of the truly magnificent work which has been done as at least being a return in part for the expenses which are incurred.

(10.34.) SIR H. E. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I desire to express satisfaction and to thank the Vice President of the Council for having for the first time carried out some of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Technical Education, on which I had the honour to serve, and I wish to assure the right hon. Gentleman that we welcome his proposals to give a grant for manual instruction. That does not appear in the Code, but we have learned with great satisfaction that the grant will be made for this most important new form of hand and eye training. I am also particularly pleased to find that the right hon. Gentleman has taken to heart the recommendation of the Commission that drawing and manual instruction should go together. We have now in this Code laid that foundation for technical instruction which many of us have been, for some time, hoping might be laid, and I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman most heartily on having accomplished so much. It appears that drawing is not to be made compulsory in all classes, but it is very important to know what are the instructions given to the Inspectors as to the exceptions to drawing in elementary schools. It is gratifying to find that already great progress has been made in the direction of technical instruction in the larger towns, and I am sure we may look forward with great hope to increased progress in this matter. Of the importance of the introduction of elementary science the Committee is well aware, and in the present Code the Vice President has done much to assist the teaching of elementary science, which at present may almost be said to be dead in the country, for, while many thousands of schools take up geographical subjects, I am ashamed to say that only a score of schools deal with elementary science. We, however, wish to see a step further in this direction, namely, that no school shall be considered efficient which does not provide in the three first standards for a graduated scheme of object lessons. This is not insisted upon in the Code, but we shall never lay a firm foundation for teaching technical subjects until we have made object lessons compulsory as a continuation of the Kindergarten instruction, which is given now and with which everybody is so well pleased. Such a course has been again and again urged by the Technical Commission as well as by the Royal Commission on Elementary Education, and there is no reason why it should not be insisted upon. But while acknowledging that much has been done and that much progress has been made, I am bound to say that some of the alternative courses proposed are not satisfactory. In my opinion, the specialisation of science subjects should not be made in the first four standards, for it seems impossible that children even in the Third Standard can begin to study such subjects as light, heat, magnetism, or electricity. It would be much better to have a general course of object lessons, including simple facts and principles chosen from several branches of science. That would do more to instruct and amuse the children than specialisation at an earlier period. It is time enough to specialise when we get to the Fourth Standard. May we not ask for some alteration in the Schedule in this respect? Surely some alternative course might be provided? In the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Technical Education it is pointed out that science instruction may properly be encouraged by an additional grant. It is more expensive and more difficult to teach than ordinary subjects, and if some increased amount could be given in those schools in which elementary science is taught, we should see this most important subject established on a proper footing. With regard to science teaching, I see in Article 35 provision is made for assistance to the Inspectors in framing questions and marking the answers in examination, but no provision is made for assistance in oral examinations, which, in the earlier standards, are better than examination by paper. I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider the desirability of giving such assistance. As to the question of training teachers, we all welcome the proposal to permit the existence of day training colleges, and I think it would be well that they should be attached to institutions of repute, where the teachers may be brought into contact with men of high culture. A wise step is, it seems to me, about to be taken, but admittedly it is only an experiment, and I regret that it is so limited. And there is another important point with regard to the training of teachers. The third year is the year in which the most progress is usually made by the student, and yet I cannot find that any grant is to be made for that year.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: That point is under consideration.

SIR H. ROSCOE: I desire to again offer my congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman in this most important improvement which the Code introduces into elementary education. I believe it may be said to mark an era in the educational progress of the country. In view of the fact that an extra amount will have to be given to these schools, I would urge upon the Vice President the importance of their being made efficient, for that is the whole gist of the question, and I trust we may rely on his taking care that efficiency is secured.

(10.45.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have devoted many years of my life to the subject of education, and I therefore feel bound to take part in this Debate. I desire, in the first place, to acknowledge in the fullest and most ample manner the consideration given by the Government to the suggestions made in connection with the Code of last year by those interested in voluntary schools. I believe that in consequence of these suggestions the Code has been greatly amended, and the cause of national education has been advanced in this as in many other particulars. It has been shown that the friends of voluntary schools were acting in accord with the true interest of national education. There is also a greater identity of sentiment and of feeling between the recommendations of the Royal Commission and the Code of this year than was to be found by comparison of last year's Code with these recommendations. With reference to what has been said by the hon. Member for Poplar as to the diminution of contributions to voluntary schools being in proportion to the increase of the grant, I last year quoted some figures on that point, which showed that, although for a short time there had been a diminution, yet it had been followed by an increase. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield dissents from that, but the real facts are as I have mentioned. To be perfectly frank, I am bound to admit that the voluntary contributions for the last year for which they are published do, as compared with the preceding Returns, show a diminution to the colossal and overpowering extent of £63. Therefore that accusation is, I think, not well founded.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The Returns of the Education Department show that the contributions per head are substantially less than they were 10 years ago.

MR. F. S. POWELL: I am speaking now of the absolute figures, and I am perfectly sure that I am accurate in my statement. Allusion has been made to a speech by Lord Cranbrook on this subject in the course of last year. Well, I do not think that that speech increased the reputation of the noble Lord as a statesman; but I am certain that it caused very great pain to the friends of the Government and to the friends of voluntary schools. Now, I feel a very great obligation to the Government for the changes they have made in this Code; but I may be allowed to express regret that while the 17s. 6d. limit has been modified with reference to country schools, it still remains as regards town schools. In the borough which I have the honour to represent I find that in the schools in the poorer districts the grant from the under 17s. 6d. limit extends to £40, £45, or £50 a school. And I am not, on this point, appealing merely on behalf of Church of England schools; the poorer schools of all denominations are, as I say, disadvantageously affected by this limit. Now, as a Lancashire man, and as a Member for a Lancashire constituency, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the Roman Catholic schools have done very good work in that county, and I hold we ought to remove every possible hindrance to the successful continuation of their labours. But I find that the fine upon voluntary schools, which amounted to £32,000 in 1888-9, amounted to £36,000 in 1889-90, and I hope that the Government will see their way to removing this grievous burden from these schools. Its existence is an injury to the cause of education. We have for many years impressed upon the Government the importance of laying before the House simultaneously with the Code the instructions to Inspectors. This year they have done so, and the result has been the discovery that what the Government are giving with one hand in the Code they are proposing to take away with the other hand by means of their instructions. I am glad that my right hon. Friend has promised to amend this, and I trust that on future occasions we shall always be allowed to see the instructions before the House is asked to sanction the Code. In connection with the subject of technical education, I am glad the Department are inaugurating a system by which technical colleges will be established for the higher teaching, and that only elementary teaching in technical subjects will be attempted in the lower schools. We have heard a great deal on the question of payment by results. I am glad that the obsolete system of payment by results has been abolished, but I am sure that Parliament will never grant £3,500,000 a year for educational purposes unless it is assured that the schools are efficient. What says the Report of the Royal Commission on this point? I will read it to the Committee—

“We are convinced that the distribution of the Parliamentary Grant cannot be wholly freed from its present dependence on the results of examination without the risk of incurring graver evils than those which it is sought to cure. Nor can we believe that Parliament will long continue to make so large an annual grant as that which now appears in the Education Estimates without in some way satisfying itself that the quality of the education given justifies the expenditure.”

The friends of education must satisfy the country that they are doing good work and that the money is being well earned, or the grant of £4,000,000 will shrink to a much smaller sum, and great injury will be done to the cause of education. With regard to voluntary schools I wish to say a word. At present each voluntary school, to a large extent, stands by itself, and is dependent on its own mode of action and its own finance; but I hope that the absolute necessity for grouping voluntary schools together, so that they may co-operate in finance and give each other mutual assistance, will be seen. I also wish to allude to the question of day training colleges. I have the honour of being a member of the councils of five of these colleges, one of which is the Yorkshire College. One of the first subjects the council of that college had to consider was whether they should or should not become connected with the Department as a day training college. They desired, so far as their means would allow, to co-operate with the Government, but the question of expense came in, and they found that they would have to expend £200 a year to carry out their proportion of their duties, and that, being straitened in finance, they would have great difficulty in finding the money. Many of the principals of the training colleges made representations to the right hon. Gentleman, who, in his usual courteous way, replied somewhat in the following sense:—That it was quite useless for him to approach the Treasury with a view to increase the sum of £10 under Article 127, and that, looking to the assistance already granted to local colleges out of public funds and to the important position of the colleges, it was hardly too much to expect of their patriotism that they should make some special contribution to the scheme now before Parliament for the better training of elementary teachers. That was the answer of the right hon. Gentleman. I am not quarrelling with it. The Treasury gave considerable grants for the purpose of carrying out higher education. The Yorkshire College received £1,400; and I feel regret that, having adjusted our finances to do our work according to the new conditions, the training colleges should be called upon to devote to elementary education money originally given for the purposes of higher education. This controversy between the Treasury and the Education Department is somewhat unfortunate, and I hope that if larger duties are imposed on these institutions, the Treasury will review the situation and enlarge the grants. Under the Code the colleges will have the examination of students, and for the first time the examinations for certificates will be conducted by a department not Governmental. In Scotland, I am informed, the training colleges are connected with the Universities, but the examinations are conducted by the professors with the aid of Inspectors. To have the examination of students at these colleges without Government superintendence is an entirely new departure on which I make no observation; but I venture to say so much as this, that it is an experiment which requires to be watched with great care, so that the examinations may be conducted in such a way as that the test for educational purposes is effectual. As to the religious teaching of the students, at present they are taught in colleges connected with some religious denomination. It is so in Scotland. I am not sure whether in all of these new colleges they will be entirely free to teach religion, but it will be an unhappy thing indeed, and a retrogression and not an advance, if religion is entirely banished from the training of those who will become, in the course of a short time, teachers of the young. My right hon. Friend has made promises which I have no doubt he will entirely fulfil, with a view to the amendment of the Code, in deference to the suggestions made. I do hope, when he considers the Amendments which he has promised, that he will have full regard to the position of the existing teachers, and that through the whole of the Code, from first to last, he will place the new burdens on those who are not yet fully qualified as teachers, and will exempt men and women of experience and knowledge who may yet not have the technical equipment rendered necessary under the new arrangements. I have already spoken of drawing, and I shall say nothing more about it. I believe myself that, in all the schools of the country, drawing ought to be taught to every student. When you deal with those who have to earn their livelihood, I believe progress cannot be made without drawing, and that with drawing, you have before you a brilliant career. With regard to classification, my right hon. Friend has frankly acknowledged the discrepancy between the Code and the instruction. I do not share the opinion of the hon. Member for Evesham with regard to the entire abandonment of classification. On the contrary, I believe that the Report of the Royal Commission is sound in so far as it points out that there should be freedom of classification as a general principle, but that precautions should at the same time be taken in the Code that this freedom should not be abused. I believe that if we gave teachers freedom of classification without restraint and without superintendence, the schools would fall into confusion, and that it would be necessary for the Government in a short time to apply a stringent remedy to the evils that might arise. Great complaint has been made about the maintenance of the 8th clause. I certainly fully agree with the policy of the Government in insisting, as a general rule, on what is known as the First Standard. I believe that, except you have some standard for the young children, you will make your infant schools mere places of amusement, and you will find that, when they come to the schools where a later stage of education is entered upon, the whole work of tuition is to be begun again, to the great embarrassment and hindrance of the future progress of the children. I must make some reference to that which is known as the fixed grant. Now, I wish that the Code had been a little less inconsistent in its text as to the fixed grant, and I cannot help thinking that it bears on the face of it some marks of revision. When I come to read Article 101, with the gloss of the other Article referred to upon it, it reads thus—

“A fixed grant of 12s. 6d. is a fixed grant which may not be reduced except the Department pay a portion only, and may not be withdrawn unless it is withdrawn.”

Now, I think that that is a very poor security. But we have discussed this matter more than once, and I trust that the Article will be so amended before the Code is finally settled that no doubt can possibly exist on the subject, because we feel it to be a great hardship that in view of the promise of a fixed grant qualifications are to be found here and there in it, and that powers are given enabling the Government to reduce the grant. I venture to call the attention of my right hon. Friend and the Committee to this as a matter of actual experience, and I assert that it is utterly and absolutely impossible for every Vice President to watch the administration of all these details. They must necessarily be left to the administration of the subordinate officials. What I desire to see in this Code is that some security should be provided so that no fault of mismanagement on the part of subordinates in the administration of the system shall have the effect of taking away from the schools that boon which I feel assured the Government intend to confer. Well, I wish to make one observation in reference to sample examinations. I think that great care is necessary to make this kind of examination real, and I also think there is much justice in the claim made on behalf of the teachers that they should have the power of reducing the number of scholars by naming one-half, so that they may call together a number of scholars who are most fitted to do justice to the school. The instruction given in paragraph 13, page 6, directs the Inspector to invite the teacher to add to those selected a few of his most forward scholars, so that no accident may deprive the best work of the school of its due recognition. I think if this instruction is carefully obeyed the alarm of the teachers might prove to be unfounded, and the examination be made a fair and legitimate test. I may add that I greatly rejoice to find that recitation is to be retained as a part of our system. I find, as I go from school to school inquiring into their management and conduct, that there is no subject more popular with the scholars than recitation, and I know of nothing that is likely in the future to be of greater service to them in elevating their minds and improving their taste. If I may be allowed to make one concluding remark it is that we must not regard education by itself. Elementary education is only part of the general movement for the progress of the working classes of this country. We are doing much to improve their health by sanitary laws, and we are making great endeavours to improve their social condition by creation of public parks, and the making of regulations of a wholesome and beneficial character. Therefore, while I welcome the progress of education, I would point out that that is, after all, but one of the many indications of our national progress, and one of the many means now being taken to advance and improve the condition of our neighbouring population by exertions which I believe to be well worth the efforts made, and by expenditure which, as long as it is wisely directed, will be amply rewarded by the success it will achieve.

(11.25.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): It is unfortunate that the Debate has been crowded into so short a space of time to-night. The Vice President of the Council has given us a very able and exhaustive statement with regard to this Code—a statement which was worthy of a much larger audience. It was characterised by a complete mastery of the subject, and was full of good educational matter from beginning to end. I should not have risen at so late an hour but for the fact that only two Members on this side of the House have had an opportunity of speaking. It is evident that the Debate cannot close to-night, as many Members on both sides desire to discuss the question. I will glance in the briefest manner at the main features of the Code. There can be no doubt that one of its main features is the help which it is intended to give to rural schools. We do not grudge any expenditure on behalf of education, but we wish to point out that a very large sum will be added to the Education Estimates by this Code. I believe we shall be adding 5s. 6d. or 6s. a head to all schools in the country where the population is under 500, and that we shall be giving to the poor town schools an increased grant of at least 1s. 6d. a head, whereas in the case of the better class schools, which are now earning £1 or £1 1s. a head, I do not believe one farthing will be added to their receipts, whether they are Board schools or voluntary schools. The addition will go to a class of schools which the right hon. Gentleman himself admits to be, to a very large extent, hardly creditable. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman admits that, unless they improve, a great many of them must be wiped off the annual grant. I wish to call attention to two or three points to which the right hon. Gentleman referred with respect to the extra subjects he proposes to teach in the schools. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the curriculum in our rural schools is altogether too narrow, and said there must be some extended curriculum to make the school life of the children more attractive. In all that I entirely agree. From the Returns I have before me I find that the whole number of the children so taught would hardly cover half a dozen rural parishes. The right hon. Gentleman said we ought also to extend the teaching of cooking. What are the numbers at present undergoing instruction in cookery? Why, only 60,000 girls are taught out of some 2,000,000 girls in average attendance, and I should like the right hon. Gentleman to consider where that teaching takes place. Has he ever inquired in what schools these girls who are receiving this instruction are to be found? The right hon. Gentleman glories in the 4s. grant, and no doubt it is a very handsome one, and it pays well to teach this branch of education; why, then, is it that there are not more girls taught? I will tell the right hon. Gentleman. I am not going to make any invidious comparison between Board and voluntary schools, but that there is a lack of combination and organisation among the latter is evident from the fact that out of the 60,000 girls now receiving this instruction, 50,000 receive it in Board schools. Last year there were 57,589 girls receiving grants for cookery; and of this number 47,000 and odd were taught in Board schools, and the whole of the balance was spread over the National, Wesleyan, Roman Catholic, and other denominational schools. It is, I think, very much to be regretted that in our large towns, where cookery teaching is given in Board schools, more attention is not paid to it in the voluntary schools, and it seems to me that there ought to be some organisation amongst the managers of voluntary schools by means of which it would be possible to have this kind of instruction and other extra instruction in all of them. As to what the right hon. Gentleman is doing for the small schools, we do not grudge it, nor do we grudge what he is doing for some of the larger ones; but what we say is, that we must have efficient teaching and a wider curriculum, in order that we may have value received for these grants. It is not a question of paying so much money to the managers of voluntary schools in order that they may be recouped the amount of their subscriptions—not that I wish to raise a controversy on this matter, but it is a fact that the amount of subscriptions to the voluntary schools is actually less now than it was 10 years ago. Nearly one-third more children are now being educated in the voluntary schools than were taught 10 years ago, and yet the amount of subscriptions is no larger. In 1875, before the 7s. 6d. limit was extended, 9s. 6d. per head was spent by means of voluntary subscriptions; but last year the amount was only 6s. 11d., the difference being made up by grants and additional fees charged to the children. What we want to impress on the right hon. Gentleman is that the increased munificence of the State should not go to relieve the managers of voluntary schools of their personal liability. What we want is that the children shall have good teaching, and we are entitled to expect it. We deprive the parents of the labour of their children up to a certain age, and as we compel the children to go to school, we ought to take care and secure that they shall be well taught. It is hardly creditable in us, when we compare English schools with Scotch schools, to find at what a disadvantage English children are, though the grants in both cases come from the Public Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman expressed a belief that the charges made in respect of evening schools would, practically, cover the whole ground of education, but I do not think that what the right hon. Gentleman is doing will make these schools continuation schools where our youth can complete the education supplied in the day schools. With respect to training schools attention has been drawn to a rather invidious distinction made in the Code between what are called "trained" and "untrained" teachers. I think it is rather an unfortunate distinction to make, and I think that something ought to be done to relieve teachers who are classed as "untrained" from the disabilities attaching to their class. By the Code of 1882 young men who trained in the Universities and young women obtaining certificates in the higher local examinations were invited to teach in the schools; but these teachers, however efficient, however able, will in future receive lower salaries than teachers who come from training colleges. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will try to devise some means of removing that which is rather a disability in this respect. Then, the right hon. Gentleman dealt with the question of our training colleges, and this is where, I think, the Code errs on the side of illiberality. Two hundred students in all the great training colleges in England and Wales are altogether inadequate for the purpose of forming classes. At the great university colleges, such as those of Leeds, Sheffield, and Birmingham, to which grants were paid last year, you could not get classes for the teachers if you were to limit the number to 200. The waste of teachers requires that you should have nearer 2,000 than 200. I do not wish to take up the time of the House any longer, as I know there are other hon. Members who desire to speak—although the discussion will have to be continued over another evening. We are now discussing the New Code, and we have before us the Estimates of the year, and we have a Bill to carry out the provisions of the Code. What I regret is that in bringing in this Bill the right hon. Gentleman has not extended its provisions somewhat further. The right hon. Gentleman has to a limited extent adopted the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Elementary Education, and he has also met some of the recommendations of the Technical Education Commissioners; but why has he not gone somewhat further with respect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission, as to raising the standard of age and extending the school life of the child? We may discuss these educational questions as often as we like; your grants may be lavish, your Codes excellent, and your teachers may be as excellent as you please; you may make the best and most liberal arrangements for education, but if the child's school life is to end at 10 years of age you are wasting your money. In large towns there are thousands of children who go to full-time labour after the fourth standard. I see the Under Secretary for India (Sir J. Gorst) in his place. The hon. Member took part in the Berlin Conference, and when we see the Papers I expect we shall find that the hon. Gentleman advocated the raising of the age of half-timers, and extending the school life of the child. In many rural districts, especially in the West, the second standard is the half-time standard, and two years ago that was the case in Bradford. Why cannot the right hon. Gentleman screw up his courage and adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and do for England what is done in Scotland? We should have a minimum standard for half-time. I have only risen to express my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the liberal provisions of the Code he has launched to-night. We hope that it will have a prosperous voyage. It will not pass without a good deal of criticism when it comes into operation, and a good many people will be disappointed. There will always be payment by results until the localities manage their own schools and their own money. I hope that later on the right hon. Gentleman will be able to announce that he has made some provision for meeting the suggestions which have been made with regard to raising the age at which the school life of the child should end, and raising the full and half-time standards.

*(11.46.) MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I must express my regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have inserted the provision in Sub-section 5 of Article 106, which makes it obligatory for any child to have passed Standard V. before he can be presented for examination in the special subjects alone or in less than three elementary subjects in connection with an evening school. I cannot see the object of that provision, as it will prevent a child from getting the advantage of some education who may have been prevented from proper attendance at a day school. If the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to remove this disqualification altogether, I hope that he will reduce it to Standard IV. It would be very hard for our children who have been passing the Standards under the present Regulations that they should be shut out from studying special subjects, which they could go in for in the evening schools. Some of these special subjects, such as cookery, laundry work, gardening, and wood-working, would produce much happiness in cottage homes, and I think that it ought to be made as easy as possible to take advantage of these studies.

*(11.50.) MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I desire very briefly to call attention to matters in which representations have been made to Members of this House by numerous deputations of teachers. The first question raised is as to the method of examination in reading lessons, and I think that the Code the right hon. Gentleman has brought in is a very marked advance on anything we have hitherto had in that respect. As Chairman of the School Board of Leicester, and as being concerned in the management of an industrial school at some distance from Leicester, I have had some experience in this matter. The examinations in reading and dictation are better in the industrial than in the Board schools, for, so far as the latter are concerned, the children have been reading from the same book for a long time, and are almost able to repeat the lessons by heart when they come to be examined. It would be an advantage if the children were examined in some other book than that with which they have become familiar. I make these remarks because they have a bearing upon the whole question of new examinations. I approve of the new method of examination, which I believe will lead to an improvement in education. As I understand it, the Inspector is now empowered to see how far general intelligence has spread in a school. That, I believe, is the intention of the Department, and it is the desire of those who are interested in education, and I mention this specially because I think there has been a misapprehension with regard to it on the part of the teachers. The examination is likely to be more interesting for the teachers and better for the scholars, and we shall in future require more highly, rather than less highly, educated men than before. With regard to denominational schools, I am much interested in them, but they ought to be efficient. What we fear is that the increased grants to them will lessen the subscriptions. That was the case when a new scheme for the free school at Bosworth was introduced by the Charity Commissioners. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the immense improvement which this Code presents to anything that has preceded it, and I believe it will lead to a better education being given.

(11.55.) MR. PICTON: I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Picton.)

(11.55.) MR. MUNDELLA: I would ask whether, before the Debate comes on again, the right hon. Baronet will let us have the Circulars to which he refers? There are two Circulars of considerable importance, one respecting half-timers.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I can promise that the Circulars to which I referred shall be laid upon the Table of the House.

*(12.0.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I trust that before the Debate is resumed full notice will be given to the House of the day on which it will be taken, as several members on both sides of the House wish to speak on the Education Question.

*(12.1.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): Notice shall, of course, be given, but I trust that short notice will suffice, as it would be a pity to lose any opportunity of going on with the discussion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 317.)

Lords Amendments agreed to.

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 70.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after the word "shall," to insert the words "subjectas hereinafter mentioned."
—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."
—(Mr. John Kelly.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

And, Objection being taken to further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SLANDER LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—
(No. 278.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday 18th June.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AMENDMENT ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.

(NO. 223.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

* (12.10.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I have satisfied the hon. Gentlemen opposite who had some objection to this Bill, and I now ask that it may be read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. H. Bolton.)

Mr. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I object.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): May I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his objection. It is proposed by the hon. Member opposite to refer the Bill to the Select Committee to which another Bill of a similar character has already been referred. It is a good Bill. It proposes to remove a substantial grievance with regard to rating, and it would be a distinct advantage if the Bill were read a second time and referred to the Committee upstairs. That Committee might be able to put the two Bills together, and thus bring about a substantial improvement in the law.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to the Select Committee on the Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill.

CONVICTS (PENAL SERVITUDE).

Address for—

"Return of the number of convicts now undergoing sentences of Penal Servitude, classified so as to show how many have served under such sentences for less than five years, for more than five years and less than 10 years, for more than 10 years and less than 15 years, and for more than 15 years."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock till Thursday.

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington

COMMITTEES

An Amendment to the first of a number of Amendments for Instructions to Committee, which resembles the Motion "That the House do pass to the Orders of the Day," and by which the House dis-embarrasses itself of matters which it does not wish to pass judgment on, and proceeds to its appointed business, is not out of order.

The new Rule, that the Speaker leave the Chair without Question put, would be robbed altogether of force if a number of Instructions are put down so as to prevent the Speaker leaving the Chair.

A Member cannot be allowed to put down more than one Instruction, as it gives him a greater right of speaking than he has on the Second Reading of the Bill.

When the Instruction itself is out of order it is impossible to move an Amendment to bring in that Instruction May 2, 19, 22

MISCELLANEOUS

May 2, 53; May 5, 239, 240; May 8, 477, 482; May 9, 554, 559; May 14, 914; May 15, 937, 964, 965; May 16, 1121, 1181, 1185, 1199, 1209; May 21, 1417, 1421, 1428; May 23, 1695, 1699, 1744, 1748; June 3, 1850, 1885, 1890

QUESTIONS

Asking for an expression of opinion is not within the limits of a Question May 22, 1581

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE

When an Order for the Second Reading of a Bill is opposed it is necessary, in accordance with the Standing Orders, to put it down for the next day! but the 2R. by arrangement can then be deferred May 20, 1392

A Member is not entitled to refer in Debate to what takes place in Committee, of which the House has no cognisance when the Speaker is in the Chair May 20, 1424

A Member is entirely out of order in referring by anticipation to matters to be dealt with in Bills before the House May 6, 307, 308

The Motion for Supply being still before the House after a Division for Adjournment, there is no need for the Government to set up Supply again for the purpose of enabling a Member to speak. Neither is the Speaker bound to call upon a Member when the Motion is an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. The Member should rise when the Speaker proclaims "Motion withdrawn, Supply Monday," otherwise the Motion on which the Member's notice gives him the right to speak is withdrawn, and his right disappears.

The Member could have challenged a Division on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, but not on his own Motion.

If a Member had objected to the withdrawal of Supply, the Motion could not have been withdrawn without discussion May 16, 1207, 1208, 1212
